P R E F A C E.

MY preface prefixed to the first volume of this edition of the STATE-TRIALS promised, that the present volume should consist wholly of trials not contained in any former edition; and I was understood to be the person, who would point out what were the materials proper to be adopted.

In conformity to this engagement, I used considerable diligence to discover what trials were omitted in the period of the former editions, and what trials of importance have occurred since. But the result of my pursuit for new matter proved very inadequate to my expectation; the industry of former collectors having scarce left any deficiencies, which I could supply without too far passing the line I had prescribed to myself of merely selecting additional trials. Yet the few, which I have gleaned, may suffice to convince the reader, that I have not been sparing of research.

In the course of my enquiries for new trials, I resorted to the British Museum, in hopes, that the immense collection of manuscripts in that repository of learning and science would supply me with some new materials of importance; and I was particularly encouraged in this expectation by the promising titles of various articles in the catalogue of Harleian manuscripts. But I was wholly disappointed; for on examination, the few trials I met with proved, either too meagre and insignificant to be made use of, or nothing more than mere transcripts from some of our old printed chronicles. And here I take great pleasure in bearing testimony of the exemplary conduct of those gentlemen, who by their offices have the superintendence of the manuscripts and printed books in the British Museum. Though I have had frequent occasion to give several of those gentlemen much trouble; yet I have ever found them uniformly studious to render the access to the valuable collections entrusted to them easy and agreeable. I have also had the full opportunity of noticing, that their deportment and attentions to others are of the same obliging kind. So honourable a discharge of their duty well entitles them to some rewards beyond the small emoluments of their respective offices; and I heartily wish, that they may in future attract a greater share of patronage from the great, than they have hitherto experienced.

There is one very striking and capital defect in the former editions of this collection; I mean, in the article of parliamentary trials, under which head may be included, not only trials on impeachments, but proceedings on bills of attainder, and on bills inflicting pains and penalties. In the ten volumes, which constitute the work as it was before the present edition, there are not, as I calculate, thirty articles which fall under such a description. Yet from a very imperfect list, which I formed on a slight examination of the rolls of parliament, and various other books of parliamentary information, I found, that many more than a hundred such trials might be extracted. It was my wish to have supplied this omission; more especially as by so doing infinite light would be thrown on a subject most interesting to all lawyers and politicians; namely, the criminal judicature of parliament. But such a vast undertaking would not only have far exceeded the limits of my engagements to the proprietors of this edition of STATE-TRIALS, but would also have swelled the present collection greatly beyond the terms of the proposals to the subscribers.

Before each trial in this volume, I have given notice to the reader whence it is extracted, with such other explanations, as were necessary to enable the forming a judgment on the authority of the trial. It would have been of no small advantage to the readers, if the collectors of the former volumes had been equally explanatory.

My introductory note to some of the trials in this volume is extended into an illustration of the subject of the trial; and occasionally I have interspersed similar notes elsewhere. The fullest annotations of this kind are those prefixed to the Case of Impositions, the Case of the Postnati, the Bankers Case, and the respective Cases of Mr. Whitlock and Mr. Oliver St. John. These and the other notes I commit to the candid construction of the reader, with an assurance, that I have endeavoured to form and express my opinions with the utmost impartiality and moderation; and that I shall even think myself obliged by a good-humoured correction of any errors into which I may have fallen.

In the trials and cases in this volume, the reader will find an ample discussion of various great constitutional questions.—The Case of Impositions furnishes a profusion of learning on the point so long controverted, whether the king could by prerogative impose duties at the ports. In the course too of the arguments on that head, the learned reader will be pleased to see some important remarks on the king's power of laying embargoes. Some persons, justly of high authority in the present times, have been inclined to restrict the exercise of this power to time of war. But I confess, that I do not see, why the prerogative should be thus limited. The safety of the state, which is the ground of entrusting the king with the power of laying embargoes, may require an exercise of it in times both of war and peace; and on the eve of a war it is obviously as necessary as in a war itself. Also from what I remember having formerly read on the subject, I have little doubt, but that the precedents and authorities, whenever they shall be well collected, will be found greatly to preponderate against the distinction I have stated. That profound parliamentary lawyer, Mr. Hakewill, when he was arguing in the house of commons against the claimed prerogative of impositions at the ports, candidly admitted the prerogative of embargoes to the full extent of its principle, and consequently, as I conceive, without restricting its exercise to times of war. Yet he well knew, that the power of shutting up the ports was one great branch of the argument for the power of taxing at the ports; and also, that the power of laying embargoes had been often exercised under special acts of parliament. Nor did Mr. St. John, in his argument against ship-money, scruple to admit the power of laying embargoes, and that it was exerciseable, not merely in times of war, but generally in times of imminent danger, whether arising from war, from dearth, or from any other cause. Perhaps some readers may wonder, that I should be thus unreserved in contending for the prerogative of embargoes. But I refer such to my note before the Case of Impositions. They will there find a short but connected view of the various means practised to establish in the crown a power of taxing out of parliament from the accession of James the first to the Restoration; and I presume to hope, that on a consideration of the freedom, with which I have in that note animadverted on such unconstitutional attempts, I shall be sufficiently guarded against any suspicion of the least wish to extend the royal prerogative beyond its due limits.—The Irish Case of Præmunire must be interesting to every person, who wishes to be informed, in a summary and accurate way, how the church of Rome gradually encroached on the king's ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and how at length the English church and kingdom were compleatly exonerated from the expence tyranny and disgrace of foreign usurpation. My note at the end of that case is intended to assist the inquiries of such as may be curious to pursue the subject more in detail.—In the Case of the Postnati, the doctrine of allegiance to the crown is enlarged upon, with a surprizing variety of learning and historical information; tending to explain the relation between England and the countries which at any time before the accession of the first James had been dependant upon England, or connected with it by being under the dominion of the same prince. To render this great political Case more intelligible, I have prefixed a fuller account of its origin, and all the proceedings in it, than is commonly to be met with; to which I have added a reference to almost every book of consequence likely to supply the least further information about the case.—The Case of Mr. Oliver St. John for writing against benevolences, deserves attention on account of its connection with the Case of Ship Money and the Case of Impositions. In my note on Mr. St. John's Case, I have pointed out this connection; and I have therein risked some remarks on the subject of benevolences to the Crown; with a view to shew, how far they have been condemned and are clearly unlawful.—In the Case of the Bankers, some curious subjects are discussed; more especially the general power of the Crown to alienate its revenues before the restraining statute of queen Anne; whether some particular revenues, on account of their special nature, were not privileged and exempt from the Crown's general power of alienating; and whether the barons of the Exchequer could compel the lord treasurer to issue money for payment of the king's debts, or, in other words, whether the receipt of the Exchequer is under the controul of the barons. The most remarkable of the arguments in this famous case, or, at least, of those which have reached the present times, is lord Somers's. It not only unfolds the constitution of the Exchequer with great minuteness; but in other respects is most excellent, having a scope and compass, which will ever render it of infinite value to the profession of the law. So anxious, indeed, was his lordship to sustain his opinion by the most authentic materials, that the records referred to and stated in his argument are said to have cost him several hundred pounds. My note on this Case, explains how it arose, the progress of it, and how the claims of the bankers and their creditors were finally adjusted by act of parliament, with some other particulars, which I thought might be conducive to a thorough understanding of the case, and of the points decided by it.—In respect to the remainder of the Cases in this volume, most of them relate to very interesting subjects; amongst which the chief are, the effect of matrimonial sentences of the ecclesiastical courts, the extent of the privilege of parliament, the question of general warrants, the question on the seizure of papers, the powers claimed by secretaries of state and privy counsellors, the question on the slavery of negroes in England, and the power of pressing mariners. However, some of the early cases I have introduced do, I confess, require an apology; being certainly too loose and imperfect in the statement to deserve the name of trials. My inducement to insert them was, that I wished to give the reader some proof, how very extensive I was in my enquiries and researches for new matter to supply the omissions of former collectors; and I do hope, that the notes which precede these short accounts of trials, will be received as a full testimony of my industry in that respect.—Thus much may suffice to apprise the reader what he is to expect from the contents of the present volume.

In my preface to the first volume of this edition of STATE TRIALS, I thought, that I had sufficiently explained myself to guard against any responsibility beyond what really belongs to me. But from the manner of placing my name in the title to the collection, which I now think might have been less ambiguous, a very erroneous notion has prevailed, as to the extent of my very limited share in the undertaking. I therefore deem it proper to be more explicit on this head; and with that view, I here take the opportunity of declaring, that the only parts of the work for which I am in any respect accountable, exclusive of the present preface, are the preface with my name in the first volume; and the selection of the trials and cases for this volume, with such annotations as I have given in the course of it, particularly those before the several trials. As to the trials in the ten preceding volumes, they were printed literally from the last of the former editions; nor did I see so much as one sheet of those volumes before it was printed and published, except only the sheet containing my preface and the title to the first volume. I am equally free from responsibility for the alphabetical and chronological tables of all the trials in this collection, and for the general index of matter; all of which are placed at the end of this volume. These tables and index were prepared by another gentleman. The chronological table of the trials is quite a new accession to the work; there being no such table to the former editions; though the utility of it is apparent, as it in great measure obviates the disadvantage from the disorderly arrangement of many of the trials in point of time. This disorder was a necessary consequence of continuing the first six volumes of the work by supplemental volumes. The merit of lessening this inconvenience belongs wholly to the framer of the tables and Index to this edition; that is, both the proposal of such an improvement and the execution of it originated from him. All that I can pretend to say further concerning the tables and index is, that the latter has been executed at a much greater expence than would have been incurred, if I had not made it a particular request to the proprietors of the edition to be liberal in their allowance for so useful and laborious a part of the undertaking; and further, that I have every reason to believe, that the gentleman who compiled the general index of matter, has been extremely diligent in endeavouring to render it acceptable.

I. The Trial of Sir WILLIAM STANLEY, Knight, for High Treason, 10 Hen. VII. 1494-5.

[There is not a regular account of the trial of this eminent person, in any book we have met with. Old Fabian, with his usual dryness and brevity, only writes, that about Christmas 1494 sir Robert Clifford impeached sir William Stanley, and that sir William was beheaded the 15th of February following. Fab. 530. Hall, with his followers Grafton and Hollingshead, explains, by whom sir William was accused to the king, what was reported to be his offence, and how the king acted on the occasion; adding some conjectures as to the cause of sir William's alienation from the king; but as to the trial itself, all they say is, that he was condemned and executed. Even lord Bacon, though he appears to have taken no small pains to throw every light on the subject, owns, that the memory of the case was dark; and writes of it only from imperfect tradition, aided by the strength of his own conjecture. However, our readers will scarce be averse to seeing what a historian of such a deep penetration writes on a subject so interesting. We shall therefore extract the result of his investigation, after first giving Hall's account, which contains no mean specimen of the abilities of that old chronicler, and will be found to be the groundwork of some part of lord Bacon's more splendid and enlightened narrative.]

These are the words of the original of Sir W. Stanley in Chas. 129. The omission of it has been noticed in the preface.

Extract from Hall's Hen. VII. p. 35.

SYR Robert Clifford, partly trusting on the kynges promes, and partly mistrustynge the thing, because he knewe that diverse that were accused to be partakers of that faccion and conspiracy [in favor of Perkyn Warbeck] were put in execution: and therefore perceaving that they could not be a more pernicious nor more desperate begonne thinge then that develishe enterpryse, returned sodeynly agayn into England. The kyng beyng certified before of his coming, went streight to the Towre of London the morow after the daye of Epiphany, and there taryed til suche tyme that syr Robert Clifford was there presented to hys person, which thinge he used under this pretence, that if syr Robert Clifford had accused any of the nobilitie to be partakers of this ungracious fraternitie and diabolical conjuration, that then every such person might be called thether without suspencion of any evell, and there streight to be attached and cast in holde.

But before I go any farther I wil shew the opinion that at that tyme ranne in many mens heddes of this knyghtes goynge into Flanders. Some men helde this opinion, that kyng Henry for a poley dyd sende him as a spye to Flanders, or els he would not have so sone received him into his grace and favour agayn. Nevertheless this is not like to be true by diverse reasons and apparant argumentes, firste, after that attempt begonne by syr Robert, he was in no smal dangier himselfe, and by that was not a litle noted, and hys same blemished, but also hys frendes were suspected and had in a gealosy. Secundarely, he was not after that in so great favour, nor so esteemed with the kyng as he had been in tymes past, because he was blotted and marked with that crime and offence. And therefore he bearing his favoure to the house of York, entendynge in the beginning to administer displeasure to kyng Henry, sayled to the lady Margaret, beyng seduced and brought in belefe that Perkyn was the very sonne of kyng Edward. But to my purpose, when syr Robert came to the presence of the kyng, he knelyng on his knees most humblye, beseeched hym of grace and pardone, whiche he shortly obteyned. And after that beyng requyred of the maner and ordre of the conjuration and what was done in Flanders, he opened every pointe to his knowlege, and after disclosed the names, aswell of the aiders and fautoures as of the inceptors and begynners. Amongest whome he accused syr William Stanley, whome the kyng made hys chiefe chamberleyn, and one of hys prey counsayll. When he had so sayde, the kyng was greatly dismayed and greved, that he shoulde be partaker in that grevous offence, consideryng first that he had the governaunce of his chambre, and the charge and comptrolment of all suche as were next to hys bodye, and also callynge to remembraunce the manifold gratuities, whiche he had received at hys hande, but in especiall not forgettyng that benefite above all other, that onely by his aide and succoure, he had vanquished and overthrowen his mortall enemy kyng Rychard. Wherefore at the begynnynge he coule in no wyse be induced nor persuaded to beleve, that he was such a prevy conspiratoure or malicious offender; but when the crime was openly proved and probably affirmed, then the king caused hym to be restrayned from his libertie in his awne chambre within the Quadrant Towre. And there appoynted hym by his prevy counsayll to be examined. In whiche examinacion he nothings denied, but wisely and seriously did astipulate and agree to all thinges layed to hys charge, if he were in any of them culpable or blame woorthy.

The reporte is, that this was his offence. When communicacion was had betwene hym, and this syr Robert Clifford, as concerning Perkyn, whiche falsly usurped the name of kyng Edwardes sonne, syr William Stanley sayde and affirmed there, that he would never fight nor beare armure agaynst the young man, if he knew of a truthe that he was the indubitate sonne of kyng Edward the IV. Thys poynte argueth and proveth, hym at that tyme, beyng moved with melancholy, to beare no great good will to kyng Henry, wherof suspicion first grewe, and after this ensued the accusation of syr Robert Clifford.

Then the kyng doubtinge what to do with him, did consulte and breath with hymselfe of this sodeyne chaunce. For he feared least that his brother lorde Thomas Stanley, in whome he had founde great friendship, woulde take this matre greveously. And if he should remit that fault, that abusynge his lenyte and mercy, he would be the more bolder to offende and trespass more highly. Albeit at the last, severitee tooke place, and mercy was put backe, and so he was arreigned at Westminster, and adjudged to dye, and accordinge to that judgement was broughte to the Towre-hill the xvi. daye of February, and there had hys head stricken of. What was the occasion and cause, why the sincere and saythfull mynde, that syr William allways before bare to kyng Henry, was turned into cancarde hatred and dispite, and why the especiall favoure that the kyng bare towarde hym was transmuted into disdeyne and displeasure, diverse men alledge diverse causes, affirmynge that when kyng Henry (what other mutuall benefites the one had received of the other, I wyll nowe pretermyt and overpasse) in that battaile, in the whiche he bereft kyng Rychard bothe of hys life and hys kyngdom, beyng associate and accompanied but with a small numbre, and circumvented by kyng *Richard*s army, and in great jeopardy of his lyfe, thys syr William beyng sent from the lord Stanley hys brother with a good company of strong and hardy men (whiche lorde Stanley was there the felde with a great army) came sodeynly and fortunately to the succours of kyng Henry, and saved hym from destruccion, and overthrowe kyng Rychard as before you have heard. Surely thys was a benefite above all benefites to remembred, by the which kyng Henry was not onely preserved alyve, but also obteyned the croune and kingdome, which great benefite, after the kingdome once obteyned, he did neither forget nor yet left unrewarded. For the lord Thomas Stanley he invetted with the swoorde of the countie of Darby, and beside other great giftes and officies geven to William Stanley, he made him his chiefe chamberleyn. This syr William, although he were in great favoure with the kyng, and had in great and high estimation, more remembring the benefite done to the kyng, then the rewardes and gratuities of his liberalite receaved, thinking that the vessel of oyle, (according to the Gospel) would overflowe the brymmes, and as some saye, desiring to be erle of Cheshire and therof denyed, began to grudge and disdeyne the kyng his high frend: and one thing encouraged him much, which was the riches and treasure of king Richard, which he onely possessed at the conflict of Bosworth: by reason of which haboundance of ryches and greates powre of people, he set nought by the kyng his sovereign lord and mastre. When the kyng perceived that his stomack began to canker and waxe rusty, he was with him not a litle displeased, and so when bothe their hartes were enflamed with melancoly, bothe losse the fruite of their longe continued amitie and favoure. And so it often chaunceth, that when men do not consider nor yet regard the great benefites to them exhibited, they rendre agayne hatred for liberalitee, and for breade geven, they yelde agayne a scorpion. Nowe to returne to the matter.

At thys tyme the kyng thought it best, ye and very necessary, not onely to take hede about him, but also to use some sharpe punysshment and correction of the offences of his subjectes, to the intent that the late begon sedicion might the soner be repressed, and for this cause specially that some persons voyde of all honest feare and reverent dread, had taken such courage and audacitie to them, that they feared not to speake evell of their kyng and sovereign lord, with moost spiteful and contumelious wordes, as though they neither feared nor woulde obey him, or his preceptes and commaundementes, expecting dayly and hourelly the arryvall and landing of the feyned Rychard duke of Yorke, now lately rylen from death to lyfe. But when knowlege of the flanderous and opprobrious woordes were brought to the kynges eares, he caused dyverse persones to suffre condigne punysshment for their heynous offences, whereby their complices wel perceaving that their entrepryce had no prosperous successe nor toke any good effect, and especially such as temerariouly began to make maffries and farther seying what preparacion was made and provyded agaynst theyre tumultuous commocion and frantique entrepryce, they of their awne swynge pased themselves, and beganne to turne to their kyng and naturall liege lorde.

Extract from Bacon's Hen. VII. in 1. Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d. ed. p. 610, 611.

UPON All-hallows-day even, being now the tenth year of the king's reign, the king's second son Henry was created duke of York; and as well the duke, as divers others, noblemen, knights batchellours, and gentlemen of quality, were made knights of the Bath, according to the ceremony. Upon the morrow after Twelfth-day, the king removed from Westminster (where he had kept his Christmas) to the Tower of London. This he did as soon as he had advertisement, that sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosom or budget most of Perkin's secrets were layed up) was come into England. And the place of the Tower was chosen to that end, that if Clifford should accuse any of the great ones, they might without suspicion, or noise, or sending abroad of warrants, be presently attached; the court and prison being within the cincture of one wall. After a day or two, the king drew unto him a selected council, and admitted Clifford to his presence; who first fell down at his feet, and in all humble manner craved the king's pardon, which the king then granted, though he were indeed secretly assured of his life before. Then commanded to tell his knowledge, he did amongst many others (of himself, not interrogated) approach sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain of the king's household.

The king seemed to be much amazed at the naming of this lord, as if he had heard the news of some strange and fearful prodigy. To hear a man, that had done him service of so high a nature, as to save his life, and set the crown upon his head; a man, that enjoyed by his favour and advancement so great a fortune, both in honour and riches; a man, that was tied unto him in so near a band of alliance, his brother having married the king's mother; and lastly, a man, to whom he had committed the trust of his person, in making him his chamberlain; that this man, no ways disgraced, no ways discontent, no ways put in fear, should be false unto him. Clifford was required to say over again, and again, the particulars of his accusation, being warned, that in a matter so unlikely, and that concerned so great a servant of the king's, he should not in any wise go too far. But the king finding that he did sadly and constantly (without hesitation or varying, and with those civil protestations that were fit) stand to that that he had said, offering to justify it upon his soul and life; he caused him to be removed. And after he had not a little bemoaned himself unto his council there present, gave order that sir William Stanley should be restrained in his own chamber, where he lay before, in the Square Tower. And the next day he was examined by the lords. Upon his examination he denied little of that wherewith he was charged, nor endeavoured much to excuse or extenuate his fault. So that (not very wisely) thinking to make his offence less by confession, he made it enough for condemnation. It was conceived, that he trusted much to his former merits, and the interest that his brother had in the king. But those helps were over-weighed by divers things that made against him, and were predominant in the king's nature and mind. First, an over-merit; for convenient merit, unto which reward may easily reach, doth best with kings. Next the sense of his power; for the king thought, that he that could set him up, was the more dangerous to pull him down. Thirdly, the glimmering of a confiscation; for he was the richest subject for value in the kingdom; there being found in his castle of Hali forty thousand marks in ready money, and plate, besides jewels, household-stuff, stocks upon his grounds, and other personal estate, exceeding great. And for his revenue in land and fee, it was three thousand pounds a year of old rent, a great matter in those times. Lastly, the nature of the time; for if the king had been out of fear of his own estate, it was not unlike he would have spared his life. But the cloud of so great a rebellion, hanging over his head, made him work sure. Wherefore after some six weeks distance of time, which the king did honourably interpose, both to give space to his brother's intercession, and to shew to the world, that he had a conflict with himself, what he should do; he was arraigned of high-treason, and condemned, and presently after beheaded.

Yet is it to this day but in dark memory, both what the case of this noble person was, for which he suffered, and what likewise was the ground and cause of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king. His case was said to be this: that in discourse between sir Robert Clifford and him, he had said; that if he were sure, that that young man were king Edward's son, he would never bear arms against him. This case seems somewhat an hard case, both in respect of the conditional, and in respect of the other words. But for the conditional, it seems the judges of that time (who were learned men, and the three chief of them of the privy council) thought it was a dangerous thing to admit ifs and ands, to qualifie words of treason; whereby every man might expresse his malice, and blanch his danger. And it was like to the case (in the following times) of Elizabeth Barton, the holy maid of Kent; who had said, that if king Henry the eighth did not take Katherine his wife again, he should be deprived of his crown, and die the death of a dog. And infinite cases may be put of like nature. Which (it seemeth) the grave judges taking into consideration, would not admit of treasons upon condition. And as for the positive words, that he would not bear arms against king Edward's son; though the words seem calm, yet it was a plain and direct over-ruling of the king's title, either by the line of Lancaster, or by act of parliament. Which (no doubt) pierced the king more, than if Stanley had charged his lance upon him in the field. For if Stanley would hold that opinion, that a son of king Edward had still the better right, he being so principal a person of authority, and favour about the king; it was to teach all England to say as much. And therefore (as those times were) that speech touched the quick. But some writers do put this out of doubt; for they say, that Stanley did expressly promise to aid Perkin, and sent him some help of treasure.

Now for the motive of his falling off from the King; it is true, that at Bosworth Field the king was beset, and in a manner inclosed round about by the troops of king Richard, and in manifest danger of his life; when this Stanley was sent by his brother with three thousand men to his rescue, which he performed so, that king Richard was slain upon the place. So as the condition of mortal men is not capable of a greater benefit, than the king received by the hands of Stanley; being like the benefit of Christ, at once to save and crown. For which service the king gave him great gifts, made him his counsellour and chamberlain; and, somewhat contrary to his nature, had winked at the great spoils of Bosworth Field, which came almost wholly to this man's hands, to his infinite enriching. Yet nevertheless blown up with the conceit of his merit, he did not think he had received good measure from the king, at least not prest down and running over, as he expected. And his ambition was so exorbitant, and unbounded, as he became suitor to the king for the earldom of Chester. Which ever being a kind of appendage to the principality of Wales, and using to go to the king's son; his suit did not only end in a denial, but in a distaste; the king perceiving thereby, that his desires were intemperate, and his cogitations vast, and irregular, and that his former benefits were but cheap, and lightly regarded by him. Wherefore the king began not to brook him well. And as a little leaven of new distaste doth commonly sour the whole lump of former merit, the king's wit began to suggest unto his passion that Stanley, at Bosworth Field, though he came time enough to save his life, yet he stayed long enough to endanger it. But yet having no matter against him, he continued him in his places until this his fall.

After him was made lord chamberlain, Giles lord Dowbery, a man of great sufficiency and valour; the more, because he was gentle and moderate.

There was a common opinion, that sir Robert Clifford (who now was become the state informer) was from the beginning an emissary, and spie of the king's; and that he fled over into Flanders with his consent and privacy. But this is not probable; both because he never recovered that degree of grace, which he had with the king before his going over; and chiefly, for that the discovery which he had made touching the lord chamberlain (which was his great service) grew not from any thing he learned abroad, for that he knew it well before he went.

II. The Trial of Sir THOMAS EMPSON, Knight, and EDMUND DUDLEY, Esq. for High Treason, at Guildhall, London, 1 Hen. VIII. 1509.

[The most exact account of the proceedings against these two remarkable persons being to be found in lord Herbert, we shall lay it before the reader; who, if he chooses to pursue the subject further, may consult Polydore Virgil, Hall, and Hollingshead.—But it is proper to premise, what we conceive to be a great error, which is current in respect to Empson and Dudley. Our historians in general, not excepting lord Herbert and Mr. Hume, represent Empson and Dudley to have been doubly attainted, first by judgment on trial before a jury, and secondly by an act of parliament. But the statute, thus treated as an act of attainder, was in truth only an act to relieve certain persons, in trust for whom Empson and Dudley were seised of various estates; and to prevent their attainders from hurting innocent persons. Nor is there a word in the act, either to confirm the attainder or to attain; as will appear by consulting the act itself, which is extant in Rastall's edition of the Statutes. Yet even the elaborate writers of the Parliamentary History, to whom both lawyers and politicians are so much indebted for their useful and important labours, have adopted the error; though throughout that work, recourse is apparently had to the journals and records of parliament, which stamps it with great authority. How this happened, we cannot otherwise account for, than by conjecturing, that they were confirmed in the error of their predecessors, by the particular manner in which the Journals of the Lords take notice of the act, whilst it was in its progress through that house as a bill. On the first and second reading, which was the same day, it is styled a bill concerning Dudley and Empson, and their attain and conviction in parliament. These words certainly import a parliamentary attainder, and might well lead any person to give credit to the prior representation of its being so, without taking the trouble to examine the act, which is not in the later edition of the Statutes. But whether their thus describing the bill was an inaccuracy in the penner of the journal, or the bill was at first to attain, it certainly did not pass in that form. Indeed the subsequent part of the journal takes notice, that the bill was newly formed, before it was sent to the Commons.] see 4. Inst. 41. Act. for Parl. 207. Hen. 1. And. 156. The latter book contains the indictment against Empson & Dudley.

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. in 2. Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d ed. p. 2, 4, 6.

WHILE the obsequies and rites [of H. VII.] were preparing (a) the particulars whereof Hall after his manner relates) king Henry retired privately from Richmond (where his father died) to the Tower of London, both that he might with more leisure advise with his council concerning the present affairs of his kingdom, as also the better to avoid those salutes and acclamations of the people, which could not but be unseasonable, till the lamentations and solemnity of his father's funeral were past. He thought not fit to mingle the noises. Here then it was in the first place resolved to make good his authority, as having more undoubted right to the crown by the Union of the White-Rose and the Red in his person, than any king ever delivered to us by warrantable history. For this end he found or took occasions. In one kind Henry Stafford, brother to the duke of Buckingham, served for example, who (upon I know not what suspicion) was apprehended presently, and committed to the Tower; which yet seemed afterwards so frivolous, that, to repair this disgrace, he was the same year made earl of Wiltshire. In the other kind, doctor Ruthall became the object, being (together with one of his council) made the same day bishop of Duresme. Thus, though it seems he halted to take upon him the real marks of sovereignty, yet he so tempered them, as to leave his subjects in hope of an even hand. Besides, that he might shew himself gracious to his subjects, he not only confirmed the pardon his father gave a little before his death for all offences, except murder, felony, and treason, (to which general abolitions do not properly reach) but for farther performance of his father's last will caused a proclamation to be made; that if any man could prove himself to be then wrongfully deprived of his goods, by occasion of a certain commission for forfeitures, he should (upon due complaint) have satisfaction; whereupon so many petitions were presently exhibited against sir Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, esq. (employed lately for taking the benefit of penal statutes) that it was thought fit to call them before the council, where Empson spake to this effect: (b)

“I HAVE remarked two causes in general, that move attention. One is the greatness, the other is the strangeness and novelty of argument. Both these concur so manifestly in the affairs now questioned, that I will not much implore your patience. Though on the other side, considering my violent persecution, I cannot but think it a favour, that I may speak for myself; but (alas) to whom? The king my master, to whom I should appeal, as to my supreme judge and protector, abandons me to my enemies, without other cause, than that I obeyed his father's commands, and upheld the regal authority. The people, on whose equal trial I should put my life, seek my destruction, only because I endeavour to execute those laws whereof themselves were authors. What would have happened to me, if I had disobeyed my king, or broke my country's laws? Surely, if I have any ways transgressed, it is in procuring, that these penal statutes might be observed, which your selves in open parliament decreed, and to which you then submitted, both your persons, estates, and posterity; and if this be a crime, why do you not first repeal your proper acts? Or if (which is truth) they stand still in full force and virtue, why do you not vindicate from all imputation both your selves and me? For who ever yet saw any man condemn'd for doing justice? Especially when by the chief dispenser thereof (which is the king) the whole frame of the proceeding hath been confirmed and warranted? Nay, whoever saw man on these terms not rewarded? And must that, which is the life and strength of all other actions, be the subversion and overthrow of mine? Have you read or heard in any well-governed country, that the infractors of laws made by publick vote, and consent, escaped without punishment, and they only punished who laboured to sustain them? Or when you had not read or heard any such thing, could you imagine a more certain sign of ruine in that common-wealth. And will you alone hope to decline this heavy judgment? When, contrary to all equity and example, you not only make precedents for injustice and impunity, but together with defaming would inflict a cruel death on those who would maintain them; as if this might be a fit guerdon for those who (I must tell you) every where else would have been thought the best patriots; what can we expect then, but a fatal period to us all? But let God turn this away, though I be the sacrifice. Only, if I must die, let me desire that my enditement may be entered on no record, nor divulged to foreign nations, lest, if they hear, in my condemnation, all that may argue a final dissolution in government, they invade and overcome you.”

To this was answered briefly, “That he received a great deal of liberty to speak ill, as well as to do: that he should find at last, he was punished for passing the bounds of his commission from the late King, and for stretching a law which in its self was severe enough to the common and poorer sort of people, from whom he exacted most unjustly.” The chief parts of his accusation (that I can find) were, (c)

“1. That he had committed divers persons to prison, without suffering them to answer till they had compounded for their fines.

“2. For searching unduly mens estates, and bringing them wrongfully to hold under that tenure they call in capite; without that the parties could be permitted to a traverse, till they had payed great fines and ransoms.

“3. That wards, being come to full years, were not allowed to sue out their livery, till they had paid an excessive composition.

“4. That out lawed persons could not be allowed to sue out their charter of pardon, till they had paid half the profit of their lands for two years, upon pretence that it was according to law.

“5. That he usurped upon the jurisdiction of other courts, in hearing and determining divers matters properly belonging to them.

“6. Lastly, That whereas a prisoner being indicted for theft, in the city of Coventry, to the value of one pound, was by the jury acquitted; the said Empson conceiving the evidence to be sufficient, committed the jury to prison, till they entered into bond to appear before the king's council, where the matter being again considered, it was ordered, they should pay eight pounds for a fine (which was thought so heinous, as, at a sessions being held afterwards at Coventry, a particular indictment was framed against him, and he was found guilty).” How many of these allegations were verified, or how far they might be warranted by the last king's commission, appears not to me. Howsoever, for the present, they were (d) committed to the Tower.

This Empson, reported to be a sieve-maker's son in Torchester, from this mean beginning, by his wit and industry, came to be of council to king Henry VII. and master or surveyor of his forfeits in divers kinds, in which place he served as an instrument for raising great sums to the king; Dudley (a gentleman of birth, and such parts as he was chosen speaker of the parliament-house (e) 19 Henry VII.) assisting him. These men (called by Polydore Virgil, Judices Fideles) having it seems exceeded their bounds, were detested of all, but especially the poorer sort, who found it easier to hate than to pay. To satisfy their complaints therefore, it was thought fit to permit them to the ordinary ways of justice: the promoters, they used being so severely punished in the mean time, betwixt the pillory and shame, that they dy'd all (a few days after) in prison, save one Giovanni Baptista Grimaldi, who, foreseeing the storm, took sanctuary in Westminster.

Empson and Dudley being (as is above said) committed to the Tower, new and strange crimes were found and objected against them, as appears in their indictments upon record, wherein, they are accused of conspiracy against the king and state; and first, that during the sickness of the late king in March last, they summoned certain of their friends to be in arms at an hour's warning; and upon the death of the said king, to hasten to London. Out of which, and other circumstances, it was collected by the jury, that their intent was to seize on the person of the new king, and so to assume the sole government; or when they could not attain this, to destroy him.

Of which crimes, how improbable soever, Dudley in his trial at Guildhall in London, July 16, 1509, and Empson at Northampton, October 1, (a) April 23.

(b) April 25.

(c) Hollingshead.

(d) April 23.

(e) 1503.

were found guilty by their juries, and both condemned of treason, and so remanded to the Tower.

Empson and Dudley lying now in prison, condemned and attainted by parliament, the importunate clamours of the people prevailing with the king in this year's progress, he not only restored divers mulcts, but for further satisfaction to the commonalty (by a special writ) commanded to have their heads struck off, August 18, doing therein (as thought by many) more like a good King, than a good Master.

III. The Trial of EDWARD Duke of Buckingham, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward of England, 13th May, 13 H. VIII. 1522.

[Some account of this trial is to be met with in various writers, exclusive of the notice taken of it by our more modern historians. It is slightly mentioned by Polydore Virgil, whose history first came out within eleven or twelve years after the event; and from him it appears, that the prosecution originated from the malice of one Charles Knevet, who, having been removed from the stewardship of some of the duke's estates for oppressing the tenants, in revenge turned informer against his former master, and betrayed him to his great and powerful enemy cardinal Wolsey. Polyd. Virg. ed. Basil. 660, 665. Hall, who was also a cotemporary historian, gives many particulars, relative as well to the manner of arresting the duke and his execution, as to the trial itself. Hall's Hen. VIII. fol. 85. Grafton merely copies from Hall: but Hollingshead and Stow state in addition the several facts charged as treason in the indictment of the duke from the record of it. Grafton, 1044. 3. Hollingsh. 2d. edit. 663. Stow's Chron. Howes's edit. 512. Lord Herbert, in his history of Henry the eighth, assisted by materials from the preceding authors, writes the narration of the duke's trial, which we now offer to the reader. Herb. Hen. VIII. in vol. 2. Kenn. Compl. History, 2d. edit. p. 41.---There is an account of this trial amongst the Harleian Manuscripts; but it is merely compilement from Hall and Stow.]

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. in 2. Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d edit. p. 40.

ABOUT this time Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, eminent for his high blood, and large revenue, drew on himself a dangerous suspicion; which though it was again fomented by the cardinal, who disaffected him for some speeches he had cast forth, yet, could not have overthrown him, but that some indifference of his own concurred. Besides, he suffered much through the ill offices of Charles Knevet, formerly mentioned; who yet durst not appear, till he saw the duke not only discountenanced, but weakened in his friends and allies. And of these I find two principally; one, Henry Percy earl of Northumberland, whose daughter the duke had married; the other, Thomas earl of Surrey, who had married the duke's daughter. Against Northumberland, cause was taken for claiming certain wards; which, after close commitment, yet, he was forced to relinquish. Against Surrey the cardinal proceeded otherwise: for, though he hated him for drawing his dagger at him on some occasion; yet as the earl was more wary than to give new offence, he thought fit to send him away upon some honourable employment for which he found this overture.

Gerald Fitz-Gerald, earl of Kildare, made deputy in Ireland to Henry duke of York, (now king, who at (a) four years old was by his father made lieutenant of that country) having done divers good services against the rebels, was made (b) knight of the garter, and enjoyed that place till his death (c); when his son Gerald being substitute therein, so behaved himself, as he likewise got much credit: though, as he had the house of Ormond his enemy, and particularly sir Pierre Butler earl of Ossory, (d) secret ill offices were done him. Nor did it avail, that he had given his sister in marriage to the said Butler, and helped him to recover the earldom of Ormond, detained wrongfully, since the death of James, by a bastard of that family; for it was impossible to oblige him; especially, where he found so advantageous an occasion to dissent. For as he watched over the earl of Desmond, his perpetual adversary, since the division of Lancaster and York, (in which his ancestors were on the side of Lancaster, and the Kildares and Desmonds on that of York), he discovered more favours done the present earl of Desmond, (whom he called a traitor) than he thought due to him; insomuch that he complained to the cardinal, who thereupon sent for Kildare. Though Polydore saith, he came voluntarily into England to match with some English lady, and there behaved himself so unrespectfully to the cardinal, that he was cast into prison. But whatsoever the cause was, his charge was bestowed on the earl of Surrey, who going to Ireland in April 1520, reduced the earl of Desmond and others to obedience.

The duke of Buckingham being thus exposed and unfriended, the cardinal treats secretly with Knevet, concerning him; who thereupon discovers his late master's life; confessing, that the duke, by way of discourse, was accustomed to say, how he meant so to use the matter, that, if king Henry died without issue, he would attain the crown, and that he would punish the cardinal. Besides, that he had spoken heretofore unto George Nevill lord Abergavenny, who married the said duke's daughter. By what means yet the duke intended particularly to effect these designs, I do not find exactly set down by Charles Knevet. Neither do the authors, who write heretofore, relate his pedigree; only our Heralds say, he was descended from Anne Plantagenet, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, son to king Edward the third. How far this yet might entitle him to the crown, in case king Henry should have no issue, I have neither leisure nor disposition to examine. I shall only therefore, for satisfaction of the reader, select some principal points out of his indictment; leaving the reader for the rest, unto the search of the record: In which, the points that in my opinion made most against the duke, were; 1. That at (e) several times he had sent to one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Henton, to be informed by him, concerning the matters he imagined; and that the monk should return answer, the duke should have all; and therefore should labour to procure the love of the people. 2. That the duke (f) afterwards should go in person to the said Hopkins, who confirmed the said prediction, adding, that he knew it by revelation. Whereupon the said duke should give him several rewards. 3. That he should (g) speak to Ralph Nevill earl of Westmorland (his son-in-law), that, if aught but good came to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to the crown, the king having as yet no issue. That, to comply herewith, he did many things which argued ambition, and desire to make himself popular. That he (h) said to one Gilbert, his chancellor, that whatsoever was done by the king's father, was done by wrong; murmuring withal against the present government. 4. And to the said Charles Knevet, that if he had been committed to the Tower, (whereof he was in danger, upon occasion of one sir William Bulmer) he would have so wrought, that the principal doors thereof should not have cause of great rejoicing; for he would have plaid the part which his father intended to have put in practice against king Richard the third at Salisbury, who made earnest suit to come into the presence of the said king, which suit, if he might have obtained, he having a knife secretly about him, would have thrust it into the body of king Richard, as he had made semblance to kneel down before him. And that, in speaking these words, he maliciously laid hands on his dagger, swearing, that, if he were so evil used, he would do his best to accomplish his intended purpose. 5. That (i) being in speech with sir George Nevill, knight, lord Abergavenny, he said, that if the king died, he would have the rule of the realm, in spite of whosoever said the contrary; swearing, that if the lord Abergavenny revealed this, he would fight with him. This I conceive to be the substance of the most special articles in the evidence; which the courteous reader yet may do well to consider more at large, as they are extant on record. How far yet these particulars were proved, and in what sort, my authors deliver not. Only I find (out of our records) that the duke of Buckingham being committed to the Tower, April 16th, did, under his own hand, declare to sir Thomas Lovell, constable of the Tower, the passages betwixt him and Hopkins, in this manner; that is to say, That the summer before our King made war in France (k), Hopkins sent for him; but, not being able to go, he commanded one Delacour, his chaplain, to repair thither; howbeit, that Hopkins said naught to him; yet that himself came the next Lent; where, in shrift, the said monk told him, that our king should win great honour in his journey to France; and that if the king of Scots came to England then, he should never go home again. And that, when he asked Hopkins how he knew this (l), he said, ex Deo habeo; It is revealed to me of God. And that Hopkins demanding afterward what children the king had had, he told the number; and that Hopkins should say thereupon, I pray God his issue continue; for that he feared God was not contented, because he made no restitution according to his father's will, charging the duke further to advise the king's council to make restitution. Further, That he told his chancellor those words, and at his return out of France, came to Hopkins again, and said, he had told him true: Also, that (another time) he came to Hopkins, together with his son Stafford, and the earl of Westmorland; and that Hopkins asked who he was? and thereupon should say, that some of his blood or name should prove great men. And that, after this, Hopkins should send to the duke, to pray him, according to his promise, to help their house (being at Henton in Somersetshire) to make their conduit; the ten pounds, formerly given by him, being spent. And more than this he confessed not. Notwithstanding which, when the indictment was openly read, the duke said, it was false, untrue, conspired, and forged (m), to bring him to his death; alledging (as he was an eloquent person) many reasons to falsify the indictment. The king's attorney, on the other side, producing the examinations, confessions, and proofs of witnesses; the duke hereupon desired the witnesses (n), which were Knevet, Gilbert, Delacour, and Hopkins, to be brought forth. These confirming their depositions, the duke was tried by his peers, (being a duke, a marquis, seven earls, and twelve barons) before the duke of Norfolk, who was for the time made lord high steward of England (a). They condemning him, the duke of Norfolk delivered his sentence, not without tears. To which he replied; My lord of Norfolk, you have said as a traitor should be said unto, but I was never one. But, my lords, I nothing malign for what you have done to me; but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I shall never sue to the king for life: howbeit, he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him, than I desire. And so I desire you, my lords, and all my fellows, to pray for me. Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower; where all the favour he received was a message from the king, declaring his sentence was mitigated so far, that, instead of receiving the death of a traitor, he should have only his head cut off. Thus ended the duke of Buckingham (b), much lamented by the people, (who libelled the cardinal for it, calling him Carnificis filium, Son of a Butcher.) as being thought rather criminal through folly and rash words, than any intention declared by overt-act against the king's person; and therefore not incapable of his mercy; which also it was thought would not have been denied, had he sued for it in fitting terms. But since at his arraignment, he did, as it were, disclaim his life, he would not obtrude it; and therefore only caused a letter of comfort to be written to the dutches, and lord Stafford. Yet the tragedy ended not so; for though George lord Abergavenny, after a few months imprisonment, was, through the king's favour, delivered; yet Hopkins, after a serious repentance that he had been an author of so much mischief, dyed of grief. And here I must observe, that together with this duke, that great place of high-constable of England remains extinguished, unless some extraordinary occasion revive it.

[Lord Herbert's state of the effect of the indictment, not being nearly so full as Stowe's, and there being also some further particulars in the latter, perhaps his account of the trial may be acceptable to some readers. The following extract from Stowe's Chronicle is therefore added.]

Extract from Stowe's Chronicle, Howes's ed. p. 510, to 513.

IN this meane time Edward duke of Buckingham was accused of high treason, wherefore the king directed his letters to the said duke, being at his manor of Thornebury in Gloucestershire, that incontinently he should come to his presence, which commandement the duke obeyed, and came to London, where hee was straight wayes arrested by sir Henry Marney capitaine of the gard, and conveyed to the Tower of London on the 16. of Aprill: before which time sir Gilbert Parke the dukes chancellor was taken, which had confessed matter of high treason, concerning the kings person. There was also attached one Nicholas Hopkins a monk of the order of Carthusians, being of Henton priory in Somersetshire, and John de la Court the dukes confessor, and others. These were prisoners in the Tower.

(c) After the apprehension of the duke, inquisitions were taken in divers shires of him, so that by the knights and gentlemen he was indicted of high treason for certaine words spoken by the said duke at Blechingly in Surrey, to George Nevill lord Burgavenny, and therewith was the same lord attached for concealement, and so likewise was the lord Montague, and both conveyed to the Tower: and sir Edward Nevill brother to the said lord of Burgavenny was forbidden the kings presence.

Moreover, in the Guildhall of London, before sir John Bruge knight, then maior of the same city, by an inquest, the said duke was indicted of divers points of high treason, as by the same inditement (which I have seene and read) it appeareth, inferring, that the said duke intending to exalt himselfe, and to usurpe the crowne, the royall power, and dignity of the realme of England, and to deprive the king thereof, that hee the sayde duke might take upon him the same against his allegiance, had the tenth day of March, in the second yeere of the kings raigne and at divers times before, and after, imagined and compassed the kings death and destruction at London, and at Thornebury in the county of Gloucester: and for the accomplishment of the wicked intent and purpose, the 24. of Aprill, in the fourth yeere of the kings raygne, he sent one of his chaplaines called John de la Court, unto the priory of Henton in Somersetshire, which was an house of Carthusian monkes, there to understand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the same house (who was vainely reputed by way of revelation to have foreknowledge of things to come) what should happen concerning this matter, which he had imagined: which monke, causing the said de la Court first to sweare unto him, not to disclose his words to any manner of person, but onely to the duke his master, therewith declared that his master the said duke should have all, willing him for the accomplishment of his purpose to seeke to winne the favour of the people. De la Court came backe with this answer, and told it to the duke at Thornebury the morrow after, being the 25. of Aprill. And on the 22. of July the same fourth yeere, the duke sent the same de la Court with letters unto the saide monke, to understand of him further of such matters, and the monke told to him againe for answer, that the duke should have all: and being asked as well now as before at the first time, how he knew this to be true, he saide by the grace of God, and with this answer, de la Court now also returning, declared the same unto the duke, on the 24. of July at Thornebury aforesaid. Moreover, the saide duke sent the same de la Court againe unto the said monke with his letters the 26. of Aprill, in the 5. yeere of the kings raigne, when the king was to take his journey into France, requiring to understand what should become of these warres, and whether the Scottis king should in the kings absence invade this realme or not. The monke among other things, for answer of these letters, sent the duke word that the king should have no issue male. Againe, the said duke the 20 day of Feb. in the 6. yeere of the kings raigne, being at Thornebury, spake these words unto Ralph earle of Westmerland: Well, there are two dukes created in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to succede to the crowne. After this the said duke on the 16. day of Aprill, in the said sixt yeere of the kings raigne, went in person unto the priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid monke Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that hee should bee king: whereunto the duke said, that if it chanced, hee would shew himselfe a just and right wise prince. The monke also told the duke that he knew this by revelation, and willed him in any wise to procure the love of the commons, the better to attayne his purposed intention. The duke the same time gave, and promised to give yeerely unto the saide priory 6. pound, therewith to buy a tunne of wine: and further promised to give unto the said priory in ready money twenty pounds, whereof ten pounds he gave in hand, towards the conveying the water unto the house by conduit. And to the saide monke Nicholas Hopkins, he gave at that present in reward three pound, and at one other time forty shillings, and at another time a marke, and at another time sixe shillings and eight-pence. After this, on the twentieth day of March, in the tenth yeere of the kings raigne, he came to the same priory, and estfoones had conference with the saide monke, to bee more fully informed by him in the matters above specified, at what time the monke also told him that he should be king, and the duke in talke tolde the monke, that he had done very well to binde his chaplaine John de la Court, under the seale of confession, to keepe secret such matters, for if the king should come to knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction. Likewise, the twentieth day of October, in the seventh yeere of the kings raigne, and at divers other times, as well before as after, the saide duke had sent his chancellor Robert Gilbert, chaplaine, unto London, there to buy certaine clothes of golde, silver, and velvets, every time so much as amounted to the value of three hundred pound, to the intent, that the saide duke might bestow the same, as well upon knights, esquires, and gentlemen of the kings house, and yeomen of his gard, as upon other the kings subjects, to winne their favours and friendships to assist him in his evill purpose: which clothes the saide Gilbert did buy, and brought the same to the said duke, who on the 20. day of January in the saide seventh yeere, and divers other dayes and yeeres before and after, did distribute, and give the same to certaine of the kings subjects, for the purpose before recited. Furthermore, the saide duke the tenth of July, in the tenth yeere of the kings raigne, and divers other dayes and times, as well before as after, did constitute more severall and particular offices in his castles, honors, lordships, and lands, than hee was accustomed to have, to the end they might bee assistant to him under colour of offices, to bring his evill purpose to passe. Moreover, the same duke sent to the king the tenth day of May, in the ninth yeere of his raigne, for licence to retaine any of the kings subjects, whom it should please him, dwelling within the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Somersetshire: and also, that he might at his pleasure convey divers armours, and habilements for warre into Wales, to the intent to use the same against the king, for the accomplishment of his naughty purpose, which was to destroy the king, and to usurpe the roial government and power to himselfe: which suite for licence to have retayners, and to convey such armours and habilements of war, the said Gilbert the twentieth day of May, in the sayde ninth yeere, and divers other dayes before and after at London, and East Grenewich did follow, labouring earnestly, both to the king and counsell, for obtaining of the same. And the twentieth day of July, in the said ninth yeere, the said duke sent the said Gilbert unto Henton aforesaid, to understand of the aforesaid monke Nicholas Hopkins what hee heard of him: and the monke sent him word, that before Christmas next there should be a change, and that the duke should have the rule and government of all England. And moreover, the twentieth day of February, in the eleventh yeere of the kings raigne, at Blechingly in Surrey, the sayde duke sayde unto the saide Robert Gilbert his chancellor, that he did expect and tarry for a time more convenient to atchieve his purpose, and that it might easily bee done, if the nobles of the realme would declare their mindes together: but some of them mistrusted and feared to shew their mindes. Hee sayde further the same time unto the saide Robert Gilbert, that whatsoever was done by the kings father, was done by wrong: and still the duke murmured against all that the king then presently raigning did. And further he said, that he knew himselfe to be so wicked a sinner, that hee wanted Gods favour, and therefore he knew, that whatsoever he tooke in hand against the king had the worse successe. And furthermore, the saide duke (to alienate the kings subjects mindes from dutifull obedience, towards him and his heires, the twentieth of September, in the first yeere of his raigne) being then at London, reported to Robert Gilbert, that he had a certaine writing, sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certaine act of parliament, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Somerset, one of the kings progenitors, was made legitimate. And further, that the said duke meant to have delivered the same writing unto king Henry the seventh, But (said he) I would not that I had so done for ten thousand pounds. And furthermore, the same duke the fourth day of November, in the eleventh yeere of the kings raygne, at East Grenewich in the county of Kent, said unto one Charles Knout esquire, after the king had reprooved the duke for retayning William Bulmer knight unto his service, that if he had perceived that he should have bin committed to the Tower, as he doubted he should have bene, he would have so wrought, that the principall doers therein should not have had cause of great rejoycing, for he would have played the part, which his father intended to have put in practise against king Richard the 3. at Salisbury, who made earnest suit to have come to the presence of the same king Richard, which suite if hee might have obtained, he having a knife secretly about him, would have thrust it into the body of king Richard, as he had made semblance to kneele downe before him:

dukedom, an object of jealousy even to his sovereign. Of other readers we beg pardon for rather exceeding what, in strictness, is the proper purpose of our annotations.

Since the foregoing note was written, we have been honoured with some information, which confirms our conjecture, that the barony of Stafford is not extinct. It seems, that the heirs of the last earl of Stafford but one, at his death, were three sisters, in consequence of which the barony became in abeyance. Mary, one of them, married count Rohan Chabot in France, but is now dead without issue. Her two sisters are both nuns in France. But on their deaths, which, as they are professed persons, is most likely to be without issue, the abeyance will probably cease; the present lady Jerminham, who is niece of the last earl of Stafford, being singly, as we are told, the next in the succession to the barony, and having several sons. We also understand, that part of the family estates is now in the possession of this latter lady, under the will of her cousin the countess of Rohan Chabot.]

IV. The Trial of JOHN FISHER, Bishop of Rochester, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Westminster, for High Treason, 17th June, 27 Hen. VIII. 1535.

[The reverend prelate, whose trial we now offer to the reader, was one of the most eminent sufferers in the reign of Henry the eighth, for opposing the king's divorce from his first queen, and his claim to the supremacy over the church of England. Opinions so averse to that prince's views and passions, involved the bishop in three different prosecutions. The first was on a charge of misprision of treason, in concealing the predictions against the king, made by the famous visionary Elizabeth Barton, known by the name of the Holy Maid of Kent; one of whose prophecies denounced, that, if the king did not desist from the divorce, but married again, he should not continue king more than a month after. For this offence the bishop was included in the act for punishing Elizabeth Barton and her accomplices; but was one of those, whom the act attainted of misprision of treason only. This act was passed in January 1533-4. See 25 Hen. VIII. c. 12. Rastall's edit. of Stat. The same parliament passed a law, which declared Henry's first marriage void, confirmed his marriage with Anna Bolleyn, made it treason to do or say any thing in derogation from the latter marriage, and required every person to take an oath to adhere to the contents of the statute, making it misprision of treason to refuse the oath. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 22. and 26 Hen. VIII. c. 2. It was for refusing the oath formed on the 25 Hen. VIII. that the bishop endured a second prosecution; for on that account the next parliament attainted him of misprision of treason, and deprived him of his bishoprick. See 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3. of private acts. The third prosecution, which terminated with the bishop's life, soon followed. The statute of the 26 Hen. VIII. annexed the title of supreme head of the church to the crown; and by another statute of the same parliament, it was made high treason by words or writing to attempt depriving the king of any of his titles. 26 Hen. VIII. c. 1, and 13. The operation of these two last statutes gave the opportunity of reaching the life of the bishop, who, as will appear from the following trial, having been ensnared into a denial of the king's being supreme head of the church, after the accession of that title, was therefore deemed to come within the succeeding statute, which made it treason to deny the king any of his titles.]

The following trial is extracted from a very scarce book, which was printed in 1655, with a title describing it as the life of bishop Fisher, by Dr. Thomas Bailey. But the real author, according to Bishop Tanner and others, was Dr. Richard Hall, who wrote several pieces in the reign of Elizabeth. Tann. Bibliothec. Britannic. Hibern. voce Hall Edwardus. In number 7049 of the Harleian MSS. at the British Museum, there is a life of bishop Fisher, which contains an account of his trial in the same words as the printed life.

It is proper to apprise the reader, that the book, whence we borrow the trial, was certainly written by a very zealous Roman Catholic, and that on other accounts he should be believed with caution. The writer throughout strenuously supports the Pope's claim of the supremacy. He relates a very improbable story of queen Anna Bolleyn, accusing her of great indignity to the head of bishop Fisher after his execution, and of even striking it. His book is also full of miracles; one of which is, that, though the bishop's head was parboiled, and the weather was very warm, when exhibited on London-Bridge, it not only continued fourteen days without wasting, but in that time daily grew so much fresher, that the bishop was never seen to look so well. However, so far as regards the relation of the trial, it must be confessed, that it carries with it great appearance of truth; and more especially seems to deserve credit, because the hard measure it represents the bishop to have experienced at his trial, so much resembles what we read in the trial of his eminent fellow-sufferer Sir Thomas More. Nor in these liberal and humane times can we imagine, that many will be found, however averse to bigotry and superstition, who will not concur in the sentiment, that the proceedings against both Sir Thomas and the bishop, were attended with extreme cruelty and injustice. This censure more particularly belongs to the bishop's case. His crime was simply an opinion against the king's supremacy, which he was urged to give by a message from his sovereign, who at the same time sent a promise of indemnity. If this was really so, which there seems too much reason to believe, the bishop's death was one of the worst passages which polluted the reign of Henry; because the injustice of the case was highly aggravated by superadding insidiousness and breach of faith. What an idea must we form of a prince, who could stoop to devise such unworthy means to accomplish his cruel purpose? What must we think of the subject, who could be so void of feeling, as to become the instrument of such perfidy? What must we conceive of the times, in which judges and juries could be found to give the form and colour of justice of such bad proceedings?

AFTER this good bishop was recovered to some better strength, by the help of his physicians, and that he was more able to be carried abroad, he was on Thursday the 17. of June, brought to the King's Bench at Westminster, from the Tower, with a huge number of halberds, bills, and other weapons about him, and the ax of the Tower born before him with the edge from him, as the manner is; and because he was not yet so well recovered, that he was able to walk by land all the way on foot, he rode part of the way on horseback in a black cloth gown, and the rest he was carried by water, for that he was not well able to ride through for weakness. As soon as he was come to Westminster, he was there presented at the barre before the commissioners, being all set ready in their places against his coming, whose names were these: Sir Thomas Audley, knight, lord chancellor of England; Charles duke of Suffolk; Henry earl of Cumberland; Thomas earl of Wiltshire; Thomas Cromwell secretary; Sir John Fitz-James chief justice of England; Sir John Baldwin chief justice of the Common Pleas; Sir William Pawlet; Sir Richard Lytler chief baron of the Exchequer; Sir John Port, Sir John Spilman, and Sir Walter Luke, late justices of the King's Bench; and Sir Anthony Fitzherbert one of the justices of the Common Pleas. Being thus presented before these commissioners, he was commanded, by the name of John Fisher late of Rochester, clerk, otherwise called John Fisher bishop of Rochester, to hold up his hand, which he did, with a most cheerful countenance and rare constancy. Then was his indictment read, which was very long and full of words, but the effect of it was thus. That he maliciously, treacherously, and falsely, had said these words, The King, our sovereign lord, is not supreme head in the earth of the church of England: and being read to the end, it was asked him, whether he was guilty of this treason, or no? Whereunto he pleaded, not guilty. Then was a jury of twelve men (being free-holders of Middlesex) called to try this issue, whose names were these: Sir Hugh Vaughan knight, Sir Walter Langford knight, Thomas Burdage, John Nudgate, William Browne, John Hewes, Jasper Leak, John Palmer, Richard Henry Young, Henry Lodisman, John Elrington, and George Heveningham, esquires. These twelve men being sworn to try whether the prisoner were guilty of this treason or no, at last came forth to give evidence against him Mr. Rich, the secret and close messenger that passed between the king and him, as ye have read before, who openly, in the presence of the judges, and all the people there assembled, deposed and swore, that he heard the prisoner say in plaine words, within the Tower of London, that he believed in his conscience, and by his learning he assuredly knew, that the king neither was, nor by right, could be supreme head in earth of the church of England. When this blessed father heard the accusations of this most wretched and false person, contrary to his former oath and promise, he was not a little astonished thereat; wherefore he said to him in this manner: Mr. Rich, I cannot but mervaille to hear you come in, and beare witness against me of these words, knowing in what secret manner you came to me: but suppose I so said unto you, yet in that saying I committed no treason; for upon what occasion, and for what cause it might be said, your self doth know right well; and therefore being now urged (said he) by this occasion, to open somewhat of this matter, I shall desire my lords, and others here, to take a little patience in hearing what I shall say for myself.

This man (meaning Mr. Rich) came to me from the king, as he said on a secret message with commendations from his grace, declaring at large, what a good opinion his majesty had of me, and how sorry he was of my trouble, with many more words than are here needfull to be recited, because they tended so much to my praise, as I was not only ashamed to hear them, but also knew right well that I could no way deserve them. At last he broke with me of the matter of the king's supremacy, lately granted unto him by act of parliament, to the which he said, Although all the bishops in the realme have consented, except your self alone, and also the whole court of parliament, both spirituall and temporall, except a very few; yet he told me, that the king, for better satisfaction of his owne conscience, had sent him unto me in this secret manner, to know my full opinion in the matter, for the great affiance he had in me more than any other. He added further, that if I would herein frankly and freely advertise his majesty my knowledge, that upon certificate of my misliking, he was very like to retract much of his former doings, and make satisfaction for the same, in case I should so advertise him. When I had heard all this message, and considered a little upon his words, I put him in minde of the new act of parliament, which standing in force as it doth against all them that shall directly say, or do any thing that is against it, might thereby endanger me very much, in case I should utter unto him any thing that were offensive against the law. To that he told me, that the king would him to assure me on his honour, and in the word of a king, that whatever I should say unto him by this his secret messenger, I should abide no danger, no perill for it, neither that any advantage should be taken against me for the same, no, although my words were never so directly against the statute, seeing it was but a declaration of my minde secretly to him, as to his owne person: and for the messenger himselfe, he gave me his faithfull promise that he would never utter my words in this matter to any man living, but to the king alone. Now therefore, my lords, quoth he, seeing it pleased the king's majesty to send to me thus secretly under the pretence of plaine and true meaning, to know my poore advice and opinion in these his weighty and great affaires, which I most gladly was and ever will be willing to send him in; methinks it is very hard in justice to heare the messenger's accusation, and to allow the same as a sufficient testimony against me in case of treason. To this the messenger made no direct answer, but (neither denying his words as false, nor confessing them as true) said, that whatever he had said unto him on the king's behalf, he said no more than his majesty commanded; And, said he, if I had said to you in such sort as you have declared, I would gladly know what discharge this is to you in law against his majesty, for so directly speaking against the statute; whereat some of the judges taking quick hold one after another, said, that this message, or promise from the king to him, neither could, nor did by rigour of the law, discharge him; but in so declaring of his minde and conscience against the supremacy, yea though it were at the king's own commandment or request, he committed treason by the statute, and nothing can discharge him from death but the king's pardon.

This good father perceiving the small account made of his words, and the favourable credit given to his accuser, might then easily finde in which doore the wind blew. Wherefore directing his speeches to the lords his judges, he said, Yet I pray you, my lords, consider, that by all equity, justice, worldly honesty, and courteous dealing, I cannot (as the case standeth) be directly charged therewith as with treason, though I had spoken the words indeed, the same being not spoken maliciously, but in the way of advice and counsell, when it was requested of me by the king himself; and that favour the very words of the statute do give me, being made onely against such as shall maliciously gainsay the king's supremacy, and none other: wherefore, although by rigour of law, you may take occasion thus to condemn me, yet I hope you cannot finde law, except you adde rigour to that law, to cast me downe, which herein I hope I have not deserved. To which it was answered by some of the judges, that the word maliciously is but a superfluous and void word; for if a man speak against the king's supremacy by any manner of meanes, that speaking is to be understood, and taken in law as maliciously.

My lords, said he, if the law be so understood, then it is a hard exposition, and (as I take it) contrary to the meaning of them that made the law. But then let me demand this question, whether a single testimony of one man may be admitted as sufficient to prove me guilty of treason for speaking these words, or no? and whether my answer, negatively, may not be accepted against his affirmative, to my avails and benefit, or no? To that the judges and lawyers answered (that being the king's case) it rested much in the conscience and discretion of the jury; and as they upon the evidence given before them shall finde it; you are either to be acquitted, or else by judgement to be condemned. The jury having heard all this simple evidence, departed (according to the order) into a secret place, there to agree upon the verdict; but before they went from the place, the case was so aggravated to them by my lord chancellour, making it so hainous and dangerous a treason, that they easily perceived what verdict they must returne; otherways heap such danger upon their owne heads, as none of them were willing to undergo. Some other of the commissioners charged this most reverend man with obstinacy and singularity, alledging, that he being but one man, did presumptuously stand against that, which was in the great councill of parliament agreed upon, and finally was consented unto by all the bishops of this realme, saving himselfe alone. But to that he answered, that indeed he might well be accounted singular, if he alone should stand in this matter (as they said); but having on his part the rest of the bishops in Christendome, far surmounting the number of the bishops of England, he said they could not justly account him singular. And having on his part all the Catholicks and bishops of the world from Christ's ascension, till now, joynd with the whole consent of Christ's universall church, I must needs, said he, account mine own part farre the furer: and as for obstinacy, which is likewise objected against me, I have no way to cleare my self thereof, but my owne solemne word and promise to the contrary, if you please to believe it, or else, if that will not serve, I am here ready to confirme the same by my oath. Thus in effect he answered their objections, though with many more words, both wisely and profoundly uttered, and that with a merveilous, couragious, and rare constancy, insomuch as many of his hearers, yea some of his judges, lamented so grievously, that their inward sorrow in all sides, was expressed by the outward teares in their eyes, to perceive such a famous and reverend man in danger to be condemned to a cruell death, upon so weak evidence given by such an accuser, contrary to all faith and promise of the king himself. But all pity, mercy, and right, being set aside, rigour, cruelty, and malice, took place; for the twelve men being shortly returned from their consultation, verdict was given that he was guilty of the treason, which although they thus did, upon the menacing and threatening words of the commissioners, the king's learned councill, yet was it (no doubt) full fore against their conscience, as some of them would after report, to their dying daies, onely for safety of their goods and lives, which they were well assured to lose, in case they had acquitted him. After the verdict thus given by the twelve men, the lord chancellour commanding silence to be kept, said unto the prisoner in this sort, My lord of Rochester, you have been here arraigned of high treason, and putting your selfe to the triall of twelve men, you have pleaded not guilty, and they notwithstanding have found you guilty in their conscience; wherefore, if you have any more to say for your selfe, you are now to be heard, or else to receive judgement according to the order and course of law. Then said this blessed father againe, Truly, my lord, if that which I have before spoken be not sufficient, I have no more to say, but onely to desire Almighty God to forgive them that have thus condemned me, for I think they know not what they have done. Then my lord chancellour, framing himselfe to a solemnity in countenance, proclaimed sentence of death upon him, in manner and forme following: You shall be led to the place from whence you came, and from thence shall be drawn through the city to the place of execution at Tyborne, where your body shall be hanged by the neck, half alive you shall be cut down and throwne to the ground, your bowels to be taken out of your body before you, being alive, your head to be smitten off, and your body to be divided into four quarters, and after your head and quarters to be set up, where the king shall appoint; and God have mercy upon your soule.

After the pronouncing of this cruell sentence, the lieutenant of the Tower, with his band of men, stood ready to receive and carry him back again to his prison. Before his departure he desired audience of the commissioners for a few words, which being granted, he said thus in effect: My lords, I am here condemned before you of high treason, for deniall of the king's supremacy over the church of England, but by what order of justice I leave to God, who is the searcher both of the king's majesty's conscience and yours. Nevertheless, being found guilty (as it is termed) I am, and must be, contented with all that God shall send, to whose will I wholly referre and submit myselfe. And now to tell you more plainly my minde, touching this matter of the king's supremacy, I think indeed, and alwaies have thought, and do now softly affirm, that his grace cannot justly claime any such supremacy over the church of God, as he now taketh upon him, neither hath it ever been seen or heard of, that any temporall prince, before his daies, hath presumed to that dignity. Wherefore if the king will now adventure himselfe in proceeding in this strange and unwonted case, no doubt but he shall deeply incurre the grievous displeasure of Almighty God, to the great damage of his owne soule, and of many others, and to the utter ruine of this realme, committed to his charge, whereof will ensue some sharp punishment at his hand's wherefore I pray God his grace may remember himselfe in time, and hearken to good counsell, for the preservation of himselfe and his realme, and the quietnesse of all Christendome. Which words being ended, he was conveyed back againe to the Tower of London, part on foot, and part on horseback, with a number of men, bearing holberts and other weapons about him, as was before at his coming to arraignment: and when he was come to the Tower-gate, he turned him back to all his traine that had thus conducted him forward and backward, and said unto them, My masters, I thank you all for the great labour and paines you have taken with me this day: I am not able to give you any thing in recompence, for I have nothing left; and therefore I pray you accept in good part my hearty thanks. And this he spake with so lusty a courage, so amiable a countenance, and with so fresh and lively a colour, as he seemed rather to have come from some great feast, or banquet, than from his arraignment, shewing by all his gesture, and outward countenance, nothing else but joy and gladnesse.

Thus being after his condemnation, the space of three or four daies, in his prison, he occupied himselfe in continuall prayer most fervently; and although he looked daily for death, yet could ye not have perceived him one whit dismayed thereat, neither in word nor countenance, but still continued his former trade of constancy and patience, and that rather with a more joyfull cheere and free minde than ever he had done before, which appeared well by this chance that I will tell you: There hapned a false rumour to rise suddenly among the people, that he should be brought to his execution by a certain day; whereupon his cook, that was wont to dress his dinner, and carry it daily unto him, hearing, among others, of his execution, dressed him no dinner at all that day; wherefore at the cook's next repaire unto him, he demanded the cause why he brought him not his dinner as he was wont to doe: Sir, said the cook, it was commonly talked all the towne over, that you should have died that day, and therefore I thought it but vaine to dresse any thing for you. Well, said he merrily unto him againe, for all that report thou feest me yet alive, and therefore whatsoever newes thou shalt heare of me hereafter, let me no more lack my dinner, but make it ready as thou art wont to do; and if thou see me dead when thou comest, then eat it thy selfe: but I promise thee, if I be alive, I minde, by God's grace, to eat never a bit the lesse.

Thus while this blessed bishop lay daily expecting the houre of his death, the king (who no lesse desired his death than himselfe looked for it) caused at last a writ of execution to be made, and brought to sir Edmond Walsingham lieutenant of the Tower. But where by his judgement at Westminster, he was condemned (as ye have read before) to drawing, hanging, and quartering, as traitors alwaies use to be, yet was he spared from that cruell execution. Wherefore order was taken that he should be led no further than Tower-hill, and there to have his head struck off.

After the lieutenant had received this bloody writ, he called unto him certaine persons, whose service and presence were to be used in that businesse, commanding them to be ready against the next day in the morning: and because that was very late in the night, and the prisoner asleep, he was loath to discease him of his rest for that time; and so in the morning before five of the clock, he came to him in his chamber in the Bell-tower, finding him yet asleep in his bed, and waked him, shewing him that he was come to him on a message from the king; and after some circumstance used, with perswasion that he should remember himself to be an old man, and that for age he could not, by course of nature, live long; he told him at last, that he was come to signifie unto him, that the king's pleasure was he should suffer death that forenoone. Well (quoth this blessed father) if this be your errand, you bring me no great newes, for I have long time looked for this message: I most humbly thank his majesty, that it pleaseth him to rid me from all this worldly businesse; and I thank you also for your tidings. But I pray you, Mr. Lieutenant (said he) when is mine houre that I must go hence? Your houre (said the lieutenant) must be nine of the clock. And what houre is it now (said he)? It is now about five (said the lieutenant). Well then (said he) let me by your patience, sleep an houre or two, for I have slept very little this night: And yet to tell you the truth, not for any feare of death (I thank God) but by reason of my great infirmity and weaknesse. The king's further pleasure is (said the lieutenant), that you should use as little speech as may be, especially any thing touching his majesty, whereby the people should have any cause to think of him or his proceedings otherwise than well. For that (said he) you shall see me order myself, as, by God's grace, neither the king, nor any man else, shall have occasion to mislike my words. With which answer the lieutenant departed from him; and so the prisoner falling againe to rest, slept soundly two houres and more. And after he was waked, he called to his man to help him up: but first of all he commanded him to take away the shirt of haire (which accustomedly he wore on his back) and to convey it privily out of the house, and instead thereof to lay him forth a clean white shirt, and all the best apparrell he had, as cleanly brushed as may be: and as he was arraying himselfe, his man perceiving in him more curiosity and care for the fine and cleanly wearing of his apparrell that day, than ever was wont to be before, demanded of him what this sodain change meant, saying that his lordship knew well enough he must put off all againe within two houres, and lose it. What of that (said he)? Doeft thou not mark, that this is our marriage-day, and that it behoveth us therefore to use more cleanlinesse for solemnity of the marriage-sake?

About nine of the clock the lieutenant came againe to his prisoner, and finding him almost ready, said that he was come now for him. I will wait upon you straight (said he) as fast as this thin body of mine will give me leave. Then said he to his man, Reach me my furred tippet to put about my neck. O my Lord, said the lieutenant, what need you be so carefull for your health for this little time, being (as your self knoweth) not much above an houre? I think no otherwise (said this blessed father), but yet in the mean time I will keep my selfe as well as I can, till the very time of my execution: for I tell you truth, though I have (I thank our Lord) a very good desire, and a willing minde, to die at this present, and so trust of his infinite mercy and goodnesse he will continue it, yet will I not willingly hinder my health, in the mean time, one minute of an houre, but still prolong the same as long as I can, by such reasonable waies and meanes as Almighty God hath provided for me. With that taking a little book in his hand, which was a N. Test. lying by him, he made a crosse on his forehead, and went out of his prison-doore with the lieutenant, being so weak that he was scarce able to go downe staires: wherefore at the staires foot he was taken up in a chaire between two of the lieutenants men, and carried to the Tower-gate, with a great number of weapons about him, to be delivered to the sheriffs of London for execution. And as they were come to the uttermost precinct of the liberty of the Tower, they rested there with him a space, till such time as one was sent before to know in what readinesse the sheriffs were to receive him: during which space he rose out of his chaire; and standing on his feet leane his shoulders to the wall, and lifting his eyes towards heaven, opened his little book in his hand, and said, O Lord, this is the last time that ever I shall open this book; let some comfortable place now chance unto me, whereby I thy poore servant may glorifie thee in this my last houre; and with that, looking into the book, the first thing that came to his sight were these words, Hæc est autem vita æterna, ut cognoscant te, solum verum Deum, & quem misisti Jesum Christum. Ego te glorificavi super terram, opus consummavi quod dedisti mihi ut faciam: Et nunc clarifica tu me, Pater, apud te ipsum claritate quam habui priusquam, &c. and with that he shut the book together, and said, Here is even learning enough for me to my live's end. And so the sheriffs being ready for him, he was taken up again among certain of the sheriffs men, with a new and much greater company of weapons than was before, and carried to the scaffold on the Tower-hill, otherwise called East-Smithfield, himselfe praying all the way, and recording upon the words which he before had read; and when he was come to the foot of the scaffold, they that carried him offered to help him up the staires. But then said he, Nay, masters, seeing I am come so farre, let me alone, and ye shall see me shift for my self well enough; and so went up the staires without any helpe, so lively, that it was mervaille to them that knew before of his debility and weaknesse; but as he was mounting up the staires, the south-east sun shined very bright in his face, whereupon he said to himselfe these words, lifting up his hands, Accedite ad eum, & illuminamini, & facies vestra non confundetur. By that time he was upon the scaffold it was about ten of the clock; where the executioner being ready to do his office, kneeled downe to him (as the fashion is) and asked him forgiveness: I forgive thee (said he) with all my heart, and I trust thou shalt see me overcome this storme lustily. Then was his gown and tippet taken from him, and he stood in his doublet and hose, in sight of all the people, whereof was no small number assembled to see this execution. There was to be seen a long, lean, and slender body, having on it little other substance besides skin and bones, inso much as most of the beholders mervailed to see a living man so farre consumed, for he seemed a very image of death, and as it were death in a man's shape, using a man's voice; and therefore it was thought the king was something cruell to put such a man to death, being so neere his end, and to kill that which was dying already, except it were for pity sake to rid him of his pain.

When the innocent and holy man was come upon the scaffold, he spake to the people in effect as followeth:

Christian people, I am come hither to die for the faith of Christ's holy Catholique church; and I thank God hitherto my stomach hath served me very well thereunto, so that yet I have not feared death; wherefore I desire you all to help and assist with your prayers, that at the very point and instant of death's stroke, I may in that very moment stand stedfast, without fainting in any one point of the Catholique faith, free from any fear. And I beseech Almighty God of his infinite goodnesse, to save the king and this realme, and that it may please him to hold his hand over it, and send the king good counsel.

These or the like words he spake, with such a cheerefull countenance, such a stout and constant courage, and such a reverend gravity, that he appeared to all men not only void of feare, but also glad of death. Besides this, he uttered his words so distinctly, and with so loud and cleare a voice, that the people were astonished thereat, and noted it for a miraculous thing, to heare so plain and audible a voice come from so weak and sickly an old body; for the youngest man in that presence, being in good and perfect health, could not have spoken to be better heard and perceived, than he was. Then after these few words by him uttered, he kneeled down on both his knees, and said certain prayers, among which one was the hymn of Te Deum Laudamus, to the end, and the psalm of In te Domine Speravi. Then came the executioner, and bound a handkerchief about his eyes; and so this holy father lifting up his hands and heart towards heaven, said a few prayers, which were not long, but fervent, and devout: which being ended, he laid his head down on the middle of a little block, where the executioner being ready with a sharp and heavy ax cut afunder his slender neck at one blow, which bled so abundantly, that many wondered to see so much blood issue out of so slender and leane a body.

V. The Trial of WILLIAM Lord DACRES of the North, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward, 9th July, 26 Hen. VIII. 1535.

[This trial is taken notice of in most of the old chronicles, and also in one of the Harleian manuscripts; but Hall's is the book, from which the others transcribe. We therefore present our readers with an extract from him, to which we add one from lord Herbert's Henry the eighth, as the latter is more explanatory. But both accounts are so short, that we fear they will be deemed too trivial for insertion. Against such a censure, we have only to say, that it is the fact of lord Dacres's acquittal, which was our chief inducement for admitting the mention of this trial into the collection. In antient times, more especially in the reign of Henry the eighth, when, from the devastation made by the civil wars amongst the ancient nobility, and other causes disturbing the ballance of the constitution, the influence of the crown was become exorbitant, and seems to have been in its zenith, to be accused of a crime against the state and to be convicted were almost the same thing. The one was usually so certain a consequence of the other, that, exclusively of lord Dacres's case in the reign of Henry the eighth, and that of sir Nicholas Throckmorton in his daughter Mary's, the examples to the contrary are very rare. But those which do occur ought to be remembered in justice to the times they belong to, as a sort of ballance for the reproach deservedly cast upon them, for the culpable facility of condemnation so conspicuous in most other instances.]

Extract from Hall's Hen. VIII. p. 225.

THE nyynth day of July was the lorde Dacres of the north arraigned at Westminster of high treason, where the duke of Norffolke late as judge and high steward of England. The sayd lorde Dacres beyng brought to the barre with the axe of the Tower before him, after his inditement red, not only improved the sayd inditement as false and maliciously devised against him, and answered every part and matter herin contained, but also so manly, wittily, and directly confuted his accufors, whiche there were ready to avouche their accusacions, that to their great shames, and to his great honor, he was found that day by his peres not giltye, whiche undoubtedly the commons excedyngly joyed and rejoyced of, infomuche as there was in the hall at those woordes, not giltye, the greatest shoute and crye of joy that the like no man livyng may remembre that ever he heard.

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. in 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d. edit. p. 177.

THE lord Dacres of the north (July 9, as our historians have it) was arraigned at Westminster of high treason, but as the principal witnesses produced against him by his accusers (sir Ralph Fenwick and one Musgrave) were some mean and provoked Scottish men, so his peers acquitted him, as believing they not only spoke maliciously, but might be easily suborned against him, as one who (having been warden of the Marches) by frequent inroads had done much harm in that country. And thus escaped that lord to his no little honour, and his judges, as giving example thereby how persons of great quality, brought to their tryal, are not so necessarily condemned, but that they sometimes may escape, when they obtain an equal hearing.

As further as to this case see. Rep. 56. where a report of some points, which arose in it, are given from a very report of the judge Spelman.

VI. The Trials of Queen Anna Boleyn and her Brother Lord Viscount Rochforde, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward; and also of Henry Norrys, Marke Smeton, William Breton, and Sir Francis Weston, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer for the same Offence, in May, 28 Hen. VIII. 1536.

[The earliest account we have of these proceedings is in Hall's Chronicle; but, except the queen's speech at her death, it scarce mentions more, than that she and the rest were arrested, accused, tried, and executed. Hall's Hen. VIII. fo. 227, b. Grafton copies verbatim from Hall, except omitting this circumstance, that the king the day after her death wore white for mourning. Graft. 1228. Fox, in his Martyrology, is chiefly occupied in vindicating the queen's virtue, and defending the succession to the crown through her. 2 Fox Martyr. ed. 1610, p. 987. In Hollinghead, the account is more full than Hall. 3 Hollingh. 940. Stow, who follows next, chiefly borrows from Hollinghead. Stow Chron. Howe's ed. 572. Some additional circumstances are noticed by Speed. Speed's Chron. 1014. Lord Herbert is still more particular in his narrative. Herbert's Hen. VIII. in Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d. ed. vol. 2. p. 193. There is also a short account of this trial amongst the Harleian manuscripts at the British Museum, which seems to have been compiled out of the printed chronicles. But the most copious relations of this singular transaction, are in Heylin and Burnet; more especially the latter, who was aided not only by some original letters, but by two other cotemporary manuscripts of great authority, one being a common-place-book of judge Spelman, the other an account by Anthony Anthony, a surveyor of the ordnance of the Tower. Heyl. Reformat. 263. 1 Burn. Reform. After Burnet's book, our learned annalist Strype favoured the world with some additional matter. 1 Strype's Memor. 279.—What we shall lay before the reader, will consist, first of the Harleian manuscript, secondly of extracts from Burnet, and thirdly of an extract from Strype; which together will, as we apprehend, nearly comprize every circumstance deserving of notice throughout the whole affair.]

Extract from Harleian manuscript.

THOMAS duke of Norfolk, lord high steward of England, att the tryall of queene Anne Boleyn, who on the 15th day of May, in the 28th year of the raigne of kinge Henry the eight, was arraigned in the Tower of London, on a scaffold for that purpose made in the kings hall, the duke of Norfolk sittinge under the cloath of state, the lord chauncellor on his right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on his lefte, the earle of Surrey, sonne of the duke of Norfolk, sittinge directly before his father, a degree lower, as earle marshall of England, to whome were adjoynd 26 other peeres, and among them the queenes father (a), by whome shee was to be tryed. The kings commission beinge read, the accusers gave in their evidence, and the wittneses were produced; the queene sittinge in her chaire made for her, (whether in regard of any infirmity, or out of honor permitted to the wife of the soveraigne) haveinge an excellent quick witt, and beinge a ready speaker, did so anfwere to all obiections, that had the peeres given in their verdict accordinge to the expectation of the assembly, shee had beene acquitted: but they (among whome the duke of Suffolke the kings brother-in-law was cheife, and wholly applyinge himselfe to the kings humor) pronounced her guilty; whereupon the duke of Norfolk, bound to proceed accordinge to the verdict of the peeres, condemned her to death, either by beinge burned in the Tower-Greene, or beheaded, as his majestie in his pleasure should thinke fitt.

The sentence beinge denounced the court arose, and she was conveyed back againe to her chamber, the lady Boleyn her aunt, and the lady Kingston, wife to the constable of the Tower, only attendinge her.

And on the 19th of May, the queene was brought to the place of execution in the Greene within the Tower, some of the nobility and company of the cittie beinge admitted rather to see wittneses then spectators of her death, to whome the queene (haveinge ascended the scaffold) spake on this manner.

Freinds and good Christian people, I am here in your presense to suffer death, whereto I acknowledge my selfe adjudged by the lawe, how iustly I will not say; I intend not an accusation of any one. I beseech the Almighty to preserve his majestie longe to raigne over you, a more gentle or mild prince never swayed septer; his bounty and clemency towards mee I am sure hath beene speciall; if any one intend an inquisitive survey of my actions, I intreate him to judge favourably of mee, and not rashly to admitt any censorious conceit. And see I bid the world farewell, beseeching you to commend mee in your prayers to God.

(a) [The queen's father was not one of her judges. See page 12, and the note there.]

This

This speech she uttered with a smiling countenance; then kneeling down, with a fervent spirit said: To Jesus Christ I commend my soule, Lord Jesu receive my soule; and repeatinge these words very often, suddenly the stroke of the sword sealed the debt that she owed unto death.

Nowe the court of England was like a stage, whereon are represented the vicissitudes of ever various fortunes; for within one and the same moneth, that saw queene Anne flourishing, accused, condemned, executed, and another assumed into her place both of bedd and honour. The first of May (yt seemeth) she was informed against, the second imprisoned, the fifteenth condemned, the seaventeenth deprived of her brother and friends, who suffered in her cause, and the nyneteenth executed. On the twentieth the kinge married Jane Seimour, who on the nyne and twentieth was publicly shewed queene.

Extract from Burnet's Reformation, vol. 1. p. 196.

IN January, 1536, the queen brought forth a dead son. This was thought to have made ill impressions on the king: and that, as he concluded from the death of his sons by the former queen, that the marriage was displeasing to God; so he might upon this misfortune, begin to make the like judgment of this marriage. Sure enough the Popish party were earnestly set against the queen, looking on her as the great supporter of heresie. And at that time, Fox then bishop of Hereford was in Germany at Smalcald, treating a league with the Protestant princes, who insisted much on the Augsburg confession. There were many conferences between Fox and doctor Barnes, and some others, with the Lutheran divines, for accommodating the differences between them, and the thing was in a good forwardness. All which was imputed to the queen. Gardiner was then ambassador in France, and wrote earnestly to the king, to dissuade him from entering into any religious league with these princes: for that would alienate all the world from him, and dispose his own subjects to rebel. The king thought the German princes and divines should have submitted all things to his judgment, and had such an opinion of his own learning, and was so puffed up with the flattering praises that he daily heard, that he grew impatient of any opposition, and thought that his dictates should pass for oracles. And because the Germans would not receive them so, his mind was alienated from them.

But the duke of Norfolk at court, and Gardiner beyond sea, thought there might easily be found a mean to accommodate the king, both with the emperor and the pope, if the queen were once out of the way; for then he might freely marry any one whom he pleased, and that marriage, with the male issue of it, could not be disputed: whereas, as long as the queen lived, her marriage, as being judged null from the beginning, could never be allowed by the court of Rome, or any of that party. With these reasons of state, others of affection concurred. The queen had been his wife three years; but at this time he entertained a secret love for Jane Seimour, who had all the charms both of beauty and youth in her person; and her humor was tempered, between the severe gravity of queen Katharine, and the gay pleasantness of queen Ann. The queen, perceiving this alienation of the king's heart, used all possible arts to recover that affection, of whose decay she was sadly sensible. But the success was quite contrary to what she designed. For the king saw her no more with those eyes, which she had formerly captivated; but grew jealous, and ascribed these cares to some other criminal affections, of which he began to suspect her. This being one of the most memorable passages of this reign, I was at more than ordinary pains to learn all I could concerning it, and have not only seen a great many letters that were writ by those that were set about the queen, and caught every thing that fell from her, and sent it to court, but have also seen an account of it, which the learned Spelman, who was a judge at that time, writ with his own hand in his common-place book, and another account of it writ by one Anthony Anthony a surveyour of the ordnance of the Tower. From all which I shall give a just and faithful relation of it, without concealing the least circumstance, that may either seem favourable or unfavourable to her.

She was of a very cheerful temper, which was not always limited within the bounds of exact decency and discretion. She had rallied some of the king's servants more than became her. Her brother, the lord Rochford, was her friend as well as brother; but his spiteful wife was jealous of him: and being a woman of no sort of virtue, (as will appear afterwards by her serving queen Katherine Howard in her beastly practices, for which she was attainted and executed,) she carried many stories to the king, or some about him, to persuade, that there was a familiarity between the queen and her brother, beyond what so near a relation could justify. All that could be said for it, was only this: that he was once seen leaning upon her bed, which bred great suspicion. Henry Norris, that was groom of the stole, Weston, and Brereton, that were of the king's privy-chamber, and one Mark Smeton, a musician, were all observed to have much of her favour; and their zeal in serving her was thought too warm and diligent to flow from a less active principle than love. Many circumstances were brought to the king, which working upon his aversion to the queen, together with his affection to mistress Seimour, made him conclude her guilty. Yet somewhat which himself observed, or fancied, at a tilting at Greenwich, is believed to have given the crisis to her ruin. It is said, that he spied her let her handkerchief fall to one of her gallants to wipe his face, being hot after a course. Whether she dropt it carelessly, or of design; or whether there be any truth in that story, the letters concerning her fall, making no mention of it, I cannot determine; for Spelman makes no mention of it, and gives a very different account of the discovery in these words. As for the evidence of this matter, it was discovered by the lady Wingfield, who had been a servant to the queen, and becoming on a sudden infirm some time before her death, did swear this matter to one of her and here unluckily the rest of the page is torn off. By this it seems, there was no legal evidence against the queen, and that it was but a witness at second hand, who deposed what they heard the lady Wingfield swear. Who this person was we know not, nor in what temper of mind the lady Wingfield might be, when she swore it. The safest sort of forgery, to one whose conscience can swallow it, is to lay a thing on a dead person's name, where there is no fear of discovery before the great day: and when it was understood that the queen had lost the king's heart, many, either out of their zeal to popery, or design to make their fortune, might be easily induced to carry a story of this nature. And this it seems was that which was brought to the king at Greenwich, who did thereupon immediately return to Whitehall, it being the 1st of May. The queen was immediately restrained to her chamber, the other five were also seized on: but none of them would confess any thing, but Mark Smeton, as to any actual thing, so Cromwell writ. Upon this they were carried to the Tower. The poor queen was in a sad condition; she must not only fall under the king's displeasure, but be both defamed and destroyed at once. At first she smiled and carried it cheerfully; and said, she believed the king did this only to prove her. But when she saw it was in earnest; she desired to have the sacrament in her closet, and expressed great devotion, and seemed to be prepared for death.

The surprize and confusion she was in, raised fits of the mother, which those about her did not seem to understand: but three or four letters, which were writ concerning her to court, say, that she was at some times very devout, and cried much; and of a sudden would burst out in laughter, which are evident signs of vapours. When she heard that those who were accused with her, were sent to the Tower, she then concluded her self lost; and said, she should be sent thither next; and talked idly, saying, "That if her bishops were about the king, they would all speak for her. She also said, that she would be a saint in heaven, for she had done many good deeds; and that there should be no rain, but heavy judgments on the land, for what they were now doing to her." Her enemies had now gone too far, not to destroy her. Next day she was carried to the Tower, and some lords, that met her on the river, declared to her what her offences were. Upon which, she made deep protestations of her innocence, and begged leave to see the king; but that was not to be expected. When she was carried into the Tower, she fell down on her knees, and prayed God to help her, as she was "not guilty of the thing for which she was accused." That same day the king wrote to Cranmer, to come to Lambeth; but ordered him not to come into his presence. Which was procured by the queen's enemies, who took care, that one who had such credit with the king, should not come at him, till they had fully persuaded him that she was guilty. Her uncles lady, the lady Boleyn, was appointed to lye in the chamber with her. Which she took very ill; for, upon what reason I know not, she had been in very ill terms with her. She engaged her into much discourse, and studied to draw confessions from her. Whatsoever she said, was presently sent to the court. And a woman full of vapours, was like enough to tell every thing that was true, with a great deal more; for persons in that condition, not only have no command of themselves, but are apt to say any thing that comes in their fancy.

The duke of Norfolk, and some of the king's council, were with her; but could draw nothing from her, though they made her believe, that Norris and Mark had accused her. But when they were gone, she fell down on her knees and wept, and prayed often, Jesu have mercy on me; and then fell a-laughing: when that fit was over, she desired to have the sacrament still by her, that she might cry for mercy. And she said to the lieutenant of the Tower, she was as clear of the company of all men, as to sin, as she was clear from him; and that she was the king's true wedded wife. And she cried out, "O Norris, hast thou accused me? Thou art in the Tower with me, and thou and I shall dye together; and Mark, so shall thou too." She apprehended they were to put her in a dungeon; and sadly bemoaned her own, and her mother's misery; and asked them, whether she must dye without justice. But they told her, the poorest subjects had justice, much more would she have it. The same letter says, that Norris had not accused her; and that he said to her almoner, that he could swear for her, she was a good woman. But she being made believe that he had accused her, and not being then so free in her thoughts, as to consider that ordinary artifice for drawing out confessions, told all she knew, both of him and Mark. Which though it was not enough to destroy her, yet certainly wrought much on the jealous and alienated king. She told them, "That she once asked Norris, why he did not go on with his marriage? who answered her, that he would yet tarry some time. To which she replied, You look for dead mens shoes; for if ought come to the King but good, you would look to have me. He answered, if he had any such thought, he would his head were cut off. Upon which, she said, she could undoe him if she pleased, and thereupon she fell out with him." As for Mark, who was then laid in irons, she said, he was never in her chamber, but when the king was last at Winchester; and then he came in to play on the virginals: she said, that "she never spoke to him after that, but on Saturday before May-day, when she saw him standing in the window, and then she asked him, why he was so sad; he said, it was no matter: she answered, You may not look to have me speak to you, as if you were a nobleman, since you are an inferior person. No, no, madam, said he, a look sufficeth me." She seemed more apprehensive of Weston, than of any body. For on Whitsun-Monday last he said to her, "That Norris came more to her chamber upon her account, than for any body else that was there. She had observed, that he loved a kinwoman of hers, and challenged him for it, and for not loving his wife. But he answered her, that there were women in the house, whom he loved better than them both; she asked who it was; yourself, said he; upon which, she said, she desired him."

This misery of the queen drew after it the common effects that follow persons under such a disgrace; for now all the court was against her, and every one was courting the rising queen. But Cranmer had not learned these arts; and had a better soul in him, than to be capable of

of such baseness and ingratitude. He had been much obliged by her, and had conceived an high opinion of her, and so could not easily receive ill impressions of her; yet he knew the kings temper, and that a down-right justification of her would provoke him: therefore he wrote the following letter, on the 3d of May, with all the softness that so tender a point required; in which he justified her as far as was consistent with prudence and charity. The letter shows of what a constitution he was that wrote it; and contains so many things that tend highly to her honour, that I shall insert it here, as I copied it from the original.

"Pleaseth it your most noble grace, to be advertised, that at your graces commandment by Mr. Secretary his letters, written in your graces name, I came to Lambeth yesterday, and do there remain to know your graces further pleasure. And forso much as without your graces commandment, I dare not, contrary to the contents of the said letters, presume to come unto your graces presence; nevertheless of my most bounden duty, I can do no less than most humbly to desire your grace, by your great wisdom, and by the assistance of Gods help, somewhat to suppress the deep sorrows of your graces heart, and to take all adversities of Gods hands both patiently and thankfully. I cannot deny, but your grace hath great causes many ways of lamentable heaviness: and also that in the wrongful estimation of the world, your graces honour of every part is so highly touched (whether the things that commonly be spoken of, be true or not,) that I remember not that ever Almighty God sent unto your grace, any like occasion to try your graces constancy throughout, whether your highness can be content to take off Gods hand, as well things displeasing, as pleasant. And if he find in your most noble heart such an obedience unto his will, that your grace, without murmur and overmuch heaviness, do accept all adversities, not less thanking him, than when all things succeed after your graces will and pleasure, nor less procuring his glory and honour; then I suppose your grace did never thing more acceptable unto him, since your first governance of this your realm. And moreover, your grace shall give unto him occasion to multiply and encrease his graces and benefits unto your highness, as he did unto his most faithful servant Job; unto whom, after his great calamities and heaviness, for his obedient heart, and willing acceptance of Gods scourge and rod, Addidit ei Dominus cuncta duplicia. And if it be true, that is openly reported of the queens grace, if men had a right estimation of things, they should not esteem any part of your graces honour to be touched thereby, but her honour only to be clearly disparaged. And I am in such a perplexity, that my mind is clean amazed. For I never had better opinion in woman, than I had in her; which maketh me to think, that she should not be culpable. And again, I think your highness would not have gone so far, except she had surely been culpable. Now I think that your grace best knoweth, that next unto your grace, I was most bound unto her of all creatures living. Wherefore I most humbly beseech your grace, to suffer me in that, which both Gods law, nature, and also her kindness, bindeth me unto; that is, that I may with your graces favour wish and pray for her, that she may declare her self inculpable and innocent. And if she be found culpable, considering your graces goodness towards her, and from what condition your grace of your only meer goodness took her, and set the crown upon her head; I repute him not your graces faithful servant and subject, nor true unto the realm, that would not desire the offence without mercy to be punished, to the example of all other. And as I loved her not a little, for the love which I judged her to bear towards God and his gospel; so if she be proved culpable, there is not one that loveth God and his gospel, that ever will favour her, but must hate her above all other; and the more they favour the gospel, the more they will hate her: for then there was never creature in our time that so much slandered the gospel. And God hath sent her this punishment, for that she feignedly hath professed his gospel in her mouth, and not in heart and deed. And though she have offended so, that she hath deserved never to be reconciled unto your graces favour; yet Almighty God hath manifoldly declared his goodness towards your grace, and never offended you. But your grace, I am sure, knowledgeth that you have offended him. Wherefore I trust that your grace will bear no less entire favour unto the truth of the gospel, than you did before: forso much as your graces favour to the gospel, was not led by affection unto her, but by zeal unto the truth. And thus I beseech Almighty God, whose gospel he hath ordained your grace to be defender of, ever to preserve your grace from all evil, and give you at the end the promise of his gospel. From Lambeth, the 3d day of May.

"After I had written this letter unto your grace, my lord chancellor, my lord of Oxford, my lord of Suffolk, and my lord chamberlain of your graces house, sent for me to come unto the Star-Chamber; and there declared unto me such things as your graces pleasure was they should make me privy unto. For the which I am most bounden unto your grace. And what communication we had together, I doubt not but they will make the true report thereof unto your grace. I am exceedingly sorry, that such faults can be proved by the queen, as I heard of their relation. But I am, and ever shall be, your faithful subject,

Your graces most humble subject, and chaplain.
T. Cantuariensis.

But jealousy, and the kings new affection, had quite defaced all the remainders of esteem for his late beloved queen. Yet the ministers continued practising, to get further evidence for the trial; which was not brought on, till the 12th of May; and then Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton, were tried by a commission of oyer and terminer in Westminster-hall. They were twice indicted, and the indictments were found by two grand juries, in the counties of Kent and Middlesex; the crimes with which they were charged, being said to be done in both these counties. Mark Smeton confessed, he had known the queen carnally three times. The other three pleaded not guilty; but the jury, upon the evidence formerly mentioned, found them all guilty; and judgment was given, that they should be drawn to the place of execution, and some of them to be hanged, others to be beheaded, and all to be quartered, as guilty of high treason. On the 15th of May, the queen and her brother the lord Rochford (who was a peer, having been made a viscount when his father was created earl of Wiltshire) were brought to be tried by their peers; the duke of Norfolk being lord high steward for that occasion. With him sat the duke of Suffolk, the marquess of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and twenty-seven more peers, of whom their father the earl of Wiltshire was one (a). Whether this unnatural compliance was imposed on him by the imperious king, or officiously submitted to by himself, that he might thereby be preserved from the ruin that fell on his family, is not known. Here the queen of England by an unheard-of precedent was brought to the bar, and indicted of high treason. The crimes charged on her were, that she had procured her brother and the other four to lie with her, which they had done often; that she had said to them, that the king never had her heart, and had said to every one of them by themselves, that she loved them better than any person whatsoever. Which was to the slander of the issue that was begotten between the king and her. And this was treason, according to the statute made in the 26th year of this reign (so that the law, that was made for her and the issue of her marriage, is now made use of to destroy her). It was also added in the indictment, that she, and her complices, had conspired the kings death; but this it seems was only put in to swell the charge, for if there had been any evidence for it, there was no need of stretching the other statute, or if they could have proved the violating of the queen, the known statute of the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Edward the third had been sufficient. When the indictment was read, she held up her hand, and pleaded not guilty, and so did her brother, and did answer the evidence was brought against her discreetly. One thing is remarkable, that Mark Smeton, who was the only person that confessed any thing, was never confronted with the queen, nor was kept to be an evidence against her; for he had received his sentence three days before, and so could be no witness in law. But perhaps, though he was wrought on to confess, yet they did not think he had confidence enough to aver it to the queens face. Therefore the evidence they brought, as Spelman says, was the oath of a woman that was dead, yet this, or rather the terror of offending the king, so wrought on the lords, that they found her and her brother guilty; and judgment was given, that she should be burnt, or beheaded at the kings pleasure. Upon which Spelman observes, that whereas burning is the death which the law appoints for a woman that is attainted of treason, yet since she had been queen of England, they left it to the king to determine, whether she should dye so infamous a death, or be beheaded. But the judges complained of this way of proceeding, and said, such a disjunctive in a judgment of treason, had never been seen. The lord Rochford was also condemned to be beheaded and quartered. Yet all this did not satisfy the enraged king, but the marriage between him and her must be annulled, and the issue illegitimated. The king remembered an intrigue that had been between her and the earl of Northumberland, which was mentioned in the former book; and that he then lord Percy said to the cardinal, "That he had gone so far before witnesses, that it lay upon his conscience, so that he could not go back." This it is like might be some promise he made to marry her, per verba de futuro, which though it was no precontract in itself, yet it seems the poor queen was either so ignorant or so ill-advised, as to be persuaded afterwards it was one; though it is certain that nothing, but a contract per verba de presenti, could be of any force to annul the subsequent marriage. The king and his council, reflecting upon what it seems the cardinal had told him, resolved to try what could be made of it, and pressed the earl of Northumberland to confess a contract between him and her. But he took his oath before the two arch-bishops, that there was no contract, nor promise of marriage ever between them, and received the sacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and others of the kings privy council; wishing it might be to his damnation, if there was any such thing (concerning which I have seen the original declaration under his own hand). Nor could they draw any confession from the queen, before the sentence; for certainly if they could have done that, the divorce had gone before the trial; and then she must have been tried only as marchioness of Pembroke. But now she lying under so terrible a sentence, it is most probable, that either some hopes of life were given her; or at least, she was wrought on by the assurances of mitigating that cruel part of her judgement, of being burnt, into the milder part of the sentence, of having her head cut off; so that she confessed a pre-contract, and on the 17th of May was brought to Lambeth; and in court, the afflicted arch-bishop sitting judge, some persons of quality being present, she confessed some just and lawful impediments; by which it was evident, that her marriage with the king was not valid. Upon which confession, her marriage between the king and her was judged to have been null and void. The record of the sentence is burnt; but these particulars are repeated in the act that passed in the next parliament, touching the succession to the crown. It seems this was secretly done, for Spelman writes of it thus; It was said, there was a divorce made between the king and her, upon her confessing a precontract with another before her marriage with the king: so that it was then only talk of, but not generally known.

The two sentences that were past upon the queen, the one of attainder for adultery, the other of divorce because of a precontract, did so contradict one another, that it was apparent, one, if not both of them must be unjust; for if the marriage between the king and her was null from the beginning, then since she was not the king's wedded wife, there could be no adultery: and her marriage to the king was either a true marriage, or not; if it was true, then the annulling of it was unjust, and if it was no true marriage, then the attainder was unjust; for there could be no breach of that faith which was never given: So that it is plain, the king was resolved to be rid of her, and to illegitimate her daughter, and in that transport of his fury, did not consider that the very method he took, discovered the injustice of his proceedings against her. Two days after this, she was ordered to be executed in the Green on Tower-Hill. How she received these tidings, and how steadfast she continued in the protestations of her innocence, will best appear by the following circumstances. The day before she suffered, upon a strict search of her past life, she called to mind, that she had played the step-mother too severely to lady Mary, and had done her many injuries. Upon which, she made the lieutenant of the Tower's lady sit down in the chair of state; which the other, after some ceremony, doing, she fell down on her knees, and with many tears charged the lady, as she would answer it to God, to go in her name, and do as she had done, to the lady Mary, and ask her forgiveness for the wrongs she had done her. And she said, she had no quiet in her conscience, till she had done that. But though she did in this what became a Christian, the lady Mary could not so easily pardon these injuries; but retained the resentments of them her whole life.

This ingenuity and tenderness of conscience about lesser matters, is a great presumption, that if she had been guilty of more eminent faults, she had not continued to the last denying them, and making protestations of her innocence. For that same night she sent her last message to the king, and acknowledged her self much obliged to him, that had continued still to advance her. She said, he had, from a private gentleman, first made her a marchioness, and then a queen; and now, since he could raise her no higher, was sending her to be a saint in Heaven: She protested her innocence, and recommended her daughter to his care. And her carriage that day she died, will appear from the following letter writ by the lieutenant of the Tower, copied from the original, which I insert, because the copier employed by the lord Herbert has not writ it out faithfully; for I cannot think that any part of it was left out on design.

"Sir, These should be to advertise you, I have received your letter, wherein you would have strangers conveyed out of the Tower, and so they be by the means of Richard Greffum, and William Cooke, and Wyspoll. But the number of strangers past not thirty, and not many of those armed; and the ambassador of the emperor had a servant there, and honestly put out: Sir, if we have not an hour certain, as it may be known in London, I think here will be but few, and I think a reasonable number were best, for I suppose she will declare her self to be a good woman, for all men but for the king, at the hour of her death. For this morning she sent for me, that I might be with her at such time as she received the Good Lord, to the intent I should hear her speak as touching her innocency alway to be clear. And in the writing of this, she sent for me, and at my coming she said: Mr. Kingston, I hear say I shall not die aforenoon, and I am very sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain. I told her, it should be no pain, it was so fettle. And then she said, I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck, and put her hands about it, laughing heartily. I have seen many men, and also women, executed; and that they have been in great sorrow, and to my knowledge this lady has much joy and pleasure in death. Sir, her almoner is continually with her, and had been since two a clock after midnight. This is the effect of any thing that is here at this time, and thus fare you well,

Yours,
William Kingston."

A little before noon, being the 19th of May, she was brought to the scaffold, where she made a short speech to a great company that came to look on the last scene of this fatal tragedy: the chief of whom were the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor, and secretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, the sheriffs and aldermen of London. "She said, she was come to die, as she was judged by the law; she would accuse none, nor say any thing of the ground upon which she was judged. She prayed heartily for the king; and called him a most merciful and gentle prince, and that he had been always to her, a good, gentle, sovereign lord: and if any would meddle with her cause, she required them to judge the best. And so she took her leave of them, and of the world; and heartily desired they would pray for her." After she had been some time in her devotions, her last words being, To Christ I commend my soul; her head was cut off by the hangman of Calais, who was brought over as more expert at beheading than any in England: her eyes and lips were observed to move after her head was cut off, as Spelman writes; but her body was thrown into a common chest of elm-tree that was made to put arrows in, and was buried in the chappel within the Tower before twelve a clock.

Extract from 3 Burn. Reformat. p. 118, to 121.

THE tragedy of queen Anne followed soon after this: it broke out on the first of May 1536, but it seems it was concerted before; for a parliament was summoned, at least the writs were tested the 27th of April before.

There is a long account of her sufferings given by Meteren, in that excellent history that he wrote of the wars in the Netherlands, which he took from a full relation of it, given by a French gentleman, Crispin, who was then in London; and as Meteren relates the matter, wrote without partiality. He begins it thus. "There was a gentleman who blamed his sister for some lightness that appeared in her behaviour; she said the queen did more than she did; for she admitted some of her court to come into her chamber at undue hours: and named the lord Roth-
Vol. XI.

Her brother with the other four did also suffer; none of them were quartered, but they were all beheaded, except Smeton, who was hanged. It was generally said, that he was corrupted into that confession, and had his life promised him; but it was not fit to let him live to tell tales. Norris had been much in the king's favour, and an offer was made him of his life, if he would confess his guilt, and accuse the queen. But he generously rejected that un-handson proposition, and said, "That in his conscience he thought her innocent of these things laid to her charge; but whether she was or not, he would not accuse her of any thing, and he would die a thousand times, rather than ruin an innocent person."

These proceedings occasioned as great variety of censures, as there were diversity of interests. The Popish party said, the justice of God was visible, that she who had supplanted queen Katherine, met with the like, and harder measure, by the same means. Some took notice of her faint justifying her self on the scaffold, as if her conscience had then prevailed so far, that she could no longer deny a thing, for which she was so soon to answer at another tribunal. But others thought her care of her daughter made her speak so tenderly; for she had observed, that queen Katherine's obstinacy had drawn the king's indignation on her daughter; and therefore that she alone might bear her misfortunes, and derive no share of them on her daughter, she spake in a stile, that could give the king no just offence: and as she said enough to justify her self, so she said as much for the king's honour, as could be expected. Yet in a letter that she wrote to the king from the Tower, (which will be found in the Collection,) she pleaded her innocence, in a strain of so much wit, and moving passionate eloquence, as perhaps can scarce be parallel'd: certainly her spirits were much exalted when she wrote it, for it is a pitch above her ordinary stile. Yet the copy I take it from, lying among Cromwell's other papers, makes me believe it was truly written by her.

Her carriage seemed too free, and all people thought that some freedoms and levities in her had encouraged those unfortunate persons to speak such bold things to her, since few attempt upon the chastity, or make declarations of love, to persons of so exalted a quality, except they see some invitations, at least in their carriage. Others thought that a free and jovial temper might, with great innocence, though with no discretion, lead one to all those things that were proved against her; and therefore they concluded her chaste, though indiscreet. Others blamed the king, and taxed his cruelty in proceeding so severely against a person whose chastity he had reason to be assured of, since she had resisted his addresses near five years, till he legitimated them by marriage. But others accused him. It is certain her carriage had given just cause of some jealousy, and that being the rage of a man, it was no wonder if a king of his temper, conceiving it against one whom he had so signally obliged, was transported into unjustifiable excesses.

Others condemned Cranmer, as a man that obsequiously followed all the king's appetites; and that he had now divorced the king a second time, which shewed that his conscience was governed by the king's pleasure as his supreme law. But what he did was unavoidable. For whatever motives drew from her the confession of that precontract, he was obliged to give sentence upon it: and that which she confessed, being such as made her incapable to contract marriage with the king, he could not decline the giving of sentence upon so formal a confession. Some loaded all that favoured the Reformation: and said, It now appeared what a woman their great patroness and supporter had been. But to those it was answered, That her faults, if true, being secret, could cast no reflection on those, who being ignorant of them, made use of her protection. And the church of Rome thought not their cause suffered by the enraged cruelty and ambition of the cursed Irene, who had convened the second council of Nice, and set up the worship of images again in the east; whom the popes continued to court and magnifie, after her barbarous murder of her son, with other acts of unfatigued spite and ambition. Therefore they had no reason to think the worse of persons for claiming the protection of a queen, whose faults (if she was at all criminal,) were unknown to them when they made use of her.

Some have since that time concluded it a great evidence of her guilt, that during her daughters long and glorious reign, there was no full nor compleat vindication of her published. For the writers of that time thought it enough to speak honourably of her; and in general, to call her innocent, but none of them ever attempted a clear discussion of the particulars laid to her charge. This had been much to her daughters honour, and therefore, since it was not done, others concluded it could not be done; and that their knowledge of her guilt restrained their pens. But others do not at all allow of that inference, and think rather, that it was the great wisdom of that time not to suffer such things to be called in question; since no wise government will admit of a debate about the clearness of the prince's title. For the very attempting to prove it weakens it more, than any of the proofs that are brought can confirm it; therefore it was prudently done of that queen and her great ministers, never to suffer any vindication or apology to be written. Some indiscretions could not be denied, and these would all have been caught hold of, and improved by the busy emissaries of Rome and Spain.

ford, Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton the musician: and she said "to her brother, that Smeton could tell much more: all this was carried "to the king."

When the matter broke out on the first of May, the king who loved Norris, sent for him, and said, if he would confess those things with which the queen was charged, he should neither suffer in his person, nor his estate; nor so much as be put in prison: but if he did not confess, and were found guilty, he should suffer the extremity of the law. Norris answered, he would much rather die than be guilty of such falsehood: that it was all false, which he was ready to justify in a combat against any person whatsoever: so he was sent with the rest to the Tower: the confession of Smeton was all that was brought against the queen: he, as was believ'd, was prevailed on to accuse her: yet he was condemned contrary to the promise that had been made him: but it was pretended that his crime was, that he had told his suspicions to others, and not to the king: and when it was alledg'd that one witness was not sufficient, it was answered that it was sufficient. He adds, that the queen was try'd in the Tower; and that she defended her honour, and modesty, in such a way, as to soften the king (for she knew his temper) by such humble deportment, to favour her daughter. She was brought to her trial without having any advocate allow'd her; having none but her maids about her. A chair was set for her, and she looked to all her judges with a cheerful countenance, as she made her curtsies to them, without any fear: she behaved her self as if she had been still queen: she spoke not much in her own defence; but the modesty of her countenance pleaded her innocence, much more than the defence that she made; so that all who saw or heard her, believed her innocent. Both the magistrates of London, and several others who were there, said, they saw no evidence against her; only it appear'd, that they were resolv'd to be rid of her.

She was made to lay aside all the characters of her dignity: which she did willingly; but still protested her innocence. When she heard the sentence, that she was to be beheaded, or burnt, she was not terrified; but lifted up her hands to God, and said, "O Father! O Creator! Thou, who art the way, the truth, and the life; thou knowest that I have not deserved this death." And turning herself to her judges, (her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, being the lord high steward) she said, "My lords, I will not say that your sentence is unjust; nor presume, that my opinion ought to be preferred to the judgment of you all. I believe you have reasons, and occasions of suspicion and jealousy, upon which you have condemned me: but they must be other, than those that have been produced here in court; for I am entirely innocent of all these accusations; so that I cannot ask pardon of God for them. I have been always a faithful and loyal wife to the king. I have not, perhaps, at all times shewed him that humility and reverence, that his goodness to me, and the honour to which he raised me, did deserve. I confess, I have had fancies and suspicions of him, which I had not strength nor discretion enough to manage: but God knows, and is my witness, that I never failed otherwise towards him: and I shall never confess any other, at the hour of my death. Do not think that I say this, on design to prolong my life: God has taught me to know how to die; and he will fortify my faith. Do not think that I am so carried in my mind, as not to lay the honour of my chastity to heart; of which I should make small account now in my extremity, if I had not maintained it my whole life long, as much as ever queen did. I know, these my last words will signify nothing, but to justify my honour and my chastity. As for my brother, and those others, who are unjustly condemned, I would willingly suffer many deaths, to deliver them: but since I see it so pleases the king, I must willingly bear with their death, and shall accompany them in death, with this assurance, that I shall lead an endless life with them in peace." She said all this, and a great deal more: and then, with a modest air, she rose up, and took leave of them all. Her brother, and the other gentlemen, were executed first. "He exhorted those who suffered with him, to die without fear; and said to those that were about him, that he came to die, since it was the king's pleasure that it should be so. He exhorted all persons, not to trust to courts, states, and kings, but in God only. He had deserved a heavier punishment for his other sins; but not from the king, whom he had never offended. Yet he prayed God to give him a long, and a good life. With him, all the rest suffer'd a death, which they had no way deserved. Mark Smeton only confessed, he had deserved well to die: which gave occasion to many reflections.

"When the queen heard how her brother and the other gentlemen had suffered, and had sealed her innocence with their own blood; but that Mark had confess'd, he deserved to die; she broke out into some passion, and said; Has he not then clear'd me of that publick shame he has brought me to? Alas! I fear his soul suffers for it, and that he is now punished for his false accusation. But for my brother, and those others, I doubt not, but they are now in the presence of that Great King, before whom I am to be to-morrow."

It seems, that gentleman knew nothing of the judgment that passed at Lambeth, annulling the marriage: for it was transacted secretly. It could have no foundation or colour, but from that story mention'd in Cavendish's life of Wolsey, of the lord Percy's addresses to her. He was now examined upon that: but it will appear from his letter to Cromwell, that he solemnly purged both himself and her, from any precontract; being examined upon oath by the two archbishops: and that he received the sacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and some of the king's council that were learned in the spiritual law; assuring them by his oath, and by the sacrament that he had received, and intended to receive, that there was never any contract, or promise of marriage, between her and him. This he wrote on the 13th of May, four days before the queen's execution; which will be found in the Collection.

This shews plainly, that she was prevailed on, between fear and hope, to confess a precontract, the person not being named.

The French gentleman gives the same account of the manner of her death, and of her speech, that all the other writers of that time do. "When she was brought to the place of execution, within the Tower, he says, her looks were cheerful; and she never appeared more beautiful, than at that time. She said to those about her, Be not sorry to see me die thus; but pardon me from your hearts, that I have not expressed to all about me, that mildness that became me; and that I have not done that good, that was in my power to do. She prayed for those who were the procurers of her death. Then, with the aid of her maids, she undressed her neck with great courage, and so ended her days."

This long recital I have translated out of Motruin; for I do not find it taken notice of by any of our writers. I leave it thus, without any other reflections upon it, but that it seems all over credible.

Thvet, a Franciscan fryar, who for 17 or 18 years, had wandred up and down Europe, to prepare materials for his Cosmography, (which he published in the year 1563,) says, that many English gentlemen assured him, that king Henry expressed great repentance of his sins, being at the point of death; and among other things, of the injury and the crime committed against queen Anne Boleyn, who was falsely accused, and convicted of that which was laid to her charge. It is true, Thuanus has very much disgraced that writer, as a vain and ignorant plagiarist: but he having been of the order that suffered so much for their adhering to queen Katherine, is not to be suspected of partiality for queen Anne. We must leave those secrets to the great day.

The earl of Northumberland's letter to Cromwell, denying any contract, or promise of marriage, between queen Anne and himself.

MR. Secretary, this shall be to signifie unto you, that I perceyve by sir Raynold Carnaby, that there is supposed a precontract between the queen and me; whereupon I was not only heretofore examined upon my oath before the archbishops of Canterbury and York, but also received the blessed sacrament upon the same before the duke of Norfolk, and other the king's highnes council learned in the spirituall law; assuring you, Mr. Secretary, by the said oath, and blessed body which affore I received, and hereafter intend to receive, that the same may be to my damnation, if ever there were any contracte, or promise of marriage between her and me. At Newyngton-Green, the xiiijth day of Maye, in the 28th year of the reigne of our soveraigne lord-king Henry the VIIIth.

Your assured,

Northumberland!

Queen Ann Boleyn's last letter to king Henry.

SIR,

YOUR grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy; I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.

But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn, with which name and place I could willingly have contented my self, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget my self in my exaltation, or received queenship, but that I alwayes looked for such an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration, I knew, was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other subject. You have chosen me, from a low estate, to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant prince's your daughter: try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see, either mine innocency cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled on that party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto; your grace being not ignorant of my suspicion therein.

But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness; then I desire of God, that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof; and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment-seat, where both you and my self must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocency shall be openly known, and sufficiently cleared.

My last and only request shall be, that my self may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request; and I will so leave to trouble your grace any further, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this 6th of May.

Your most loyal and ever faithful wife,

Ann Boleyn.

Extract

Extract from Strype's Memorials, vol. i, p. 279.

THIS year, [1536] in the month of May, queen Anne Boleyn was beheaded: a great friend and patroness of the reformed religion.

She was very nobly charitable, and expended largely in all manner of acts of liberality, according to her high quality. And among the rest of her ways of shewing this Christian virtue, she being a favourer of learning, together with her father, the lord Wiltshire, and the lord Rochford her brother, maintained divers ingenious men at the universities. Among the rest, were these men of note, Dr. Hebbe, afterward archbishop of York, and lord chancellor; Dr. Thirlby, afterward bishop of Ely; and Mr. Paget, afterward lord Paget, and secretary of state: all which in her time were favourers of the Gospel, though afterwards they relapsed. Of Paget one hath observed, that he was a most earnest Protestant, and being in Cambridge, gave unto one Raynold West, Luther's book, and other books of the Germans, as Franciscus Lambertus de Sætis: and that, at that time he read Melancthon's rhetoric openly in Trinity-hall; and was a maintainer of Dr. Barnes, and all the Protestants then in Cambridge, and helped many religious persons out of their cowles.

This queen was also a great favourer of those that suffered for religion. Let this letter ensuing, writ by her to Crumwel, stand upon record here, shewing both her love to such sufferers, and her high esteem of the word of God.

By the Queen.

"Anne the Queen. Trusty and right well beloved, wee greet you well. And whereas, we be credibly informed, that the bearer hereof, Rychard Herman, merchant, and citizen of Antwerp in Brabant, was, in the time of the late lord cardinal, put and expelled from his freedom and fellowship of and in the English House there, for nothing else, as he affirmeth, but only for that, that he did, both with his goods and policy, to his great hurt and hindrance in this world, help to the setting forth of the New Testament in English. Wee therefore desire and instantly pray you, that with all speed and favour convenient, ye will cause this good and honest merchant, being my lords true, faithful and loving subject, to be restored to his pristin freedom, liberty and fellowship afore said. And the sooner at this our request: and at your good pleasure to hear him in such things as he hath to make further relation unto you in this behalf. Yeven under our signet, at my lord's mannor of Greenwich, the xiv. day of May."

Such a material piece of history in the king's reign, besides what is written by our historians, may deserve divers particular remarks to be shewn, concerning this queen's behaviour and her speeches, from the time of her commitment to the Tower, to her execution. Which I am enabled to give from five or six letters of sir William Kyngston, constable, or (as others) lieutenant, of the Tower, to secretary Crumwel. And I do it the rather, to represent matters concerning this queen in her afflictions the more largely, exactly and distinctly; which bishop Burnet hath set down from the same papers, more briefly and imperfectly. And perhaps upon the reading of what follows, some things which that reverend author attributes to fits and vapours in the queen, may find a better and truer interpretation. The lord Herbert also has given us only some short hints of these things.

After the duke of Norfolk, and some other of the king's council who had conducted queen Anne to the Tower, (which was on the 2d of May) were departed, the said constable of the Tower went before her into her lodging. And then she said to him, Mr. Kyngston, shall I go into a dungeon? he answered her, No, madam; you shall go into your lodging, that you lay in at your coronation. Upon which she said, It is too good for me. And further said, Jesu! have mercy on me. And then kneeled down, weeping a great pace. And in the same sorrow, fell into a great laughing. And so she did several times afterwards. Then she desired Mr. Kyngston, to move the king's highness, that she might have the sacrament in the closet by her chamber, that she might pray for mercy. For I am as clear, said she, from the company of man, as for sin, as I am clear from you: and again, the king's true wedded wife. And then she said, Mr. Kyngston, do you know wherefore I am here? and he said, Nay. And then she asked him, when he saw the king? he said, not since he saw him in the Tilt Yard, [which was but the day before at Greenwich, when he seemed first to take a displeasure against her.] And then she asked him, I pray you tell me, where my lord my father is. He told her, he saw him afore dinner in the court. O! where is my sweet brother? [for she feared the king's displeasure against her, would reach unto all her relations.] Kyngston replied, I left him at York-Place: thinking it convenient to conceal it from her, though he was committed the same day. I hear say, said she, that I shall be accused by three men. And I can say no more, but, Nay: though you should open my body; and therewith she opened her gown. Adding, O! Norris, hast thou accused me? thou art in the Tower with me. And thou and I shall die together. And Mark, [another that accused her] thou art here too. And then with much compassion she said, O! my mother, thou wilt die with sorrow. And then she much lamented my lady Worcester, (being with child) because her child did not stir in her body. And when the constable's wife, being present, asked, what might be the cause, she said, It was for the sorrow she took for me.

Then she said, Mr. Kyngston, shall I die without justice? to which he replied, The poorest subject the king had, had justice. And therewith she laughed. All these sayings happened that night. The next morning in conversation with her, these speeches happened; related by sir William Kyngston in his foresaid letter. Mrs. Cofins, a gentlewoman appointed to wait upon the queen here, and that lay on her palate bed, said, that Norris (one of those that were accused about her) did say on Saturday last unto the queen's amner, that he would swear for the queen, that she was a good woman. And then the said gentlewoman added, speaking to the queen, [as minding to enquire of her concerning the occasion of her present trouble] Madam, why should there be any such matters spoken of? Marry, said the queen, I bade him do so. For I asked him, why he did not go through with his marriage [with some lady, it seems, Norris courted]. And he made answer, he would tarry a time. Then said she, You look for dead men's shoes. For if ought should come to the king, but good, you would look to have me. Then he said, If he should have any such thought, he would his head were off. And then she said, she could undo him, if she would. And therewith they fell out.

And then she said, I more fear Weston [another that was cast into the Tower about her business]. For Weston had said unto her, that Norris came more unto her chamber for her, than he did for Mage [the name, I suppose, of one of the queen's maids, that he courted]. And further, Kyngston related another saying, which the queen spake to him concerning Weston, [whom also she had sometimes talk with, coming often in her way; which might create a jealousy concerning him] That she had spoke with him, because he did love her kinswoman, Mrs. Skelton. And said to him, that he loved not his wife [spoken by way of reproof]. And he made answer to her again, that he loved one in her house better than them both. And the queen said, Who is that? he gave this answer, It is yourself. And then she defied him, as she said to Kyngston [in scorn and displeasure, as reflecting upon her honour, undoubtedly]. These passages between the queen and them, was the cause of all their deaths; coming some way or other to the jealous king's ears. For she, being of a free and courteous nature, would exchange words sometimes, and enter into some talk with such as she met in the court; and with these gentlemen, who were of the privy chamber: and so happened often to come where she was. And some of their discourse happened to be brought to the king by some officious person, that owed her no good will.

In another letter to secretary Crumwel, he wrote these passages concerning the said queen: That she much desired to have there in her closet the sacrament; and also her amner for one hour, when she was determined to die [that is, to suffer death]. After an examination of her at Greenwich, before some of the council, the said Kyngston sent for his wife and Mrs. Cofins (who both were appointed to be always with her) to know of them, how she had done that day. They said, she had been very merry, and made a good dinner: and after, called for a supper. And then called for him, and asked him, where he had been all day. And after some words, she began talk, and said, she was cruelly handled at Greenwich with the king's council: namely, with my lord of Norfolk [who was indeed her enemy]. And that he said, [to what she had spoken, as it seems in her own defence] Tut, tut, tut; and shaking his head three or four times. And as for Mr. Treasurer, he was, said she, in the forest of Windfor. You know, added the writer of the letter, what she meant by that. And then named Mr. Comptroler (another of the council) to be a very gentleman. But she to be a queen, and so cruelly handled, it was never seen. But I think the king doth it to prove me. And then laughed withal: and was very merry. And then she said, I shall have justice. Then said the constable, Have no doubt therein. Then she said, If any man accuse me, I can say but nay. And they can bring no witnesses.

And in some communication with the lady Kyngston and Mrs. Cofins, I would to God, said she, I had my bishops. For they would all go to the king for me. For I think the most part of England prayeth for me. And if I die, you shall see the greatest punishment for me within this seven years, that ever came to England. [This she spake no doubt in the confidence of her innocency; and God's righteous and visible judgments for the most part, for shedding innocent blood. And indeed within the seventh year following, happened a dreadful pestilence in London, and many commotions and insurrections to the end of this reign.] And then, said she, shall I be in Heaven. For I have done many good deeds in my days. Then she took notice of divers women set about her, that she liked not; saying, I think much unkindness in the king to put such about me, as I never loved. Then Kyngston shewed her, that the king took them to be honest and good women. But I would have had of my own privy chamber, replied she, which I favour most, &c.

In another letter of Kyngston to Crumwel, he relates, how she desired of him to carry a letter to the said Crumwel [of whose friendship she had a belief]. But he (it seems not thinking it safe for him to carry letters from her) said to her, that if she would tell it him by mouth, he would do it. For which she gave him thanks: and added, that she much marvelled, that the king's council came not to her, as seeming to be ready to justify her self. The same day she said, we should have no rain, till she was delivered out of the Tower: it being a season that wanted rain: [thinking probably that God (who takes care of innocency) would vindicate her, by giving, or withholding the clouds of Heaven.] To which Kyngston replied, I pray, it may be shortly, because of the fair weather: adding, you know what I mean [that is, the king's reconciliation to her].

Other occasional speeches of hers, were these. She said concerning such women as was set about her, that the king wist what he did, when he put two such about her, as my lady Boleyn, and Mrs. Cofins. For they could tell her nothing of my lord, her father, and nothing else. But that she defied them all. [Meaning any about her whosoever, to be able to charge her with any dishonourable act.] But then upon this, my lady Boleyn [her kinswoman] said to her, Such desire as you have had to such tales, [tale-carriers or tellers, as some perhaps of her women were] have brought you to this. Then said Mrs. Stoner, [another gentlewoman about her] Mark [Smeton, the musician, another committed to the Tower, an accuser of the queen] is the worst cherished of any in the house. For he weareth irons. The queen said, that was because he was no gentleman. And he never was at my chamber; [and so could know less, she meant, than any, what was done by her, or any with her there] but at Winchester, and there she sent for him, to play on the virginals: for there my lodging was above the king's. And I never spake with him since, but upon Saturday before May day [that fatal day, when the king first conceived his jealousy].

jealousy]. And then I found him standing in the round window in my chamber of presence. And I asked him, why he was so sad. And he answered and said, it was no matter. And then she said, You may not look to have me speak to you as I would do to a noble man: because ye be an inferior person. No, no, said he, a look sufficeth me: and thus fate you well. This shews him to be some haughty person; and thought the queen gave him not respect enough. And so might take this opportunity to humble her; and revenge himself by this means on her: not thinking it would cost him his own life.

Another letter of sir William Kyngston to Crumwel, giving an account of this queen's behaviour at her execution, is published in the History of the Reformation. Which began thus; "Sir, this shall be to advertise you, that I have received your letter; wherein you would have strangers conveyed out of the Tower. And so they be, by the means of Richard Gresham, and William Loke, and Withepole. But the number of strangers past not thirty; and not many hothe [other.]" Armed is added in the said History, which word is not in the original letter. Other mistakes there, this more exact transcription will rectify thus far in the letter.

Another letter of hers to the king, beginning, Sir, your grace's displeasure, &c. is published in the said History. But this passage following wrote at the end of her letter, I think worthy to be transcribed, and set here, the reverend author of that book relating it imperfectly, viz.

The king sending a message to the queen Anne, being prisoner in the Tower; willing her to confess the truth, she said, "She could confess no more, then she had already spoken. And she said, she must conceal nothing from the king, to whom she did acknowledge her self so much bound for many favours: for raising her first from a mean woman to be a marquess; next to be his queen. And now, seeing he could bestow no further honour upon her on earth, for purposing to make her, by martyrdom, a saint in Heaven."

I add one remark more concerning this queen: that at this time of her being in the Tower, a former charge was revived against her: namely, the contract of marriage between her and the present earl of Northumberland, before her marrying with the king: designing, if they could prove this, to make her former marriage with the king unlawful and void; and to make the smoother way for his marrying with the lady Jane. But whatsoever the afflicted queen confessed to save her life, or to change the way of her execution, from burning to beheading, that there never was any such precontract, the said earl protested solemnly in a letter to secretary Crumwel: who it seems had now desired to know the truth from himself. Therein telling him, how he had formerly before the two archbishops, viz. Warham and Wolsey, utterly denied it upon his oath, and the receiving of the sacrament: so he now confirmed it in this letter.

VII. The Trial of Sir EDMOND KNEVET, Knight, at Greenwich, for striking a Person within the King's Palace there, 10th June, 33 Hen. VIII. 1541.

[The following trial, if so slight an account deserves the name, we extract from Stowe, who borrows from Holingshead. The trial is also taken notice of in Brooke's Abridgment, under the title Paine & Penance, pl. 16. It occurred a few months after the statute of 33 Hen. VIII. by which, malicious striking in the palace where the king resides, so as to draw blood, is punishable, not only by imprisonment for life and fine at discretion, but further by cutting off the right hand of the offender. Whether the prosecution was grounded on the statute, is not explained by Stowe; and what renders it more doubtful is, that by the statute, drawing of blood is essential, which circumstance neither Brooke nor Stowe states as part of sir Edmond Knevet's case.

Cutting off the hand is a rare punishment by the English law; and the cruelty of it being considered, it must give pleasure to the humane reader to know, that there are very few instances of inflicting it. We are not aware, that there are any crimes, which by our law are liable to be so punished, except drawing a weapon on one of the king's judges, and striking in the king's courts or his palaces; and so unfrequent have been both those crimes, that perhaps all our books do not furnish ten cases of the sort. 3. Inst. 140. Dy. 188. and the marginal cases in the edition of 1688.

The manner in which sir Edmond Knevet obtained a pardon of his offence, must strike every reader of sensibility. The circumstances do equal honour to sir Edmond and his sovereign; to the former for his manly request to pay the forfeit by his left hand instead of his right, that he might be better able to serve his king and country; to the latter, for feeling the greatness of mind which such a request denoted.]

Extract from Stowe's Annals, Howe's edit. p. 581.

THE tenth of June, sir Edmond Knevet, knight of Norfolk, was arraigned before the kings justices (sitting in the great hall at Greenwich, master Gage comptroller of the kings household, master Sutwell, sir Anthony Browne, sir Anthony Winkfield, master Wrisley, and Edmond Pecham cofferer of the kings household) for striking of one master Glere of Norfolk, servant with the earle of Surrey, within the kings house in the Tenise Court. There was first chosen to goe vpon the said Edmond a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of yeomen, to enquire of the said stripe, by the which inquests he was found guilty, and had judgement, to loose his right hand; whereupon was called to do the execution, first the sergeant chirurgion, with his instrument appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the woodyard with the mallet and a blocke, whereupon the hand should lie: the master cooke for the king with the knife: the sergeant of the farder to set the knife right on the ioynt: the sergeant farrier with his searing yrons to seare the veines: the sergeant of the poultry with a cocke, which cocke should have his head smitten off vpon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the yeoman of the chandry with seare clothes: the yeomen of the scullery with a pan of fire to heate the yrons: a chafer of water to coole the ends of the yrons:

and two fourmes for all officers to set their stufte on: the sergeant of the seller with wine, ale, and beere: the yeomen of the ewry in the sergeants steed, who was absent, with bason, ewre, and towels. Thus every man in his office ready to doe the execution, there was called forth sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmond Knevet, and when hee was brought to the barre, the cheife justice declared to him his trespassse, and the said Knevet confessing himselfe to be guilty, humbly submitted him to the kings mercy: for this offence he was not onely iudged to loose his hand, but also his body to remaine in prison, and his landes and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the sayd sir Edmond Knevet desired that the king of his benigne grace, would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left: for (quoth he) if my right hand be spared, I may hereafter doe such good seruice to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. Of this submission and request the justices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnes, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmond, and the good report of lords and ladies, granted him pardon, that he should loose neither hand, land, nor goods, but should go free at liberty.

VIII. The Trial of Lord LEONARD GREY, at Westminster, for High Treason, 25th June, 33 Hen. VIII. 1540.

[Hall, Grafton, Stow, and lord Herbert, all make mention of this trial. It is also noticed in Ware's Annals of Ireland. But Hollingshead in the Chronicles of Ireland, and sir Richard Cox in his History of Ireland, are most particular; and therefore what we shall give will be an extract from these latter writers.

In the earl of Strafford's case, Mr. St. John, arguing before the lords for the bill of attainder against the earl, cited this trial of lord Leonard Grey, particularly to prove, that treasons committed in Ireland are triable here; and said, that he had read the whole record of the case. 8 Rushw. 689. 694. 695. But Mr. St. John represents the charges against lord Leonard Grey differently from the author of the Irish Chronicles and sir Richard Cox; for, according to Mr. St. John, lord Leonard was attainted of high treason, for letting diverse rebels out of the Castle of Dublin, and discharging Irish hostages given to secure the king's peace, and for not punishing one, who said, that the king was an heretick.---It is observable, too, that Mr. St. John argues for a trial in England, independently of any statute; and to prove his point, takes notice, that lord Leonard Grey's case was before the 35. Hen. VIII. c. 2. as if that was the only statute for trying foreign treasons in England. But there are two other statutes about the trial of foreign treasons, which, being prior to lord Leonard Grey's case, were material to be considered. See 26. Hen. VIII. c. 13. § 4. 32. Hen. VIII. c. 4. The 33. Hen. VIII. c. 24. on the same subject, seems subsequent several months; otherwise that also would have required observation.---We are the more particular in adverting to this omission of Mr. St. John; because there is a like one in our principal writers on Criminal Law, not one of whom, as well as we can recollect, pointedly attends to all the statutes. We do not even except Staundford, though his work contains a chapter on the trial of crimes committed out of the realm. See Staundf. Pl. c. 89. a.]

Extract from Hollingshead's Chronicle in the Irish History, p. 102.

THE gouvernor, [lord Leonard Grey] turning the oportunitie of this skirmish [with some Irish revolvers] to his aduantage, shortly after rode to the north, preiding & spoiling Oneale with his confederats, who by reason of the late ouerthrow were able to make but little resistance. In this iornie he rased Saint Patrike his church in Downe, an old ancient citie of Ulster, and burnt the monuments of Patrike, Brigide, and Colme, who are said to haue bene there intoomed, as before is expressed in the description of Ireland. This fact lost him fundrie harts in that countrie, alwaies after detesting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Wherevpon conspiring with such of Mounster as were enemies to his gouernment, they booked vp diuerse complaints against him, which they did exhibit to the king and counsell. The articles of greatest importance laid to his charge were these.

1 Item, That notwithstanding he were stricly commanded by the king his maiestie, to apprehend his kinsman the yong Fitzgiralde, yet did he not onlie disobeie the kings letters as touching that point by plaieng bopeepe, but also had priue conference with the said Fitzgiralde, and laie with him two or three seuerall nights before he departed into France.

2 Item, That the cheefe cause that moued him to inuegle Thomas Fitzgiralde with such faire promises, proceeded of set purpose to haue him cut off, to the end there should be a gap set open for the yong Fitzgiralde to aspire to the earldome of Kildare.

3 Item, That he was so greedilie addicted to the pilling and polling of the king his subiects, namelie of such as were resiant in Mounster, as the beds he laie in, the cups he dranke in, the plate with which he was serued in anie gentlemans house, were by his seruants against right and reason packt vp, and carried with great extortion awaie.

4 Item, That without anie warrant from the king or counsell, he prophaned the church of Saint Patrike in Downe, turning it to a stable, after plucked it downe, and shipt the notable ring of bells that did hang in the steeple, meaning to haue sent them to England: had not God of his iustice preuented his iniquitie, by sinking the vessell and passengers wherein the said belles should haue bene conueied.

These and the like articles were with such odious presumptions coloured by his accusers, as the king and counsell remembring his late faults, and forgetting his former seruices (for commonlie all men are of so hard hap, that they shall be sooner for one trespass condemned, than for a thousand good deserts commended) gaue commandement, that the lord Greie should not onlie be remooued from the gouernment of the countrie, but also had him beheaded on the Tower-hill the eight and twentieth of June. But as touching the first article, that brought him most of all out of conceipt with the king, I moued question to the erle of Kildare, whether the tenor therof were true or false? His lordship thereto answered bona fide, that he neuer spake with the lord Greie, neuer sent messenger to him, nor receiued message or letter from him. Whereby maie be gathered, with how manie dangers they are inwrapped that gouerne prouinces, wherein diligence is twhackt with hatred, negligence is loden with tawnts, seueritie with perils menaced, liberalitie with thanklesse vnkindnesse contemned, conference to vndermining framed, flatterie to destruction forged, each in countenance smiling, diuerse in heart pouting, open fawning, secret grudging, gaping for such as shall succeed in gouernment, honouring magistrates with cap and knee as long as they are present, and carping them with toong and pen as soone as they are absent.

Extract from 1 Cox's History of Ireland, p. 264.

BEFORE we proceed farther in the affairs of Ireland, it will be fit to pay that respect to the memory of the late lord deputy (the lord Grey) as to give some account of his misfortunes and destiny. He had certainly performed considerable atchievements in Ireland, and great commendations of him are contained in most of the letters from the council to the king; and his majesty did so well approve of his good seruices, that he created him viscount Grany; and although the earl of Ormond, the lord chancellor Aller, the vice-treasurer Brabazon, and sir John Travers, went with him, or immediately followed him into England, to impeach him, yet he was kindly received by the king, and carried the sword before him on Whitsunday: nevertheless he was in a short time after imprisoned in the Tower, and accused of very many articles; the principal of which are these;

First, That O Connor feasted him, and mended Taghercroghan for him; and that in favour of O Molloy, a rebel, he took a castle from Dermond O Molloy, whose father-in-law O Carol was a good subject; for which the lord Grey had a bribe, and Stephen ap Harry had twenty cows.

Secondly, That he took the castle of Bir from a loyal O Carol, and gave it to a rebel O Carol, who married the earl of Kildare's daughter, and also took Moderhern, a castle belonging to the earl of Ormond, and gave it to the rebel O Carol, and wasted the earl of Ormond's lands: for which, he had an hundred and forty kine, and Stephen ap Harry had forty, and Girald Mac Gerrot had a black hackny.

Thirdly, That he took forty kine from O Kenedy, a tenant of the earl of Ormond's and his son for hostage.

Fourthly, That he held secret and private familiar correspondence with James of Desmond, and went to visit him in his tents in his night-gown, and forced the abbot of Owney to give him forty pounds sterling to preserve that abby from ruine, and O Brian to give him thirty kine and hostages; and Ulick Bourk, a bastard, gave him 100 marks to haue Ballinacloere Castle, and to be made Mac William; and that he carried the artillery in a small vessell to Galway, and made the town of Galway pay thirty-four pounds for that carriage.

VOL. XI.

Fifthly, That the exploits at Bryans bridge, &c. were in favour of O Bryan a rebel, Desmond's son-in-law, and to the prejudice of Donough O Bryan, a good subject; and that he took a bribe of eighty kine from Macnemarra.

Sixthly, That trusting Desmond and O Bryan, he hazarded the king's army in a long and dangerous journey, wherein Desmond quarrelled, and deserted him, and O Bryan sent but one man with a battle-ax to guide him.

Seventhly, That he rifled the abby of Ballyclare, and left neither chalice, cross nor bell in it.

Eighthly, That he destroyed the castles of Lecagh and Derriviclaghny, in favour of Ulick Burk, though the rightful proprietor offered submission and rent to the king.

Ninthly, That he had secret conference with, and received a horse from O Connor Roe, who was the chief instrument in conveying away the young Fitz-Girald.

Tenthly, That he took eighty kine from O Maddin, and forced O Mlaghlin's son from Mr. Dillon, whose lawful prisoner he was; for which he had seventy kine.

And there was a commission sent to Ireland, to examine witnesses; and they say that these articles were proved by the testimony of above seventy persons; whereof some were of quality, that is, some of them swore to one article, and some to another; so that the lord Grey (who was son to the marquess of Dorset, and viscount Grany in Ireland, but no peer in England) being tried by a common jury, thought it his best way to confess the indictment, in hopes of the king's grace and pardon; but in that he was mistaken; and although his services did infinitely over-balance his faults, yet he was publicly executed on the twenty-eighth day of July 1541.

There are four other articles mentioned by others, to be laid to his charge.

1. His partiality to his nephew Fitz-Girald (afterwards earl of Kildare) whom they say he might have taken.

2. That

2. That his servants pillaged the gentlemen in Munster, that entertained them.
 3. That he had inveigled Thomas Fitz-Gerald to submit, by promises which he had no commission to perform; and that he did it, to destroy that lord, that his own nephew might come to be earl of Kildare (as afterwards he did.)

4. His sacrilege at Down; but however that be, it was not long after his execution, before a commission was directed to archbishop Brown, and Cowly master of the rolls, to make an estimate or survey of the lord Grey's estate in Ireland, and to deliver it to the lord deputy Saintleger, to be disposed of as the king shall direct.

IX. The Trial of HENRY Earl of Surrey, for High Treason, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Guildhall, London, the 13th Dec. 1546; with the Proceedings against his Father THOMAS Duke of Norfolk, for the same Crime.

[The old chronicles give a very short and unsatisfactory account of the interesting process against these two eminent noblemen. But lord Herbert and bishop Burnet enter into the detail of it; and therefore we shall extract from them.]

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. p. 263 of 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d ed.

I SHALL conclude this year [1546.] with the disaster of the renowned lord the duke of Norfolk, and the execution of his son Henry the earl of Surrey, which pass'd in this manner, as our records tell us.

The dutchess Elizabeth, daughter to Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, having for many years entertain'd so violent jealousies of the duke her husband's matrimonial affection and loyalty, as it broke out at last to open rancour, divers occasions of scandal were given: insomuch, that not being content with having surmized a long while since two articles against him, she again, in sundry letters to the lord privy-seal, both averr'd the articles, and manifestly accus'd some of his minions, repeated divers hard usages she pretended to receive from them, and briefly discover'd all the ordinary passions of her offended sex. This again being urg'd in a time when the king was in his declining age, and for the rest, disquieted with scruples that the duke's greatness or interest in frequent times might interrupt the order he intended to give, was not unwillingly heard. So that notwithstanding his many important and faithful services, both in war and peace, at home and abroad, he and his son Henry earl of Surrey were expos'd to the malignity and detraction of their accusers. This again fell out in an unfortunate time: for besides that the lady his dutchess had now for above four years been separated from him; his son the earl of Surrey was but newly, and perchance, scarce reconcil'd with him; his daughter Mary dutchess of Richmond not only inclined to the protestant party, (which lov'd not the duke) but grown an extreme enemy of her brother: so that there was not only a kind of intestine division in his family, but this again many secret ways fomented.

Among which, the industry of one Mrs. Holland, thought to be the duke's favourite, appear'd not a little, as desirous (at what price soever) to conserve her self. Besides, divers at the king's council disaffected him, and particularly the earl of Holland, as knowing that after the king's death (now thought to be imminent) none was so capable to oppose him in the place he aspir'd to of protector. All which circumstances concurring, and being voiced abroad, encouraged divers of his adversaries to declare themselves: and the rather, because it was notorious, how the king had not only withdrawn much of his wonted favour, but promised impunity to such as could discover any thing concerning him.

The first that manifested himself was sir Richard Southwel, (a) who said that he knew certain things of the earl, that touch'd his fidelity to the king. The earl, before the lord chancellor Wriothesley, the lord St. John, the earl of Hertford, and others, vehemently affirmed himself a true man, desiring to be try'd by justice, or else offering himself to fight in his shirt with Southwel. (b) But the lords for the present only committed them. The duke this while, hearing his son was in trouble, sends to divers of his friends to know the cause, and particularly to the bishop of Winchester. (c) Those letters yet (it is probable) fell into the king's council's hands; but could not preserve him from being involved in his son's fortune: (d) So that he was sent for, and the same day, not long after his son, committed to the Tower. Divers persons also were examined concerning his affairs. Mrs. Elizabeth Holland being disposed, confess'd, that the duke had told her, that none of the king's council loved him, because they were no noblemen born themselves; as also because he believ'd too truly in the sacrament of the altar. Moreover, that the king loved him not, because he was too much lov'd in his country; but that he would follow his father's lesson, which was, that the less others set by him, the more he would set by himself. As also, that the duke complain'd that he was not of the most secret (or, as it is there term'd, the privy) council. And that the king was much grown of his body, and that he could not go up and down the stairs, but was let up and down by a device. And that his majesty was sickly, and could not long endure; and the realm like to be in an ill case thro' diversity of opinions. And that if he were a young man, and the realm in quiet, he would ask leave to see the vernacle; which he said, was the picture of Christ given to women by himself as he went to death. As touching his arms, that she had not heard the duke speak of his own, but of his son's, that he liked them not, and that he had gather'd them, himself knew not from whence; and that he placed the Norfolk's arms wrong, and had found fault with him: and therefore that she should take no pattern of his son's arms to work them with her needle in his house, but as he gave them. Furthermore, the confess'd that the earl of Surrey lov'd her not, nor the dutchess of Richmond him; and that she addicted her self much to the said dutchess.

Mary dutchess of Richmond being examin'd, confess'd, that the duke her father wou'd have had her marry sir Thomas Seymour, brother to the earl of Hertford, which her brother also desir'd, wishing her withal to endear her self so into the king's favour, as she might the better rule here as others had done; and that she refused: and that her father would have had the earl of Surrey to have matched with the earl of Hertford's daughter, which her brother likewise heard of (and that this was the cause of his father's displeasure) as taking Hertford to be his enemy. And that her brother was so much incens'd against the said earl, as the duke his father said thereupon, his son would lose as much as he had gather'd together.

Moreover, that the earl her brother should say, these new men loved no nobility; and if God call'd away the king, they should smart for it. And that her brother hated them all since his being in custody in Windsoor-Castle; but that her father seem'd not to care for their ill will, saying, his truth should bear him out. Concerning arms, she said, that she thought that her brother had more than seven rolls; and that some, that he had added more of Anjou, and of Lancelott Du-lac. And that her father since the attainder of the duke of Buckingham (who bare the king's arms) where the arms of her mother (daughter to the said duke) were rayned in his coat, had put a blank-quarter in the place, but that her brother had reassum'd them. Also that instead of the duke's coronet, was put to his arms a cap of maintenance purple, with powdered furr, and with a crown, to her judgment, much like to a close crown; and underneath the arms was a cipher, which she took to be the king's cipher, HR. As also that her father never said that the king hated him, but his counsellors; but that her brother said, the king was displeased with him (as he thought) for the loss of the great journey. Which displeasure, he conceiv'd, was set forward by them who hated him, for setting up an altar in the church at Boulogne. And that her brother should say, God long save my father's life; for if he were dead, they would shortly have my head. And that he reviled some of the present council, not forgetting the old cardinal. Also that he dissuaded her from going too far in reading the scripture. Some passionate words of her brother she likewise repeated, as also some circumstantial speeches, little for his advantage; yet so, as they seem'd much to clear her father.

Sir Edmund Knevet being examined, said, he knew no untruth directly by the earl of Surrey, but suspected him of dissimulation and vanity: and that a servant of his had been in Italy with cardinal Poole, and was receiv'd again at his return. Moreover, that he kept one Pasquil an Italian as a jester, but more likely a spy, and so reputed. He mentioned also one Peregrine an Italian entertain'd by the said earl; adding, that he lov'd to converse with strangers, and to conform his behaviour to them. And that he thought he had therein some great ill device.

One Thomas Pope also informed the council, that John Freeman told him, that the duke (at Nottingham, in the time of the commotion of the North) should say, in the presence of an hundred persons, that the Act of Uses was the worst act that ever was made, and that Freeman affirm'd those words before the lord Audeley, late lord chancellor. These depositions, together with others (as it seems) being brought to the king's judges at Norwich, they signified by their letter unto the lords of the council, dated Jan. 7. that the king's solicitor and Mr. Stamford had brought the indictments, and that they were found true, and the duke and his son indicted thereupon of high-treason; and that they made haste to bring the said indictment to London; desiring further to know whether sir Thomas Paston, sir Edmund Knevet, sir John Peer, and others, should be of the same jury. Upon the thirteenth (the king being now dangerously sick) the earl of Surrey was arraign'd in Guild-hall in London, before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commissioners. Where the earl, as he was of a deep understanding, sharp wit, and deep courage, defended himself many ways: sometimes denying their accusations as false, and together weakening the credit of his adversaries; sometimes interpreting the words he said, in a far other sense than that in which they were represented. For the point of bearing his arms (among which those of Edmund the Confessor are related) alledging that he had the opinion of heralds therein. And finally, when a witness was brought against him viva voce, who pretended to repeat some high words of the earl's by way of discourse, which concerned him nearly, and that thereupon the said witness should return a braving answer; the earl reply'd no otherwise to the jury, than that he left it to them to judge, whether it were probable that this man should speak thus to the earl of Surrey, and he not strike him again. In conclusion, he pleaded not guilty; but the jury (which was a common inquest, not of the peers, because the earl was not a parliament lord) condemn'd him. Whereupon also judgment of death was given, and he beheaded at Tower-hill. And thus ended the earl; a man learned, and of an excellent wit, as his compositions shew.

This while the king (though his sickness increased) omitted not to give order to seize on the duke's goods, and together to inform himself of all which might be material against him. Not forgetting also to cause Wriothesley to advertise the king's ambassadors in foreign parts, that the duke of Norfolk and his son had conspir'd to take upon them the government of the king, during his majesty's life, as also after his death to get into their hands the lord prince; but that their devices were revealed, and they committed to the Tower. And that for preventing uncertain bruits, they were willing to communicate the premisses. But the duke, who had now as much merit of ancient service to plead for him, as any subject of his time could pretend to, thought fit, from the Tower, to write unto the king in this manner (a).

Most Gracious and most Sovereign Lord,
I YOUR most humble subject prostitute at your foot, do most humbly beseech your highness to be my good and gracious lord. I am sure some great enemy of mine hath informed your majesty of some untrue matter against me. Sir, God doth know, in all my life, I never thought one untrue thought against you, or your succession, nor can no more judge or cast in my mind what should be laid to my charge, than the child that was born this night. And certainly, if I knew that I had offended your majesty in any point of untruth, I would declare the same to your highness. But (as God help me) I cannot accuse myself so much as in thought. Most noble and merciful sovereign lord, for all the old service I have done you in my life, be so good and gracious a lord unto me, that either my accusers and I together may be brought before your royal majesty; or if your pleasure shall not be to take that pains, then before your council: then if I shall not make it apparent that I am wrongfully accus'd, let me, without more respite, have punishment according to my deserts: Alas! most merciful prince, I have no refuge but only at your hands, and therefore at the reverence of Christ's passion have pity of me, and let me not be cast away by false enemies informations. Undoubtedly, I know not that I have offended any man, or that any man was offended with me, unless it were such as are angry with me for being quick against such as have been accused for sacramentaries. And as for all causes of religion, I say now, and have said to your majesty and many others, I do know you to be a prince of such virtue and knowledge, that whatsoever laws you have in times past made, or hereafter shall make, I shall to the extremity of my power stick unto them as long as my life shall last. So that if any men be angry with me for these causes, they do me wrong. Other cause I know not why any man should bear me any ill-will: and for this cause I know divers have done, as doth appear by casting libels abroad against me. Finally, (most gracious sovereign lord) I most humbly beseech your majesty to have pity of me, and let me recover your gracious favour, with taking of me all the lands and goods I have, or as much thereof as pleaseth your highness to take, leaving me what it shall please you to appoint; and that according as is before-written, I may know what is laid to my charge, and that I may hear some comfortable word from your majesty. And I shall during my life, pray for your prosperous estate long to endure.

Your most sorrowful subject,

THO. NORFOLK.

To the lords he wrote thus:

Item, Most humbly to beseech, my lords, that I might have some of the books that are at Lambeth; for unless I may have books to read ere I fall on sleep, and after I wake again, I cannot sleep, nor did not this dozen years.

Also to desire that I might have a ghostly father sent to me, and that I might receive my Maker.

Also that I might have mass, and to be bound upon my life to speak no word to him that shall say mass, which he may do in the other chamber, and I to remain within.

Item, To have license in the day-time to walk in the chamber without, and in the night to be lock'd in, as I am now. At my first coming I had a chamber without a-days. I would gladly have license to send to London, to buy one book of St. Augustin's, De Civitate Dei; and of Josephus, De Antiquitatibus; and another of Sabellicus; who doth declare most of any book that I have read, how the bishop of Rome from time to time hath usurp'd his power against all princes, by their unwise sufferance.

Item, For sheets.

Nevertheless, the duke remained as condemn'd to perpetual prison, without that his great services formerly render'd, or his submission on this occasion could restore him; which was in these words, as I find by our records in an original.

I THOMAS duke of Norfolk, do confess and acknowledge my self most untruly, and contrary to my oath and allegiance, to have offended the king's most excellent majesty, in the disclosing and opening of his privy and secret counsel, at divers and sundry times, to divers and sundry persons, to the great peril of his highness, and disappointing of his most prudent and regal affairs.

T. N.

Also, I likewise confess, That I have concealed high treason, in keeping secret the false and traitorous act, most presumptuously committed by my son Henry Howard earl of Surrey, against the king's majesty and his laws, in the putting and using the arms of St. Edward the Confessor, king of the realm of England before the Conquest, in his scutcheon or arms: Which said arms of St. Edward appertain only to the king of this realm, and to none other person or persons; whereunto the said earl by no means or way could make any claim or title, by me, or any of mine or his ancestors.

T. N.

Also, I likewise confess, That to the peril, slander, and dishonour of the king's majesty, and his noble son prince Edward, his son and heir apparent, I have against all right, unjustly, and without authority, born in the first quarter of my arms, ever since the death of my father, the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of silver, which are the proper arms of my said prince, to be born for this realm of England only; whereby I have not only done prejudice to the king's majesty, and the said lord the prince, but also given occasion that his highness might be disturbed or interrupted of the crown of this realm; and my said lord prince might be destroy'd, disturb'd, and interrupted in fame, body, and title of the inheritance to the crown of this realm. Which I know and confess, by the laws of the realm, to be high treason.

T. N.

For the which my said heinous offences, I have worthily deserv'd, by the laws of the realm, to be attain'd of high treason, and to suffer the punishment, losses and forfeitures that appertain thereunto. And although I be not worthy to have or enjoy any part of the king's majesty's clemency and mercy to be extended to me, considering the great and manifold benefits that I and mine have received of his highness: Yet I most humbly, and with a most sorrowful and repentant heart, do beseech his highness to have mercy, pity, and compassion on me. And I shall most devoutly and heartily make my daily prayer to God for the preservation of his most noble succession, as long as life and breath shall continue in me.

T. N.

Written the twelfth day of the month of January, in the year of our Lord God 1546. after the computation of the church of England, and in the thirty-eighth year of our sovereign lord Henry VIII. by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and of the church of England, and also of Ireland the supreme head. In witness of all the premisses, I the said duke have subscribed my name with my own hand, in the presence of the lord Wriothesley, lord chancellor; the lord St. John, lord president of the council; the earl of Hertford, lord great chamberlain; the viscount Lisle, lord high admiral; sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse; sir William Paget, secretary; sir Richard Rich, sir John Baker, of our said sovereign lord's privy-council; sir Richard Lister, sir Edward Montague, the two chief justices.

Without compulsion, without force, without advice or counsel, I have and do subscribe the premisses, submitting me only to the king's most gracious pity and mercy, most humbly beseeching his highness to extend the same unto me his most sorrowful subject.

By me THO. NORFOLK.

Notwithstanding all which submission, joined with the merits of his services, it was thought that the duke would hardly escape; had not the king's death, following shortly after, reserved him to more merciful times.

Extract from 1 Burn. Reformat. p. 345.

THE duke of Norfolk had been long lord treasurer of England: He had done great services to the crown on many signal occasions, and success had always accompanied him. His son the earl of Surrey was also a brave and noble person, witty and learned to an high degree, but did not command armies with such success. He was much provoked at the earl of Hertford's being sent over to France in his room, and upon that had said, that within a little while they should smart for it; with some other expressions that favoured of revenge, and a dislike of the king, and a hatred of the counsellors. The duke of Norfolk had endeavoured to ally himself to the earl of Hertford, and to his brother sir Thomas Seymour, perceiving how much they were in the king's favour, and how great an interest they were like to have under the succeeding prince; and therefore would have engaged his son, being then a widower, to marry that earl's daughter: and pressed his daughter, the dutchess of Richmond, widow to the king's natural son, to marry sir Thomas Seymour. But though the earl of Surrey advised his sister to the marriage projected for her, yet he would not consent to that designed for himself, nor did the proposition about his sister take effect. The Seymours could not but see the enmity the earl of Surrey bore them, and they might well be jealous of the greatness of that family; which was not only too big for a subject of it self, but was raised so high by the dependence of the whole popish party, both at home and abroad, that they were like to be very dangerous competitors for the chief government of affairs, if the king were once out of the way; whose disease was now growing to fast upon him, that he could not live many weeks. Nor is it unlikely that they persuaded the king; that if the earl of Surrey should marry the lady Mary, it might embroil his sons government, and perhaps ruine him. And it was suggested, that he had some such high project in his thoughts, both by his continuing unmarried, and by his using the arms of Edward the Confessor, which of late he had given in his coat, without a diminution. But to compleat the duke of Norfolk's ruine, his dutchess, who had complained of his using her ill, and had been separated from him about four years, turned informer against him. His son and daughter were also in ill terms together. So the sister informed all that she could against her brother. And one Mrs. Holland, for whom the duke was believed to have an unlawful affection, discovered all she knew. But all amounted to no more, than some passionate expressions of the son, and some complaints of the father, who thought he was not beloved by the king and his counsellors, and that he was ill used, in not being trusted with the secret of affairs. And all persons being encouraged to bring informations against them, Richard Southwell charged the earl of Surrey in some points that were of a higher nature: which the earl denied, and desired to be admitted, according to the martial law, to fight in his shirt with Southwell. But that not being granted, he and his father were committed to the Tower. That which was most insisted on was, their giving the arms of Edward the Confessor, which were only to be given by the kings of England. This the earl of Surrey justified, and said, they gave their arms, according to the opinion of the kings heralds. But all excuses availed nothing, for his father and he were designed to be destroyed, upon reasons of state; for which, some colours were to be found out.

The earl of Surrey being but a commoner, was brought to his tryal at Guildhall; and put upon an inquest of commoners consisting of nine knights and three esquires, by whom he was found guilty of treason, and had sentence of death passed upon him, which was executed on the 19th of January at Tower-hill. It was generally condemned, as an act of high injustice and severity, which loaded the Seimours with a popular odium that they could never overcome. He was much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities.

But the king, who never hated nor ruined any body by halves, resolved to compleat the misfortunes of that family, by the attainder of the father. And as all his eminent services were now forgotten, so the submissions he made, could not allay a displeasure, that was only to be satisfied with his life and fortune. He wrote to the king, protesting his innocency: That he had never a thought to his prejudice, and could not imagine what could be laid to his charge: He had spent his whole life in his service, and did not know that ever he had offended any person; or that any were displeased with him, except for prosecuting the breakers of the act about the sacrament of the altar. But in that, and in every thing else, as he had been always obedient to the kings laws, so he was resolved still to obey any laws he should make. He desired he might be examined with his accusers face to face, before the king, or at least before his council; and if it did not appear that he was wrongfully accused, let him be punished as he deserved. In conclusion he begged the king would have pity on him, and restore him to his favour; taking all his lands, or goods from him, or as much of them as he pleased. Yet all this had no effect on the king. So he was desired to make a more formal submission; which he did on the 12th of January under his hand, ten privy counsellors being witnesses. In it he confessed, 'First, his discovering the secrets of the kings council. Secondly, his concealing his sons treason, in using to give the arms of St. Edward the Confessor, which did only belong to the king, and to which his son had no right.

Thirdly, that he had ever since his fathers death, born in the first quarter of his arms, the arms of England: with a difference of the bells of silver, that are the proper arms of the prince; which was done in prejudice of the king and the prince: and gave occasion for disturbing or interrupting the succession to the crown of the realm. This he acknowledged was high treason; he confessed he deserved to be attainted of high treason; and humbly begged the kings mercy and compassion. He yielded to all this, hoping by such a submission and compliance to have overcome the kings displeasure. But his expectations failed him.

A parliament was called, the reason whereof was pretended to be the coronation of the prince of Wales. But it was thought the true cause of calling it, was, to attain the duke of Norfolk: for which they had not colour enough, to do it in a tryal by his peers. Therefore an attainder by act of parliament was thought the better way. So it was moved, that the king intending to crown his son, prince of Wales, desired they would go on with all possible haste in the attainder of the duke of Norfolk; that so these places, which he held by patent, might be disposed of by the king to such as he thought fit, who should assist at the coronation. And upon this slight pretence, since a better could not be found, the bill of attainder was read the first time on the 18th of January; and on the 19th and 20th it was read the second and third time. And so passed in the house of lords: and was sent down to the commons, who on the 24th sent it up also passed. On the 27th the lords were ordered to be in their robes, that the royal assent might be given to it: which the lord chancellor, with some others joyned in commission, did give by vertue of the kings letters patents. And it had been executed the next morning, if the kings death had not prevented it. Upon what grounds this attainder was founded, I can only give this account from the 34th act of the first parliament of queen Mary; in which this act is declared null and void, by the common law of the land; for I cannot find the act it self upon record. In the act of repeal it is said, 'That there was no special matter in the act of attainder, but only general words of treasons and conspiracies; and that out of their care of the preservation of the king and the prince, they passed it. But the act of repeal says also, That the only thing with which he was charged, was, for bearing of arms which he and his ancestors had born, both within and without the kingdom; both in the kings presence, and in the sight of his progenitors; which they might lawfully bear and give, as by good and substantial matter of record it did appear. It is also added, that the king dyed after the date of the commission. That the king only empowered them to give his assent, but did not give it himself: and that it did not appear by any record, that they gave it. That the king did not sign the commission with his own hand, his stamp being only set to it, and that not to the upper, but the nether part of it, contrary to the kings custom.' All these particulars though cleared afterwards, I mention now, because they give light to this matter.

As soon as the act was passed, a warrant was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, to cut off his head the next morning; but the king dying in the night, the lieutenant could do nothing on that warrant. And it seems it was not thought advisable to begin the new kings reign with such an odious execution. And thus the duke of Norfolk escaped very narrowly.

Extract from 3 Burn. Reformat. p. 167.

THE last transaction of importance in this reign, was the fall of the duke of Norfolk, and of the earl of Surrey, his son. I find in the council-book, in the year 1543, that the earl was accused for eating flesh in Lent, without licence; and for walking about the streets in the night, throwing stones against windows, for which he was sent to the Fleet. In another letter, he is complained of for riotous living. Towards the end of the year 1546, both he and his father were put in prison: And, it seems, the council wrote to all the king's ambassadors beyond sea, an account of this, much aggravated, as the discovery of some very dangerous conspiracy; which they were to represent to those princes, in very black characters. I put in the Collection an account given by Thirlby, of what he did upon it. The letter is long; but I only copy out that which relates to this pretended discovery: Dated from Hailbron, on Christmas-day 1546.

"He understood by the council's letters to him, what ungracious and ingrateful persons they were found to be. He professes, he ever loved the father, for he thought him a true servant to the king: He says, he was amazed at the matter, and did not know what to say. God had not only on this occasion, but on many others, put a stop to treasonable designs against the king, who (next to God) was the chief comfort of all good men. He enlarges much on the subject, in the stile of a true courtier. The messenger brought him the council's letters, written on the 15th of December, on Christmas-eve; in which he saw the malicious purpose of these two ungracious men: So, according to his orders, he went immediately to demand audience of the emperor; but the emperor intended to repose himself for three or four days, and so had refused audience to the nuncio, and to all other ambassadors; but he said, he would send a secretary, to whom he might communicate his business. Joyce, his secretary, coming to him, he set forth the matter as pompously as the council had represented it to him. In particular, he spoke of the haughtiness of the earl of Surrey, of all which the secretary promised to make report to the emperor, and likewise to write an account of it to Grandvil. Thirlby excuses himself that he durst not write of this matter to the king: He thought, it would renew in him the memory of the ingratitude of these persons, which must wound a noble heart."

After so black a representation, great matters might be expected: But I have met with an original letter of the duke of Norfolk's, to the lords of the council, writ indeed in so bad a hand, that the reading it was almost as hard as deciphering. It gives a very different account of that matter, at least with relation to the father. "He writes, that the lord great chamberlain, and the secretary of state, had examined him upon divers particulars: The first was, Whether he had a cypher with any man? He said, he had never a cypher with any man, but such as he had for the king's affairs, when he was in his service. And he does not remember that ever he wrote in cypher, except when he was in France, with the lord great master that now is, and the lord Rochford: Nor does he remember whether he wrote any letters then, or not; but these two lords signed whatsoever he wrote. He heard, that a letter of his was found among bishop Fox's papers, which being shewed to the bishop of Durresme, he advised to throw it into the fire. He was examined upon this: He did remember, the matter of it was, the setting forth the talk of the northern people, after the time of the commotions: But that it was against Cromwell, and not at all against the king: (so far did they go back, to find matter to be laid to his charge) "but whether that was in cypher, or not, he did not remember. He was next asked, If any person had said to him, that if the king, the emperor, and the French king came to a good peace, whether the bishop of Rome would break that by his dispensation; and whether he inclined that way. He did not remember he had ever heard any man speak to that purpose: But, for his own part, if he had twenty lives, he would rather spend them all, than that the bishop of Rome should have any power in this kingdom again. He had read much history, and knew well how his usurpation began, and increased: And both to English, French, and Scotts, he has upon all occasions spoken vehemently against it. He was also asked, if he knew any thing of a letter from Gardiner and Knevet, the king's ambassadors at the emperor's court, of a motion made to them for a reconciliation with that bishop, which was brought to the king at Dover, he being then there.

"In answer to this, he writes, He had never been with the king at Dover since the duke of Richmond died: But for any such overture, he had never heard any thing of it; nor did any person ever mention it to him. It had been said in council, when Francis Bryan was like to have died, as a thing reported by him, that the bishop of Winchester had said, he could devise a way to set all things right between the king and the bishop of Rome. Upon which, as he remembers, Francis Sadler was sent to Francis, to ask the truth of that: But Francis denied it; and this was all that ever he heard of any such overture. It " seems, these were all the questions that were put to him; to which, those were his answers. He therefore prayed the lords, to intercede with the king, that his accusers might be brought face to face, to say what they had against him: And he did not doubt, but it should appear, he was falsely accused. He desired to have no more favour than Cromwell had; he himself being present when Cromwell was examined. He adds, Cromwell was a false man; but he was a true, poor gentleman. He did believe, some false man had laid some great thing to his charge. He desired, if he might not see his accusers, that he might at least know what the matters were; and if he did not answer truly to every point, he desired not to live an hour longer.

" He had always been pursued by great enemies about the king; so that his fidelity was tried like gold. If he knew wherein he had offended, he would freely confess it. On Tuesday in the last Whitsun-week, he moved the king, that a marriage might be made between his daughter (the dutchess of Richmond) and sir Thomas Seymour; and that his son Surrey's children might, by cross-marriages, be allied to my lord great chamberlain's children (the earl of Hertford). He appealed to the king, whether his intention in these motions did not appear to be honest. He next reckons up his enemies. Cardinal Wolsey confessed to him at Ather, that he had studied for fourteen years, how to destroy him, set on to it by the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the lord Sandys, who often told him, that if he did not put him out of the way, he would undo him. When the marquis of Exeter suffered, Cromwell examined his wife more strictly concerning him, than all other men; of which she sent him word by her brother, the lord Mountjoy. And Cromwell had often said to himself, that he was a happy man, that his wife knew nothing against him, otherwise she would undo him. The late duke of Buckingham, at the bar, where his father late lord high steward, said, that he himself was the person in the world, whom he had hated most, thinking he had done him ill offices with the king: But he said, he then saw the contrary. Rice, that married his sister, often said, he wished he could find the means to thrust his dagger in him. It was well known to many ladies in the court, how much both his two nieces, whom it pleased the king to marry, had hated him. He had discovered to the king That for which his mother-in-law was attainted of misprision of treason. He had always served the king faithfully, but had of late received greater favours of him, than in times past: What could therefore move him to be now false to him? A poor man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. Alas! alas! my lords, (writes he) that ever it should be thought any untruth to be in me. He prays them to lay this before the king, and jointly to beseech him, to grant the desires contained in it. So he ends it with such submissions, as he hoped might mollify the king."

Here I must add a small correction, because I promised it to the late sir Robert Southwell, for whose great worth and virtues I had that esteem, which he well deserved. Sir Richard Southwell was concerned in the evidence against the duke of Norfolk: He gave me a memorandum, which I promised to remember when I reviewed my History. There were two brothers, sir Richard and sir Robert, who were often confounded, an R serving for both their christened names. Sir Richard was a privy-councillor to Henry the VIIIth, king Edward, and queen Mary: The second brother, sir Robert, was master of the rolls, in the time of Henry the eighth, and in the beginning of Edward the sixth. I had confounded these, and in two several places called sir Richard master of the rolls.

I have now set forth all that I find concerning the duke of Norfolk; by which it appears, that he was designed to be destroyed only upon suspicion; and his enemies were put on running far back to old stories, to find some colours to justify so black a prosecution. This was the last act of the king's reign, which, happily for the old duke, was not finished, when the king's death prevented the execution.

Bishop Thirlby's letter concerning the duke of Norfolk and his son.

An Original.

I WOULD write unto you my harte (if I could) against those two ungracious, ingrate, and inhumane non homines, the duke of Norfolk and his sonne. The elder of whom, I confess that I did love, for that I ever supposed him a true servant to his master; like as both his allegiance, and the manifold benefits of the king's majestie bounde him to have been; but now when I sholde begyn to wright to you herin, before God I am so amazed at the matter, that I know not what to say; therefore I shall leave them to receyve for their deeds, as they have worthily deserved; and thank God of his grace that hath openyd this in tyme, so that the king's majestie may see that reformed. And in this point, wher Almighty God hath not nowe alone, but often and sondry tymes hertofore, not only letted the malice of such as hathe imagenyd any treason against the king's majestie, the chiefe comforte, wealth, and prosperite of all good Englishmen next unto God; but hath so wonderfully manifest, that in suche tyme that his majesties high wisdom myght let that malice to take his effecte, all good Englishmen cannot therefore thanke God enough. And for our parts, I pray God, that we may thorough his grace, so contynue his servants, that hereafter we be not founde unworthy to receyve suche a benefyte at his hands. On Christmas-even, about 10 of the clocke after noon here aryved Somerset with the letters of the king's majesties most honourable counsell, dated the 15th of December at Westminster, whereby I perceyved the malicious purpose of the said two ungracious men: and for the execution of the king's majesties commandment declared in the same letters, I sudy immediately for audience to the emperor, who entered this town within halfe an houer after Somerset was come. The emperor praised me of patience, and to declare to the secretaire Joyse, That I wolde saie to him. For he said he had determyned to repose him selfe for 3 or 4 days; and had therefore for that tyme refused audience to the nuntio, the ambassador of France, and the ambassador of Venice, which had sued for audience. On Christmas-day on the morning, at nine of the clocke, Joyse came to my lodgings, to whom I declared as well as I coule the great benefits theis ungracious men had receyved at the king's majesties hands, and how unkindly and traytorously they went about to searve him, with the rest as myn instructions led me. The king's majestie, my master (taking the same affection to be in the emperor, his good brother, towards him, that his highnes hathe to the emperor, (ut amicorum omnia sint communia, gaudere cum gaudentibus, flere cum flentibus,) hath commanded me to open this matter to the emperor: that as naturally all men, and much more princes, ought to abhorre traytors, and specially suche as had receyved so great benefytes as theis men had; so his majestie might rejoyse that the king's highnes his good brother had founde forthe this matter, or the malice coule be brought to execution. Secretary Joyse said that he would advertise the emperor herof accordingly, and after a little talke of the haughtines of the earle of Surrey, and a few salutations, he bad me fare well. When I asked him for monsieur de Grandevilla, to whom I said, that I wolde tell this tale, for that I doubted not but that he, and all honest men wolde abhorre such traytors; he said that he was not yet come, but he wolde this day advertise him herof by his letters; for I wright (quoth he) daily to him. Albeit that this be the hole, and the effecte of that I have done in the execution of the king's majesties commandment, declared in my said lord's letters, yet I will as my dutie is, answer a-part their said letters to the king's majestie. Herin I dare not wright. For, to enter the matter, and not to detest that as the cause requireth, I think it not convenient. And again on the other side, to renew the memorie of these mens ingratitude, (wherwith all noble and princely hartes above all others be sore wounded) I thinke it not wisdom. Therefore I beseeche you hartely, amongst other my good lords, there to make my most humble excuse to his majestie for the same. This ungracious matter that hath happened otherwise then ever I could have thought, hath caused you to have a longer letter then ever I have bene accustomed to wright. Ye shall herewith receyve a scedule of courte newis, whiche havynge lernyd while I wrote this; secretaire Joyse hathe prayed me to sende the letter herewith enclosed to the emperor's ambassador in England, which I pray you to cause to be delivered, and hartely fare you well. From Halebourne the Christmas-day at night, 1546.

VOL. XI.

Your assured loving friend,

Tho. Westm'

Herewith ye shall also receyve the copie of my letters of the 19th of this moneth, sent by Skipperus, &c.

A letter of the duke of Norfolk's, after he had been examined in the Tower.

MY very good lords, whereas at the being here with me of my lord great chamberlayne, and Mr. Secretary, they examynd me of divers thyngs, which as near as I can call to my remembrance were the effects as here after doth ensue.

First, Whether ther was any cipher betwene me and any other man: For answer wherunto, this is the truth, there was never cipher between me and any man, save only such as I have had for the king's majestie, when I was in his service. And as God be my judge, I do not remember that ever I wrote in cipher, but at such time as I was in France; my lord great master that now is, and my lord of Rochford being in commission with me. And whether I wrote any then, or not, as God help me, I do not remember; but and I wrote any thing, I am sure both their hands were at it; and the master of the horse privy to the same. I do remember that after the death of the bishop of Hereford, Fox, it was shewed me that the said bishop had left a letter, which I had sent him, amongst his writings, which being found by a servant of his, that is now with master Dery, who shewd the same to the bishop of Durham that now is, he caused him to throw the same in fier. As I do remember, it was my said lord bishop of Durham that advised him to burn it; and as I also do remember, the matter that was conteyned therein, concerned lewde speaking of the Northern men after the time of the comotion against the said Cromwell. If there had been any thyng concerning the king's majesties affairs, neyther the bishop, nor he, were he now alyve, would not have concealed the same; and whether any part of that was in cypher, or not, as I shall answer to God, I do not remember.

The effect of another question, there asked me, was, as near as I can call to my remembrance, whether anie man had talked with me, that and ther were a good peace made betwene the king's majestie the emperor and the French king, the bishop of Rome would brek the same againe by his dispensation? And whether I enclined that waies, or not, to that purpose? As God help me now, at my most nede, I cannot call to my remembrance, that ever I heard any man living speak like words. And as for mine inclinations, that the bishop of Rome should ever have authority to do such thing; if I had twentie lives, I would rather have spent them all against him, then ever he should have any power in this realme. For no man knoweth that better then I, by reding of stories, how his usurped power hath increased from time to time. Nor such time as the king's majestie hath found him his enemy, no living man hath, both in his harte and with his tounge, in this realme, in France, and also to many Scottish jantlemen, spoken more sore against his said usurped powre, then I have done, as I can prove by good witness.

Also my said lord and Mr. Secretary asked me, whether I was ever made privy to a letter, sent from my lord of Winchester and sir Henry Knevi, of any overture made by Grandevilla to them, for a way to be taken between his majestie and the bishop of Rome; and that the said letters should have come to his majestie to Dover, I being there with him. Wherunto this is my true answer. I was never at Dover with his highnes since my lord of Richmond died, but at that time, of whose death word came to Syttingborne; and as God be my helpe, I never heard of no such overture overture, save that I do well remember, at such time as sir Francis Biryen was fore like, and like to have died, it was spoken in the councill, that my lord of Winchester should have said, he cou'd devise a way, how the king's majestie might have all things upright with the said bishope of Rome, and his highnes honour saved. Suche were the words, or much like. Whereupon, as I had often said in the councill, one was sent to the said sir Francis, to know, if ever he heard the said bishope speake like words; which he denied: and as I do remember, it was sir Rauf Sadler, that was sent to the said sir Francis. And to say that ever I heard of any such overture made by Grandville, or that ever I commoned with any man concerning any such mater, other then this of the bishope of Winchester, as God be my help, I never dyd; nor unto more, thenne this, I was never prevye.

Now, my good lords, having made answer according to the truth of such questions as hath been asked me, most humble I beseeche you all to be mediators for me to his most excellent majestie, to cause such as have accused me (if it might be with his high pleasure) to come before his majestie, to lay to my charge afore me, face to face, what they can say against me: and I am in no dout, so to declare my selfe, that it shall appere I am falsly accused. And if his pleasure shall not be, to take the paine in his royall person, then to give you commandment to do the same. My lords, I trust ye think Cromwell's service and mine hath not be like; and yet my desire is, to have no more favour shew'de to me, than was shew'de to him, I being present. He was a fals man; and sewerly I am a trewe poore jantleman.

My lords, I think surelie there is some fals man, that have laid some great cause to my charge, or else I had not be sent hither. And therefore, estsonys most humble I beseeche to finde the names, if they and I may not be brought face to face, yet let me be made privy what the causes are; and if I do not answer truely to every point, let me not live one howre after. For sewerlie I would hide nothing of any questions that I shall know, that doth concern my self, nor any other creature.

My lords, there was never gold tried better by fier and watter then I have been, nor hath had greater enemys about my soveraign lord, then I have had; and yet (God be thanked) my trouth hath ever tried me, as I dout not it shall do in theis causes. Suerly, if I knew any thought I had offended his majestie in, I would suerly have declared it to his person.

Upon the Tuesdays in Whitsunweek last past, I broke unto his majestie, moste humblely beseeching him to helpe, that a mariage might be had between my daughter and sir Thomas Semour: and wheras my son of Surey hath a son and divers daughters; that, with his favour, a crosse mariage might have been made between my lord great chamberline and them: and also wher my son Thomas hath a son, that shall (be his mother) spend a thousand marks a yere, that he might be in like wise married to one of my said lord's daughters. I report me to your lordships, whether my intent was honest in this motion, or not. And whereas I have written; that my truth hath been severly tried, and that I have had great enemies. First, The cardinall did confes to me at Affer, that he had gone about fourteen years to have destroyed me; saying, he did the same by the setting upon of my lord of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and my lord Sands; who said often to him, that if he found not the means to put me out of the way, at length I should sewerly undo him.

Cromwell, at such tyme as the marquis of Exeter suffred, examined his wife more streitly of me, then of all other men in the realme, as she sent me word by her brother, the lord Montjoy. He hath said to me himself many times, my lord, ye are an happy man, that your wife knoweth no hurt by you; for if she did, she would undo you.

The duke of Buckingham confessed openly at the bar, (my father sitting as his judge) that of all men living he hated me most, thinking I was the man that had hurt him most to the king's majestie: which now, quoth he, I perceive the contrary.

Rice, who had married my sister, confessed, that (of all men living) he hated me most; and wished many times, how he might find the meanes to thrust his dagger in me.

What malice both my neecys, that it pleased the king's highnes to marie, did bere unto me, is not unknown to such ladies as kept them in this fute; as my lady Herberd, my lady Tirwit, my lady Kynston, and others, which heard what they said of me. Who tried out the falshod of the lord Darcy, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer, Aske, and many others, for which they suffer'd for? but only I. Who shewed his majestie of the words of my mother-in-law, for which she was attainted of misprision? but only I. In all times past unto this time, I have shewed my self a most trewe man to my soveraign lord. And since these things done in tymes past, I have received more proffight of his highnes, then ever I did afore. Alas! who can think, that I, having been so long a trew man, should now be false to his majestie? I have received more proffight then I have deserved: and a poore man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. For whose sake should I be an untrew man to them? Alas, alas, my lords, that ever it should be thought any ontruthe to be in me.

Fynally my good lords estsonys most humble I beseech you to shew this scrible letter to his majestie, and all joyntly to beseech his highnes to grante me the petitions that are conteyned in the same, and most especyally to remyt out of his most noble gentle hart such displeasure as he hath conceyved against me: and I shall dewryng my lyff pray for the continuance of his most royall estate long to endure,

By his highnes poor prisoner,

T. Norfolk.

X. Proceedings against various Persons in the Reign of Henry VIII. for Treason, in denying the King's Supremacy, and other capital Crimes, principally relating to Religion.

[Bishop Burnet closes the first volume of his History of the Reformation with a summary account of various trials and attainders, in the reign of Hen. VIII. in order to exhibit at one view the severities practised by that prince against the popish party; and as very few of the trials mentioned are included in the present collection of State Trials, we flatter ourselves, that our insertion of this part of the bishop's work will not be deemed foreign to the present undertaking. i Burn. Reform. 351. to 362. It is observable, that, though by the bishop's own acknowledgment, the king's severity to the popish party furnishes great ground for just censure; and though he states many instances of violating the first principles of justice and humanity; yet he denies, that there is any thing to justify all the clamours of the Roman Catholicks against his memory, insisting too, that his cruelties were far short both in number and degree of those in queen Mary's reign. But really this is writing too tenderly of Henry; for there is not only grievous, but almost equal cause to detest the memories of both him and Mary, the barbarities exercised in the reign of each being too numerous to leave room for much distinction between them. When two princes both with characters of so dark a complexion are to be delineated, it calls for very nice touches to discriminate them in the colouring.]

Extrait from i Burn. Reformat. from p. 351. to 362.

IN the latter part of his reign, there were many things that seem great severities, especially as they are represented by the writers of the Roman party; whose relations are not a little strengthened by the faint excuses, and the mistaken accounts, that most of the protestant historians have made. The king was naturally impetuous, and could not bear provocation; the times were very ticklish; his subjects were generally addicted to the old superstition, especially in the northern parts; the monks and friers were both numerous and wealthy; the pope was his implacable enemy; the emperor was a formidable prince, and being then master of all the Netherlands, had many advantages for the war he designed against England. Cardinal Pole, his kinsman, was going over all the courts of Christendom, to perswade a league against England; as being a thing of greater necessity and merit than a war against the Turk. This being, without the least aggravation, the state of affairs at that time, it must be confessed he was fore put to it. A superstition that was so blind and headstrong, and enemies that were both so powerful, so spiteful, and so industrious, made rigour necessary: nor is any general of an army more concerned to deal severely with spies and intelligencers, than he was to proceed against all the popes adherents, or such as kept a correspondence with Pole. He had observed in history, that upon much less provocation than himself had given, not only several emperors and foreign princes had been dispossessed of their dominions; but two of his own ancestors Henry the 2d and king John had been driven to great extremities, and forced to unusual and most indecent submissions by the means of the popes and their clergy.

The popes power over the clergy was so absolute, and their dependence and obedience to him was so implicate; and the popish clergy had so great an interest in the superstitious multitude, whose consciences they governed, that nothing but a stronger passion could either tame the clergy, or quiet the people. If there had been the least hope of impunity, the last part of his reign would have been one continued rebellion; therefore to prevent a more profuse effusion of blood, it seemed necessary to execute laws severely in some particular instances.

There is one calumny that runs in a thread through all the historians of the popish side, which not a few of our own have ignorantly taken up; that many were put to death for not swearing the kings supremacy. It is an impudent falshood; for not so much as one person suffered on that account; nor was their any law for any such oath before the parliament liament in the 28th year of the kings reign, when the unsufferable bull of pope Paul the 3d, engaged him to look a little more to his own safety. Then indeed in the oath for maintaining the succession of the crown, the subjects were required, under the pains of treason, to swear that the king was supream head of the church of England; but that was not mentioned in the former oath, that was made in the 25th, and enacted in the 26th year of his reign. It cannot but be confessed, that to enact under pain of death that none should deny the kings titles, and to proceed upon that against offenders, is a very different thing from forcing them to swear the king to be the supream head of the church. (a)

The first instance of these capital proceedings was in Easter-Term, in the beginning of the 27th year of his reign. Three priors, and a monk, of the Carthusian order, were then endited of treason, for saying, that the king was not supream head under Christ of the church of England. These were John Houghton prior of the Charter-house near London, Augustin Webster prior of Axholme, Robert Laurence prior of Bevoil, and Richard Reynolds a monk of Sion. This last was esteemed a learned man, for that time, and that order. They were tried in Westminster-Hall by a commission of oyer and terminer: they pleaded not guilty, but the jury found them guilty, and judgment was given that they should suffer as traitors. The record mentions no other particulars; but the writers of the popish side make a splendid recital of the courage and constancy they expressed both in their tryal, and at their death. It was no difficult thing for men so used to the legend, and the making of fine stories for saints and martyrs of their orders, to dress up their narratives with much pomp. But as their pleading not guilty to the indictment, shews no extraordinary resolution, so the account that is given by them of one Hall a secular priest that died with them, is so false, that their is good reason to suspect all. He is said to have suffered on the same account; but the record of his attainder gives a very different relation of it.

He and Robert Feron were endited at the same time for having said many spiteful and treasonable things; as, that the king was a tyrant, an heretick, a robber, and an adulterer; that they hoped he should die such a death as king John and Richard the 3d died; that they looked when those in Ireland and Wales should invade England; and they were assured that three parts of four in England would be against the king: they also said that they should never live merrily till the king and the rulers were plucked by the pates, and brought to the pot, and that it would never be well with the church till that was done. Hall had not only said this, but had also written it to Feron the 10th of March that year. When they were brought to the bar, they at first pleaded not guilty; but full proof being brought, they themselves confessed the indictment, before the jury went aside, and put themselves on the kings mercy: upon which, this being an imagining and contriving both war against the king, and the kings death, judgment was given as in cases of treason: but no mention being made of Feron's death, it seems he had his pardon. Hall suffered with the four Carthusians, who were hanged in their habits.

They proceeded no further in Easter-Term: but in Trinity-Term there was another commission of oyer and terminer, by which Humphrey Middlemore, William Exmew, and Sebastian Nudigate, three monks of the Charter-house near London, were endited of treason, for having said on the 25th of May, that they neither could nor would consent to be obedient to the kings highness, as true lawful and obedient subjects; to take him to be supream head on earth of the church of England. They all pleaded not guilty, but were found guilty by the jury; and judgment was given. When they were condemned, they desired that they might receive the body of Christ before their death. But (as judge Spelman writ) the court would not grant it, since that was never done in such cases but by order from the king. Two days after that, they were executed. Two other monks of that same order, John Rochester and James Wolver, suffered on the same account at York in May this year. Ten other Carthusian monks were shut up within their cells, where nine of them dyed. The tenth was hanged in the beginning of August. Concerning those persons I find this said in some original letters, that they had brought over into England, and vented in it, some books that were written beyond sea, against the kings marriage, and his other proceedings; which being found in their house, they were pressed to peruse the books that were written for the king, but obstinately refused to do it. They had also been involved in the business of the Maid of Kent, for which, though all the complices in it, except those who suffered for it, were pardoned by act of parliament, yet such as had been concerned in it, were still under jealousy: and it is no wonder that upon new provocations they met with the uttermost rigor of the law.

These tryals made way for two others that were more signal: of the bishop of Rochester, and sir Thomas More. The first of these had been a prisoner above a year, and was very severely used: he complained in his letters to Cromwell, that he had neither cloaths nor fire, being then about fourscore. This was understood at Rome, and upon it, pope Clement, by an officious kindness to him, or rather in spite to king Henry, declared him a cardinal, and sent him a red-hat. When the king knew this, he sent to examine him about it; but he protested he had used no endeavours to procure it, and valued it so little, that if the hat were lying at his feet, he would not take it up. It never came nearer him than Picardy: yet this did precipitate his ruine. But if he had kept his opinion of the kings supremacy to himself, they could not have proceeded further. He would not do that, but did upon several occasions speak against it, so he was brought to his tryal on the 17th of June. The lord chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, and some other lords, together with the judges, sat upon him by a commission of oyer and terminer. He pleaded not guilty, but being found guilty, judgment was passed on him to die as a traitor; but he was by a warrant from the king, beheaded. Upon the 22d of June, being the day of his execution, he dressed himself with more than ordinary care; and when his man took notice of it, he told him, he was to be that day a bridegroom. As he was led to the place of execution, being stoped in the way by the croud, he opened his New Testament, and prayed to this purpose; that, as that book had been his companion and chief comfort in his imprisonment, so then some place might turn up to him, that might comfort him in his last passage. This being said, he opened the book at a venture, in which these words of St. Johns Gospel turned up: this is life eternal to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. So he shut the book with much satisfaction, and all the way was repeating and meditating on them. When he came to the scaffold he pronounced the Te Deum, and after some other devotions his head was cut off.

Thus died John Fisher bishop of Rochester, in the 80th year of his age. He was a learned and devout man, but much addicted to the superstitions in which he had been bred up: and that led him to great severities against all that opposed them. He had been for many years confessor to the kings grand-mother, the countess of Richmond; and it was believed that he persuaded her to those noble designs for the advancement of learning, of founding two colleges in Cambridge, St. Johns and Christs College, and divinity professors in both universities. And in acknowledgment of this, he was chosen chancellor of the university of Cambridge. Henry the 7th gave him the bishoprick of Rochester, which he, following the rule of the primitive church, would never change for a better. He used to say his church was his wife, and he would never part with her, because she was poor. He continued in great favour with the king, till the business of the divorce was set on foot; and then he adhered so firmly to the queens cause, and the popes supremacy, that he was carried by that headlong into great errors; as appears by the business of the Maid of Kent. Many thought the king ought to have proceeded against him rather upon that, which was a point of state, than upon the supremacy, which was matter of conscience. But the king was resolved to let all his subjects see, there was no mercy to be expected by any that denied his being supream head of the church; and therefore made him and More, two examples for terrifying the rest. This being much censured beyond sea, Gardiner, that was never wanting in the most servile compliances, wrote a vindication of the kings proceedings. The lord Herbert had it in his hands, and tells us it was written in elegant Latin, but that he thought it too long, and others judged it was too vehement, to be inserted in his history.

On the 1st of July, sir Thomas More was brought to his tryal. The special matter in his indictment, is, that on the 7th of May preceding, before Cromwell, Bedyll, and some others that were pressing him concerning the kings supremacy, he said he would not meddle with any such matter, and was fully resolved to serve God, and think upon his passion, and his own passage out of this world. He had also sent diverse messages by one George Gold to Fisher to encourage him in his obstinacy; and said, the act of parliament is like a sword with two edges; for if a man answer one way, it will confound his soul; and if he answer another way, it will confound his body. He had said the same thing on the 3d of June, in the hearing of the lord chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, and others; and that he would not be the occasion of the shortning his own life. And when Rich the kings solicitor came to deal with him further about it, but protested that he came not with any authority to examine him, they discoursed the matter fully. Rich pressed him, that since the parliament had enacted that the king was supream head, the subjects ought to agree to it; and said Rich, what if the parliament should declare me king, would you not acknowledge me? I would, said More, quia (as it is in the indictment) rex per parlamentum fieri potest, & per parlamentum deprivari. But More turned the argument on

(a) [This sounds more like an apology, than just reasoning. Enforcing the oath of supremacy by the penalty of treason, was resorting to the highest punishment known to our law. Wherein, too, consisted the material difference, in point of rigor, between treason for not swearing to the king's supremacy, and treason for denying it? Was it not equally the object of the statutes creating both crimes, to compel an acknowledgment of the king's supremacy by the same extremity of punishment? Can there be any reason to suppose, that those who were concerned in the deaths of bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More for denying the supremacy, if it had been requisite, would have been so scrupulous as to hesitate about construing the refusal of the oath a denial? When it is objected to Henry as a cruelty, that many were put to death for not swearing to his supremacy, without doubt every denial of it, whether impliedly by refusing the oath, or expressly by words, was meant: Therefore it is foreign to the spirit of the remark to say, that they were thus punished for denying the supremacy, not for refusing to swear to it. So verbal an answer to the animadversion of Henry's enemies would scarce have escaped the learned bishop, if he had not been insensibly influenced by a fear, lest the justice and propriety of the Reformation should be prejudiced by the cruelty of Henry's measures in its commencement. But the cause of truth is never finally helped by an ill-founded argument. The Reformation rests on a better foundation than the humanity of Henry's actions; nor is there any necessary connection between the one and the other, bad and cruel princes being frequently the casual instruments of great good to society.]

Rich,

Rich, and said, what if the parliament made an act that God was not God? Rich acknowledged it could not bind, but replied to More, that since he would acknowledge him king, if he were made so by act of parliament, why would he not acknowledge the king supreme head, since it was enacted by parliament? To that More answered, that the parliament had power to make a king, and the people were bound to acknowledge him, whom they made; but for the supremacy, though the parliament had enacted it, yet those in foreign parts had never assented to it. This was carried by Rich to the king, and all these particulars were laid together, and judged to amount to a denial of the supremacy. Judge Spelman writ, that More, being on his trial, pleaded strongly against the statute that made it treason to deny the supremacy, and argued that the king could not be supreme head of the church. When he was brought to the bar, he pleaded not guilty, but being found guilty, judgment was given against him as a traitor. He received it with that equal temper of mind, which he had shewed in both conditions of life, and then set himself wholly to prepare for death. He expressed great contempt of the world, and that he was weary of life, and longed for death; which was so little terrible to him, that his ordinary facetiousness remained with him even on the scaffold. It was censured by many, as light and undecent. But others said, that way having been so natural to him on all other occasions, it was not at all affected; but shewed that death did no way discompose him, and could not so much as put him out of his ordinary humour. Yet his rallying every thing on the scaffold was thought to have more of the Stoick than the Christian in it. After some time spent in secret devotions, he was beheaded on the 6th of July.

Thus did Thomas More end his days, in the 53d year of his age. He was a man of rare virtues, and excellent parts. In his youth he had freer thoughts of things, as appears by his Utopia, and his letters to Erasmus; but afterwards he became superstitiously devoted to the interests and passions of the popish clergy: and as he served them when he was in authority, even to assist them in all their cruelties; so he employed his pen in the same cause, both in writing against all the new opinions in general, and in particular against Tindal, Frith, and Barnes, as also an unknown writer, who seemed of neither party, but reproved the corruptions of the clergy, and condemned their cruel proceedings. More was no divine at all, and it is plain to any that reads his writings, that he knew nothing of antiquity, beyond the quotations he found in the canon-law and in the master of the sentences (only he had read some of St. Austins treatises): for upon all points of controversy, he quotes only what he found in these collections; nor was he at all conversant in the critical learning upon the scriptures; but his peculiar excellency in writing, was, that he had a natural easie expression, and presented all the opinions of popery with their fair side to the reader, disguising or concealing the black side of them with great art; and was no less dextrous in exposing all the ill consequences that could follow on the doctrine of the reformers: and had upon all occasions great store of pleasant tales, which he applied wittily to his purpose. And in this consists the great strength of his writings, which were designed rather for the rabble, than for learned men. But for justice, contempt of money, humility, and a true generosity of mind, he was an example to the age in which he lived.

But there is one thing unjustly added to the praise of these two great men, or rather feigned, on design to lessen the kings honour; that Fisher and he penned the book which the king wrote against Luther. This Sanders first published, and Bellarmin and others since have taken it up upon his authority. Strangers may be pardoned such errors, but they are inexcusable in an Englishman. For in Mores printed works there is a letter written by him out of the Tower to Cromwell, in which he gives an account of his behaviour concerning the kings divorce and supremacy. Among other particulars one is, that when the king shewed him his book against Luther, in which he had asserted the popes primacy to be of divine right, More desired him to leave it out; since as there had been many contests between popes and other princes, so there might fall in some between the pope and the king; therefore he thought it was not fit for the king to publish any thing, which might be afterwards made use of against himself; and advised him either to leave out that point, or to touch it very tenderly: but the king would not follow his counsel, being perhaps so fond of what he had writ, that he would rather run himself upon a great inconvenience, than leave out any thing that he fancied so well written. This shews that More knew that book was written by the kings own pen; and either Sanders never read this, or maliciously concealed it, lest it should discover his foul dealing.

These executions so terrified all people, that there were no further provocations given: and all persons either took the oaths, or did so dextrously conceal their opinions, that till the rebellions of Lincolnshire, and the north, broke out, none suffered after this upon a publick account. But when these were quieted, then the king resolved to make the chief authors and leaders of those commotions publick examples to the rest. The duke of Norfolk proceeded against many of them by martial law. There were also trials at common law of a great many more that were taken prisoners, and sent up to London. The lords Darcy and Huffie were tried by their peers, the marquess of Exeter sitting steward. And a commission of oyer and terminer being issued out for the trial of the rest, Robert Constable, John Bulmer and his lady, Francis Pigot, Stephen Hamilton, and Thomas Percy, and Ask, that had been their captain, with the abbots of Whalley, Jervoux, Bridlington, Lenton, Woburn, and Kingstead, and Mackrall the monk that first raised the Lincolnshire rebellion, with sixteen more, were indicted of high treason, for the late rebellions. And after all the steps of the rebellion were reckoned up, it is added in the indictment, that they had met together on the 17th of January, and consulted how to renew it, and prosecute it further, being encouraged by the new risings that were then in the north; by which they had forfeited all the favour to which they could have pretended, by virtue of the indemnity that was granted in the end of December, and of the pardons which they had taken out. They were all found guilty, and had judgment as in cases of treason. Divers of them were carried down into Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, and executed in the places where their treasons were committed; but most of them suffered at London, and among others the lady Bulmer (whom others call John Bulmers harlot) was burnt for it in Smithfield.

The only censure, that passed on this, was, that advantages were taken on too slight grounds to break the kings indemnity and pardon: since it does not appear, that after their pardon they did any thing more than meet and consult. But the kingdom was so shaken with that rebellion, that, if it had not been for the great conduct of the duke of Norfolk, the king had by all appearance lost his crown. And it will not seem strange, that a king (especially so tempered as this was) had a mind to strike terror into the rest of his subjects, by some signal examples, and to put out of the way the chief leaders of that design: nor was it to be wondered at, that the abbots and other clergymen, who had been so active in that commotion, were severely handled. It was by their means that the discords were chiefly fomented. They had taken all the oaths that were enjoined them, and yet continued to be still practising against the state; which, as it was highly contrary to the peaceable doctrines of the Christian religion, so it was in a special manner contrary to the rules, which they professed. That obliged them to forsake the world, and to follow a religious and spiritual course of life.

The next example of justice was a year after this, of one Forrest an Observant frier. He had been, as Sanders said, confessor to queen Katharine, but it seems departed from her interests; for he insinuated himself so into the king, that he recovered his good opinion. Being an ignorant and lewd man, he was accounted by the better sort of that house, to which he belonged in Greenwich, a reproach to their order (concerning this, I have seen a large account in an original letter written by a brother of the same house). Having regained the kings good opinion, he put all those, who had favoured the divorce under great fears, for he proceeded cruelly against them. And one Rainscroft, being suspected to have given secret intelligence of what was done among them, was shut up, and so hardly used, that he dyed in their hands, which was (as that letter relates) done by frier Forrests means. This frier was found to have denied the kings supremacy: for though he himself had sworn it, yet he had infused it into many in confession, that the king was not the supreme head of the church. Being questioned for these practices, which were so contrary to the oath that he had taken, he answered, that he took that oath with his outward man, but his inward man had never consented to it. Being brought to his trial, and accused of several heretical opinions that he held, he submitted himself to the church. Upon this, he had more freedom allowed him in the prison; but some coming to him diverted him from the submission he had offered; so that when the paper of abjuration was brought him, he refused to set his hand to it: upon which he was judged an obstinate heretick. The records of these proceedings are lost; but the books of that time say, that he denied the gospel. It is like it was upon that pretence, that without the determination of the church it had no authority; upon which several writers of the Roman communion have said undecent and scandalous things of the holy scriptures. He was brought to Smithfield, where were present the lords of the council, to offer him his pardon if he would abjure. Latimer made a sermon against his errors, and studied to persuade him to recant; but he continued in his former opinions, so he was put to death in a most severe manner. He was hanged in a chain about his middle, and the great image that was brought out of Wales, was broken to pieces, and served for fuel to burn him. He shewed great unquietness of mind, and ended his life in an ungodly manner, as Hall says, who adds this character of him, that he had little knowledge of God and his sincere truth, and less trust in him at his ending.

In winter that year a correspondence was discovered with cardinal Pole, who was barefaced in his treasonable designs against the king. His brother sir Geoffrey Pole discovered the whole plot. For which the marquess of Exeter, (that was the kings cousin-german by his mother, who was Edward the 4th's daughter), the lord Montacute, the cardinals brother sir Geoffrey Pole, and sir Edward Nevill, were sent to the Tower in the beginning of November. They were accused for having maintained a correspondence with the cardinal, and for expressing an hatred of the king, with a dislike of his proceedings, and a readiness to rise upon any good opportunity that might offer it self.

The special matter brought against the lord Montacute, and the marquess of Exeter, who were tried by their peers on the 2d and 3d of December, in the 30th year of this reign, is, that whereas cardinal Pole, and others, had cast off their allegiance to the king, and gone and submitted themselves to the pope, the kings mortal enemy, the lord Montacute did on the 24th of July in the 28th year of the kings reign, a few months before the rebellion broke out, say, that he liked well the proceedings of his brother the cardinal, but did not like the proceedings of the realm; and said, I trust to see a change of this world; I trust to have a fair day upon those knaves that rule about the king; and I trust to see a merry world one day. Words to the same purpose were also charged on the marquess. The lord Montacute further said, I would I were over the sea with my brother, for this world will one day come to stripes: it must needs so come to pass, and I fear we shall lack nothing so much as honest men. He also said, he had dreamed that the king was dead, and though he was not yet dead, he would die suddenly; one day his leg will kill him, and then we shall have jolly stirring; saying also, that he had never loved him from his childhood, and that cardinal Wolsey would have been an honest man, if he had had an honest master. And the king having said to the lords he would leave them one day, having some apprehensions he might shortly die, that lord said, If he will serve us so, we shall be happily rid; a time will come, I fear we shall not tarry the time, we shall do well enough. He had also said, he was sorry the lord Abergavenny was dead, for he could have made ten thousand men; and for his part he would go and live in the west, where the marquess of Exeter was strong: and had also said upon the breaking of the northern rebellion, that the lord Darcy played the fool, for he went to pluck away the council, but he should have begun with the head first, but I beshrew him for leaving off so soon.' These were the words charged on those lords, as clear discoveries of their treasonable designs; and that they knew of the rebellion that broke out, and only intended to have kept it off to a fitter opportunity: they were also accused of correspondence with cardinal Pole, that was the kings declared enemy. Upon these points the lords pleaded not guilty, but were found guilty by their peers, and so judgment was given.

On the 4th of December were indicted sir Geoffrey Pole, for holding correspondence with his brother the cardinal, and saying that he approved of his proceedings, but not of the kings; sir Edward Nevill, brother to the lord Abergavenny, for saying, the king was a beast, and worse than a beast; George Crofts, chancellor of the cathedral of Chichester, for saying, the king was not, but the pope was, supreme head of the church; and John Collins, for saying, the king would hang in hell one day for the plucking down of abbies. All those, sir Edward Nevill only excepted, pleaded guilty, and so they were condemned; but sir Geoffrey Pole was the only person of the number that was not executed, for he had discovered the matter. At the same time also, cardinal Pole, Michael Throgmorton gentleman, John Hilliard and Thomas Goldwell clerks, and William Peyto a Franciscan of the Observants, were attainted in absence; because they had cast off their duty to the king, and had subjected themselves to the bishop of Rome, Pole being made cardinal by him; and for writing treasonable letters, and sending them into England. On the 4th of February following, sir Nicholas Carew, that was both master of the horse, and knight of the garter, was arraigned for being an adherent to the marquess of Exeter, and having spoke of his attainder as unjust and cruel. He was also attainted and executed upon the 3d of March. When he was brought to the scaffold, he openly acknowledged the errors and superstition in which he had formerly lived; and blessed God for his imprisonment, for he then began to relish the life and sweetness of Gods holy word, which was brought him by his keeper, one Phillips, who followed the Reformation, and had formerly suffered for it.

After these executions, followed the parliament in the year 1539, in which not only these attainders that were already passed were confirmed, but new ones of a strange and unheard-of nature were enacted. It is a blemish never to be washed off, and which cannot be enough condemned, and was a breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules of justice, which is capable of no excuse; it was the attainting of some persons, whom they held in custody, without bringing them to a trial. Concerning which, I shall add what the great lord chief justice Cook writes: 'Although I question not the power of the parliament, for without question the attainder stands of force in law, yet this I say of the manner of proceeding, Auferat oblivio, si potest, si non utrumque silentium tegat. For the more high and absolute the jurisdiction of the court is, the more just and honourable it ought to be in the proceedings, and to give example of justice to inferior courts.' The chief of these were the marchioness of Exeter and the countess of Sarum. The special matter charged on the former, is her confederating her self to sir Nicolas Carew, in his treasons; to which is added, 'that she had committed divers other abominable treasons. The latter is said to have confederated her self with her son the cardinal, with other aggravating words.' It does not appear by the Journal that any witnesses were examined; only that day that the bills were read the third time in the house of lords, Cromwell shewed them a coat of white silk, which the lord admiral had found among the countess of Sarums cloaths, in which the arms of England were wrought on the one side, and the standard that was carried before the rebels was on the other side. This was brought as an evidence that she approved of the rebellion. Three Irish priests were also attainted for carrying letters out of Ireland, to the pope and cardinal Pole, as also sir Adrian Fortescue for endeavouring to raise rebellion, Thomas Dingley a knight of St. John of Jerusalem, and Robert Granester merchant, for going to several foreign princes, and persuading them to make war upon the king, and assist the lords Darcy and Huffle in the rebellion they had raised. Two gentlemen, a Dominican frier, and a yeoman, were by the same act attainted, for saying that that venomous serpent the bishop of Rome was supreme head of the church of England. Another gentleman, two priests, and a yeoman are attainted for treason in general, no particular crime being specified. Thus sixteen persons were in this manner attainted, and if there was any examination of witnesses for convicting them, it was either in the Star-Chamber, or before the privy council; for there is no mention of any evidence that was brought in the Journals: There was also much haste made in the passing this bill: it being brought in the 10th of May, was read that day for the first and second time, and the 11th of May for the third time. The commons kept it five days before they sent it back, and added some more to those that were in the bill at first; but how many were named in the bill originally, and how many were afterwards added, cannot be known. Fortescue and Dingley suffered the 10th of July. As for the countess of Sarum, the lord Herbert saw in a record, 'that bulls from the pope were found in her house, that she kept correspondence with her son, and that she forbade her tenants to have the New Testament in English, or any other of the books that had been published by the kings authority.' She was then about seventy years of age, but shewed by the answers she made, that she had a vigorous and masculine mind. She was kept two years prisoner in the Tower, after the act had passed, the king by that reprieve designing to oblige her son to a better behaviour; but upon a fresh provocation by a new rebellion in the north, she was beheaded, and in her, the name and line of Plantagenet determined. The marchioness of Exeter died a natural death. In November this year were the abbots of Reading, Glassbury and Colchester attainted of treason, of which mention was made formerly.

In the parliament that sate in the year 1540 they went on to follow that strange precedent, which they had made the former year. By the 56th act Giles Heron was attainted of treason, no special matter being mentioned.

By the 57th act, Richard Fetherstoun, Thomas Abell, and Edward Powell priests, and William Horn a yeoman were attainted, for denying the kings supremacy, and adhering to the bishop of Rome: by the same act the wife of one Tirrellesq. was attainted, for refusing her duty of allegiance, and denying prince Edward to be prince and heir of the crown; and one Laurence Cook of Doncaster was also attainted for contriving the kings death.

By the 58th act, Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damply, and Edward Brindeholm clerks, and Clement Philpot gentleman, were attainted, for adhering to the bishop of Rome, for corresponding with cardinal Pole, and endeavouring to surprize the town of Calais: By the same act Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome, were attainted, of whose sufferings an account has been already given.

By the 59th act, William Bird a priest, and chaplain to the lord Hungerford, was attainted, for having said to one that was going to assist the king against the rebels in the north, 'I am sorry thou goest, seest thou not how the king plucketh down images and abbies every day? And if the king go thither himself, he will never come home again, nor any of them all which go with him, and in truth it were pity he should ever come home again; and at another time upon ones saying, O good Lord, I ween all the world will be hereticks in a little time: Bird said, Dost thou marvel at that? I tell thee it is no marvel, for the great master of all is an heretick, and such a one as there is not his like in the world.'

By the same act the lord Hungerford was likewise attainted. 'The crimes specified are, that he knowing Bird to be a traitor, did entertain him in his house as his chaplain; that he ordered another of his chaplains, sir Hugh Wood, and one Dr. Maudlin to use conjuring, that they might know how long the king should live, and whether he should be victorious over his enemies or not; and that these three years last past he had frequently committed the detestable sin of sodomy with several of his servants.' All these were attainted by that parliament. The lord Hungerford was executed the same day with Cromwell; he dyed in such disorder that some thought he was frenetick, for he called often to the executioner to dispatch him, and said he was weary of life, and longed to be dead, which seemed strange in a man that had so little cause to hope in his death. For Powell, Fetherstoun, and Abell, they suffered the same day with Barnes and his friends, as hath been already shewn.

This year Sampson bishop of Chichester, and one doctor Wilson were put in the Tower, upon suspicion of a correspondence with the pope. But upon their submission they had their pardon and liberty. In the year 1541, five priests and ten secular persons, some of them being gentlemen of quality, were raising a new rebellion in Yorkshire; which was suppressed in time, and the promoters of it being apprehended, were attainted and executed, and this occasioned the death of the countess of Sarum, after the execution of the sentence had been delayed almost two years.

The last instance of the kings severity was in the year 1543, in which one Gardiner that was the bishop of Winchester's kinsman and secretary, and three other priests, were tried, for denying the kings supremacy, and soon after executed. But what special matter was laid to their charge, cannot be known, for the record of their attainder is lost.

These were the proceedings of this king against those that adhered to the interests of Rome: in which, though there is great ground for just censure, for as the laws were rigorous, so the execution of them was raised to the highest that the law could admit; yet there is nothing in them to justify all the clamours, which that party have raised against king Henry, and by which they pursue his memory to this day; and are far short, both in number and degrees, of the cruelties of queen Marius reign, which yet they endeavour all that is possible to extenuate or deny.

To conclude, we have now gone through the reign of king Henry the 8th, who is rather to be reckoned among the great than the good princes. He exercised so much severity on men of both persuasions, that the writers of both sides have laid open his faults, and taxed his cruelty. But as neither of them were much obliged to him, so none have taken so much care to set forth his good qualities, as his enemies have done to enlarge on his vices: I do not deny that he is to be numbred among the ill princes, yet I cannot rank him with the worst.

XI. The Trials of JOHN DUDLEY Duke of Northumberland, WILLIAM PARR Marquis of Northampton, and JOHN DUDLEY Earl of Warwick, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward, at Westminster, 18th August, 1 Mary, 1553; and also of Sir JOHN GATES, Sir HENRY GATES, Sir ANDREW DUDLEY, and Sir THOMAS PALMER, at Westminster, for the same Crime, the Day following.

[The proceedings against these noblemen and others, for asserting the title of lady Jane Grey to the crown, and opposing that of queen Mary, seem to deserve a place in this collection, chiefly on account of the questions of law proposed to the court by the duke of Northumberland, previously to his confession of the indictment. The Harleian Manuscript, which we shall first lay before the reader, is copied from Hollingshead, except the latter part about the marquis of Northampton and the earl of Warwick. The next account of the transaction is immediately taken from the translation of bishop Godwin's Annals of Mary, in Kenner's Complete History of England, but is acknowledged by bishop Godwin to be extracted from the great French historian of his own time, the president de Thou.]

Extract from one of the Harleian Manuscripts.

THOMAS duke of Norfolk sitting as high steward of England, on the eighteenth day of August were brought before him John Dudley duke of Northumberland, William Parre marquisse of Northampton, and the earle of Warwicke, sonne to the duke of Northumberland.

The duke of Northumberland, att his cominge to the barre, vsed greate reverence towards the judges, and protestinge his faith and obedience to the queene's majesty, whome he confessed greivously to haue offended, he said; that hee meant not to speake any thinge in defence of himselfe; but would first vnderstand the opinion of the courte in two points.

First, Whether a man, doinge an acte by the authority of the prince and counsell, and by warrant of the greate seale of England, and doeing nothinge without the same, may bee charged for treason for any thinge which hee might doe by warrant thereof?

Secondly, Whether any such persons, as were equally culpable in that crime, and those by whose letters and commaundements he was directed in all his doings, might bee his judges, or passe vpon his tryall att his death?

Wherevnto was answered, that, as concerninge the first, the greate seale, which hee layd for his warrant, was not the seale of the lawfull queene of the realme, nor passed by authority, but the seale of an usurper, and therefore would bee noe warrant for him.

And to the second, it was alleadged, that, if any were as deeply to bee touched as himselfe in that case, yet as longe as noe attindor were of record against them, they were neverthelesse persons able in the lawe to passe vpon any tryall, and not to bee challenged therefore, but att the princes pleasure.

After which answer, the duke vsinge fewe words, declared his earnest repentance in the case, (for hee saw, that to stand vpon vttering any reasonable matter would little prevaile) and moved the duke of Norfolk to bee a meanes vnto the queene for mercy, and without further answer confessed the indictment; by whose example alsoe the other prisoners arraigned with him did likewise confesse the indictment produced against them, and therevpon had judgement.

The judgement beinge pronounced, hee craved favour of such a death as was executed on noblemen, and not the other; hee beseeching also that a favourable regard might bee had of his children in respect of their age, and that hee might bee permitted to conferre with some learned divine for the settling of his conscience; and lastly, that her majestie would bee pleased to send vnto him fowre of her counsell for the discovery of some things which might concerne the state.

The marquisse of Northampton pleaded to his indictment, that after the beginninge of these tumults hee had forborne the execution of any publique office; and that all the while hee, intent to huntinge and other sports, did not partake in the conspiracy; but it beinge manifest that hee wast party with the duke of Northumberland, sentence passed on him likewise.

The earle of Warwicke, fyndinge that the judges in soe greate a cause, admitted noe excuse of age, with greate resolucio n heard his condemnation pronounced against him, cravinge only this favour; that, whereas the goods of those who are condemned for treason are totally confiscated; yet her majestie would bee pleased, that out of them his debts might bee paid.

After this they were all returned agayne to the Tower.

ON the 18th of August, the duke of Norfolk sitting as lord high steward, those concern'd in the rebellion were try'd at Westminster; where the duke of Northumberland, with his eldest son the earl of Warwick, and the marquis of Northampton, were found guilty of high treason. The account of that day's proceedings, and of the day following, I shall here transcribe from Thuanus, a writer of great fame; because, tho' I do not entirely approve all he has set down, I think he keeps very near to truth, and the reader, perhaps, will not be ill entertain'd with the variety of opinions upon this matter.

The duke of Northumberland, says he, alledg'd, That he did nothing but by order of the council, yet this would not excuse him; so that he was condemn'd as a traytor. When the sentence was pronounced, he beg'd that it might be mitigated, as to the manner of his death, and that his children, in regard to their tender years, might find mercy; and that he might have the liberty of speaking with some learned divine (for the settling of his conscience). And lastly, that her majesty would be pleas'd to send to him four of her privy-council, to whom he had some things to communicate, relating to the publick. Then came on the tryal of the marquis of Northampton, who pretended, that he had not any hand in the rebellion, nor was engag'd in any party, but having no publick post, had spent all the time in his usual diversion of hunting, and other sports (a). However, it appear'd that he was engag'd on Northumberland's side, and therefore he was likewise condemn'd. Afterwards, the earl of Warwick, Northumberland's eldest son, when the plea of his youth would not be admitted in excuse of so great a crime, receiv'd his sentence of death with a wonderful constancy; and only pray'd her majesty, that out of his estate confiscated, his debts might be discharged. These were presently sent back to the Tower. The next day, sir Andrew Dudley, Northumberland's brother, and sir John Gates, who was suppos'd the first author of setting up lady Jane, with his brother Henry Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were condemn'd. The 22d of August they were brought out to execution, having two days before receiv'd the sacrament in prison. Northumberland, by the persuation of Heath (afterwards archbishop of York) made a speech to the people, in which he confess'd his crime and repentance, and advis'd all who were present to adhere to the ancient religion of their forefathers, and rejecting the new opinions, as the source of all the evils that had befallen 'em for 30 years past, to drive the preachers of 'em, as trumpeters of sedition, out of the kingdom, if they would approve themselves innocent before God and the publick. He declar'd that in his heart he had always been for the old religion, and appeal'd for the truth of this to his intimate friend the bishop of Worcester, but he had temporiz'd out of ambition, for which he now was a sincere penitent; and lastly, that he willingly submitted to his death, which he own'd he had deserv'd. Having said this, he recommended himself to God, and desiring the prayers of the spectators, prepar'd to receive the stroke; and immediately the executioner perform'd his office. Northumberland's exhortations variously affected the minds of the people, who were amaz'd to hear him speak against that religion, which he had profess'd for above 30 years; and on the account of which chiefly he had advis'd king Edward to exclude his sisters. Most have written, that being a cunning man, and fond of life, he did this in hopes of a pardon; and that when he look'd round him and saw he was deceiv'd, he repented of it (b). He was charg'd (upon no trivial conjectures) with having poison'd the late king. But nothing of this was mention'd at his trial, because his judges undertook not the examination into king Edward's death, but only the business of the rebellion against queen Mary. Gates too and Palmer underwent the same punishment.

(a) The contrary to which was notorious; for Northampton was one of queen Jane's privy-counsellors, and signed a letter, July the 9th, among the rest of her privy-council, to the lady Mary, (as they stiled her) requiring her to desist, and be quiet and obedient; besides his going along with the duke in all his counsels. Kennet.
(b) Fox, who lived in these times, confirms and clears this matter: who writes, that the duke had a promise made him of a pardon; yea, though his head were upon the block, on condition he would recant, and hear mass. On which promise he firmly relied, and did what was required; and still born up with the same hope, on the scaffold denied, in word and outward profession, that true religion which he had often, both in king Henry's and king Edward's days, evidently declared himself to favour and further. XII. The Trial of PHILIP HOWARD Earl of Arundel, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward of England, the 18th of April, in the 32d of Eliz. 1589.

[An account of this trial is in the 1st volume of the present work, with a reference in a note to Camden's Elizabeth, as if the trial was extracted from that work. See 1st vol. fol. 163. But the fact is, that they are different relations of the same trial; and as Mr. Camden's account, though not so full, appears to us more clear and intelligible, and at the same time occupies little room, we thought that it would not be unacceptable to our readers. It is therefore here given from the English translation of Camden, in Bishop Kennet's Complete History of England. 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 551.]

There are two other narratives of this trial; one amongst the Harleian Manuscripts at the British Museum; the other in Mr. Collins's Peerage, under the title of The Duke of Norfolk. But on comparison, we find the former to be only an old translation from the Latin edition of Camden's Elizabeth. As to the latter, though Collins cites a manuscript in the possession of the Howard family, yet he adds scarce any thing of consequence unnoticed by or different from Camden, except that Bennett, one of the witnesses against the earl, is represented previously to the trial, to have addressed a letter to him, in which he acknowledged, that he was forced into a confession to the injury of the earl, by fear of the rack, and therefore prayed his forgiveness.—We endeavoured to procure access to the manuscript cited by Collins, with an intention to have gratified our readers with a copy of it; but the application failed of success.]

Extract from 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 2d ed. p. 551.

THE very same month [April 18th 1589,] was Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, arraign'd in Westminster-hall, and tried by his peers, before Henry earl of Derby, who was created lord-high-steward of England on this particular occasion.

The persons summoned to attend this trial, were these following peers.

William Cecil lord Burleigh, lord-high-treasurer of England.
William lord marquis of Winchester.
Edward earl of Oxford, lord-great-chamberlain of England.
Henry earl of Kent.
Henry earl of Suffex.
Henry earl of Pembroke.
Edward earl of Hertford.
Henry earl of Lincoln.
The lord Hunsdon.
The lord Willoughby of Eresby.
The lord Morley.
The lord Cobham.
The lord Grey.
The lord Darcy of the north.
The lord Sands.
The lord Wentworth.
The lord Rich.
The lord Willoughby of Parham.
The lord North.
The lord St. John of Blenheim.
The lord Buckhurst.
The lord La-Ware. And
The lord Norris.

Being order'd to hold up his hand, he did so, and moreover used this expression, Behold here a clean hand, and an honest heart! The heads of his impeachment were much the same with those mention'd before, Ann. 1586. viz. 'That he held a very strict intimacy and correspondence with cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuit, and other conspirators, who attempted the ruin of their prince and country, by stirring up foreigners and the queen's natural subjects to bring in popery, to the total destruction of both: That he had engaged by letters convey'd by Weston, alias Burges, a priest, to assist the said cardinal in advancing the catholic cause, and to that purpose had design'd to withdraw privately out of the kingdom: That he was privy to the bull of Sixtus Quintus, which dethroned the queen, and made over her dominions to the Spaniards: That when he was a prisoner in the Tower, he had caused mass to be said for the happy success of the Spanish armada, and had himself compos'd a special prayer on that occasion.'

Being demanded to answer, whether he was guilty, or not guilty? he turned himself to the court and judges, and made these challenges one after another, whether such a number of articles might lawfully be put into one and the same impeachment? They answer'd in the affirmative. Then he demanded, whether presumptive arguments bore any weight in an indictment? He was answer'd, that he might except against them as far as he pleas'd. Another demand was, whether he could stand accus'd of those things charged to be treason in the 13th of queen Elizabeth, after the time limited in the said act? They then promised him, he should not be try'd upon any other law or act of high-treason, but an ancient one of Edward III. In the last place, he demanded, if that were a fair indictment, which fail'd grossly as to circumstances both of place and time? The answer was, that these things signified little, if the matter of fact were proved. After this, being asked a second time, whether he were guilty or not? he answer'd, not guilty, and submitted himself to God and his peers; but desired them to spare his memory, which was impair'd by his imprisonment, and ill health, and not to over-charge it with too much variety.

Puckering, the queen's serjeant at law, open'd the first part of the charge, viz. That cardinal Allen having engag'd with the Jesuits and others against his prince and country, upon which account he was bannish'd the kingdom; yet he the said earl had kept up a correspondence with him by letters, and had expressly written to him to advance the catholic interest, which, by a fair and modest construction, was a plain inviting of him to invade England. The earl made answer, That all he intended by it, was the promotion of that faith, by the accession of new profelytes. Popham, the queen's attorney-general, endeavour'd to prove, by the confessions of Savage, Throckmorton, and Babington, that this could not possibly be understood of a free conversion upon the strength of argument; but of a publick invasion by force of arms. Shuttleworth, a serjeant at law, made it appear out of the form of the proclamations put out against the Jesuits and seminary priests, on what designs they were sent into England: That they were traitors, he proved from the earl's own words; who, upon the hearing of Valonger's cause in the Star-Chamber, in relation to a scandalous libel of his, said publickly, that an hearty papist could not but be as thorow a traitor. But for all this, men of this very principle were among the earl's greatest intimates. 'Twas urged moreover, That he had espoused the faith of the Romish church, and became of consequence a subject to the Romish see; but this he flatly deny'd, and demanded that any evidence might be produced to prove him a professed catholic. He acknowledged indeed, that he had in some instances made Burges his confessor; whereupon it was debated, that none were admitted to the sacraments of the church of Rome, but such as were reconciled to her doctrine and worship; but he was admitted by Gratley, a priest, and therefore a papist before, at least in his heart. This Popham labour'd to prove from his own letters, and that he intended likewise to withdraw beyond sea; that he was an absolute creature of cardinal Allen, and conform'd entirely to his measures; for which he was guilty of high-treason. He then produced Gratley's and Morgan's letters to the queen of Scots, and made from thence this inference, that the earl owed his change in religion more to sourness and spleen, than to conscience and conviction. Then was produced an emblematical piece found in the earl's cabinet, which had on one side an hand shaking a serpent into the fire, with this motto, If God be with us, who shall be against us? and on the other, a lion rampant, without claws, and with this inscription, Yet a lion. He moreover added, that the earl designing to quit the kingdom, was persuaded by the cardinal to alter his purpose, as being a person likely to do the church of Rome more service by his stay in England, than his departure thence; that in a letter to the queen, the earl had reflected severely on the justice of the laws, in reference to the sentence of death denounced against his grand-father and father; that the queen of Scots had recommended him to Babington, as the great patron of the catholic interest; that Allen had owned that the aforesaid bull was procured by the applications of a person of figure in England; which could be no other than the earl, because no one nobleman besides, was so intimate with Allen as himself, and whom therefore Allen must needs know to be ill-affected to his country, by what he had heard pass before in the Star-Chamber. Then were read also the confessions of the lord William, the earl's brother, with those of his sister, the lady Margaret, and his own letters, when he had thoughts of leaving the kingdom. And this gave occasion to magnify the queen's clemency afresh, who would not suffer him (at that very time) to be examin'd on an article of treason, but barely on a point of contempt. To these charges the earl answer'd in the gross, 'That as for the picture, 'twas a trifle presented him by his man: That indeed he had promised to assist the cardinal in the promotion of the catholic faith, but never at the expence of his prince and country: That what he had written in relation to the sentence of his grand-father and father, was extant upon record, and so any one might read it: That he was not at all concerned in what the cardinal or the queen of Scots might write about him, since he stood clear as to fact: That it was impossible to restrain other mens pens: That he had indeed some design of acting under the prince of Parma, in the wars abroad, since the rigour of the laws against catholics made it not safe for him to stay at home: That the attorney had managed the letters and confessions, at the same rate that spiders do flowers; that is, suck'd all the poison out of them; but he, for his part, was able to extract out of them something more useful, might he be permitted to see them.' Then were were read Allen's letters to the queen of Scots, with those of the bishop of Ross, about invading England, that very year he design'd to quit it; and the bull of Sixtus Quintus, and several remarks made on Allen's memorial to the English, printed at Antwerp the year before. He was likewise charged with having assumed this title, Philip duke of Norfolk, which was found among his papers; and it was Allen's advice, that he should in some degree mend his title. These things were brought against him as convictions of treason before his imprisonment. Egerton, the solicitor-general, having summ'd up and repeated the particulars of the charge, proceeded upon a threefold distinction of time, viz. * Before the arrival of the Spanish fleet; at the instant of its coming; and after it fled: And that he had been guilty of treason since his confinement: Before the fleet appeared, he had been guilty of treason, in wishing it happy success; when it was arrived, in making a form of prayer suitable to his wishes, and causing the mass of the Holy Ghost to be said, and a course of devotions to be used for 24 hours together: And then when the fleet was gone, in lamenting its defeat with all the marks of an extraordinary sorrow; as if he had fix'd his last hope, and best confidence, in the Spanish armada, which was fitted out with a design to ruin his prince and country.' These particulars were all made out against him by Mr. Tho. Gerard kt. Will. Shelley, condemn'd for treason, ann. 1586. Bennet, a popish priest, and some other prisoners. He then mutter'd in a broken and imperfect kind of tone, that the prayers he made, and the masses he perform'd, were in order to deprecate a massacre he had heard was designed against the catholicks. Gerard's evidence he roundly deny'd; and as he adjured him to declare nothing but the truth, and represented before him the dreadful solemnity of the last day, he so terrified and scared the evidence, that he hardly was able to speak one word to the purpose. Bennet's attestations he endeavour'd to invalidate, as being a man of a tarnish'd reputation, and who had contradicted himself in his confessions. The rest he taxed as persons impeach'd, and prisoners, and men likewise of a loose and profligate character; who were far from deserving credit, and who might be suspected to have the liberty of using his conversation with a design to ensnare him in the quereks of the law. Having received a check for this, as too indecent and bold a challenge upon the evidence for the queen, at the solicitor's motion, an ancient law of Richard II. was read, whereby it was declared, that the crown of England was under the command of none but God alone, and that the bishop of Rome had no manner of authority over it. It now growing towards night, and nothing being produced farther against him, the earl was order'd to withdraw: He threw himself wholly upon the judgment of his peers, protesting his obedience to the queen, and heartily praying they might come to such an issue, as might be most for the glory of God, the safety of the queen, and the integrity of their own honour and conscience. They then went aside, and held a debate, which lasted an hour, and in points of law they consulted the opinion of the judges and serjeants. Being returned to their seats, the clerk of the crown demanded of them, Whether the earl were guilty or not? At which every one of 'em putting his hand to his breast, as the custom was, declared upon his honour and conscience, that he was guilty. Then being asked if he had any thing farther to say, why sentence of death should not pass upon him? he only said the same words which his father had done before him, in the same place, God's will be done. Sentence being pronounced, he desired leave to speak with his wife, and that he might see his young son, who was born since his confinement; that he might have the liberty to speak with his stewards, who had the accounts of his estate, and that his debts might be discharged: He likewise humbly desired the queen would take his young son into her favour and patronage. Then the lord steward brake his staff, the badge of his place; and the earl was carry'd back to the Tower, the ax being carry'd before him, with the edge towards him. There were a great many that most heartily lamented the untimely fall of this young nobleman, (for he was not above 33 years of age at the most) and as many on the other side were ready to cry up the queen's wisdom and caution, who by this example had struck a kind of terror into the more powerful part of the Romish faction. The queen after all gave him his life, and was well enough satisfy'd in having lessen'd the power of so considerable a man, and one who was so great a bulwark of the catholick cause.

XIII. The Case of Impositions, on an Information in the Exchequer by the Attorney-General against Mr. JOHN BATES Merchant. Michaelmas, 4 James I. 1604. 71

[This famous case involved in it a constitutional question of the first magnitude; Mr. Bates the defendant having been prosecuted for refusing to pay a duty on foreign currants imposed by a mere act of the crown. The attempt, to enforce a submission to this duty by legal process, was certainly a principal and early part of that rash and unwarrantable scheme to establish in the crown a right of taxing the subject, which disturbed the reigns of the two first princes of the Stuart line. James the first claimed the right of imposing duties on imported and exported merchandize by prerogative. His son and immediate successor, the unfortunate Charles, not only persisted in the claim, but added to it the equally formidable pretension of ship-money. Realized, these claims, with loans benevolences monopolies and the other subsidiary branches of the same extravagant design, would have comprized nearly a compleat system of extra-parliamentary taxation; for imposition at the ports was calculated to serve the purpose externally, ship-money to operate internally. Had they been acquiesced in, parliaments would soon have become unnecessary assemblies; the mildness of a limited monarchy would gradually have degenerated into the harshness of an absolute one; a legal government would have been corrupted into a tyranny. To the great disgrace of the profession of the law, some, who in other respects were its brightest ornaments, gave their aid to these attempts against the rights of parliament. We make the acknowledgment with concern; but it is a truth, which neither can nor ought to be concealed. The great luminary of science, lord Bacon, exercised his eloquence to reconcile parliament to impositions by prerogative. Sir John Davis, so justly admired for his writings about Ireland, composed a treatise to prove the right of the crown. Both displayed the greatness of their talents on the occasion, though they managed the argument in different ways; the former speciously professing to claim the prerogative in question from and to limit it by law; the latter boldly adventuring to exalt the same prerogative above law, and describing it to be like another Sampson too strong to be bound. 2. Bac. 4to. ed. 1778. p. 223. Dav. on Imposit. 131. Even the judges deigned to be instruments for subjugating their country to an illegal taxation. Though the statute-book was full of legislative declarations against taxes without consent in parliament, though not so much as one recognition of the claim could be found in the records of justice, the court of Exchequer in Bates's case gave judgment for impositions by prerogative on imports and exports; and in Mr. Hampden's case, though some very recent admonitions and warnings of duty had intervened, all the judges of Westminster-hall, two only excepted, joined to give the sanction of a judicial opinion to ship-money. Nor were monopolies, loans, and benevolences, wholly uncountenanced by the courts of justice. But, during this crisis, the houses of parliament did not forget their duty. They pursued the several devices for illegal taxation, till all were hunted down, and had yielded to the tide of law and constitution. In 1610, the house of commons, alarmed by the judgment in Bates's case, formally debated the right of the crown to impose on merchandize at the ports; and at length by a petition to the king complained of such impositions as a grievance, which in the subsequent parliaments was followed with frequent remonstrances of the like kind. In 1623, monopolies were curbed and regulated by statute. In 1627, gifts, loans, and benevolences, were pointedly declared contrary to law by the Petition of Right, with general words to comprehend all sorts of taxes and charges out of parliament. In 1640, the legislature crushed ship-money almost in its birth, by declaring the judgment for it contrary to law and vacating the record. In the same year the final blow was given to taxation by prerogative; an act for tonnage and poundage being passed, with a declaration against the king's claim to impose such duties. Thus the victory over all the several inventions to tax the subject by prerogative became compleat; before the civil wars broke out, before the contest with the crown degenerated from resistance of its usurped powers into an invasion of its just claims. Fortunately too, when the country emerged from the anarchy and misery of the scene which followed, the extravagance of joy did not extinguish a due remembrance of the constitution. One of the first acts, after the Restoration, was a grant of tonnage and poundage, with words which renewed a part of the former declarations against taxing by prerogative; for it anxiously recited, that 'no rates can be imposed on merchandize imported or exported by subjects or aliens, but by common consent in parliament.' 12. Cha. 2. c. 4. §. 6.—It was once our intention to have traced more fully the history of the long contest about taxes out of parliament, from the accession of the house of Stuart, till it was finally decided against the crown in 1641; our plan being to have minutely and distinctly stated the proceedings on each species of device to elude the constitution, and to have given a general view of the arguments by which each was sustained or repelled. But though we had already made many researches, and collected several materials on the subject, it was found impossible to do justice to it, without more time, than was consistent with present convenience to allow. We therefore reserve the detail of the subject for some future occasion. As to the attempts at extra-parliamentary taxation in the previous period, they are fully investigated in some of the pieces which we now present to the reader.

The only state of this important case, and of the arguments in it, is in Lane's Reports, and in a short note added to Dyer's Reports by the learned editor of the improved edition. See Lane's Rep. p. 22. and Dy. ed. 1688, fo. 165-b. in the margin. The report in Lane, being the fullest, shall be laid before the reader; to which we shall subjoin a speech made in parliament by lord Bacon in 1610, when the judgment of the Exchequer in the case in question was formally discussed by the house of commons. We shall next add a transcript from an original manuscript, described by Mr. Carte to be in the hand-writing of the famous sir John Davis; being in substance like the latter part of the printed Treatise on Impositions with his name, but differing much in the language, and more likely to be correct. These pieces together comprize the principal arguments for the prerogative of impositions claimed by the crown. But, without something more, it would be a very partial view of the subject. In justice, therefore, as well to that excellent constitution, to the injury of which the claim of impositions by prerogative operated, as to those who so honourably for themselves and so happily for their country resisted the invasion, we shall add two most learned and able arguments on the opposite side of the question; one delivered by Mr. Hakewill in the same parliament with lord Bacon's argument; the other also cotemporary, and said to have been composed by sir Henry Yelverton, afterwards the judge of that name. Both of these valuable remnants of the debates in parliament on impositions by the crown are very rare; having been printed separately, and not being to be found in any published collections of the time. What is very remarkable, they are not only unnoticed by Mr. Hume, Mr. Carte, and the authors of the Parliamentary History; but have even escaped the observation of our deservedly celebrated female historian. That the two former writers should not be studious to draw the attention of their readers to two arguments, so fit to counteract the reception of their particular prejudices, is easy to be accounted for; especially in the instance of Mr. Carte, whose bias in favour of the prerogative is more avowed and apparent than Mr. Hume's. But Mrs. Macaulay's silence cannot be explained in the same way, and therefore we attribute it to the accident of her not having met with either of the arguments. Perhaps our observation on Mr. Hume and Mr. Carte may sound as harsh to some persons. But we can assure such, that it is not intended to write disrespectfully of either of those authors. We feel strongly the merit of Mr. Carte, as a most elaborate historian; as one, to whose familiar knowledge and skilful use of records, with the other most authentick materials of the history of his country, all, who follow him in the same line, are infinitely obliged. For strength clearness and elegance of style, for profoundness in remark, for beautiful arrangement and close compression of matter, we consider Mr. Hume's work as a model of historical composition. Such being the characters of these eminent writers, it becomes the more necessary to know, on which side their prejudices operate. Otherwise the authority of their works might have an improper influence in settling the opinions of their readers on the controverted points of our government and constitution, and so lead to the dissemination of dangerous and pernicious errors. The truth seems to be, that a general history of England,

England, composed with that rigid impartiality so essential to a perfectly just idea of our constitution, is still wanting. Hitherto the best of our writers, who have engaged in that arduous task, have been betrayed into extremes. One is swayed by predilection for the Stuart family; whilst another loses his temper from aversion to them. Some write from favor to absolute monarchy; others are votaries to the passion of republicanism. Too many have been seduced by zeal for a particular party in the state; and so, according to the occasion, have practised the arts of apology, or adopted the severe and vehement language of satire. But the author, who wishes to fix the true point of our antient constitution in the scale of government, must banish from his mind all such corruptives of judgment. Besides the arguments by Hakewill and Yelverton, against impositions on merchandize by prerogative, there are some very forcible reasons with the same view by lord Coke in his second Institute, where he comments on the 30th chapter of Magna Charta. See 2. Inst. page 57. to 63.—Some observations also occur on the subject in the 12th part of lord Coke's Reports. But, in this latter book, he writes with more favor to the judgment for impositions in Bates's case; for, though he disclaims all idea of the crown's having a right to impose duties at the ports, in form of a tax and for a revenue, yet he contends, that, for the benefit of the subject, and in the way of advancement and regulation of trade, the crown may charge. This distinction seems to be of dangerous tendency, and not quite reconcilable with the same great lawyer's sentiments in his 2d Institute, where he condemns the judgment in Bates's case without any reserve. However it should be considered, that lord Coke's 12th Report contains only his first thoughts, before the question had undergone a parliamentary investigation; and further, that the 12th Report is of small authority, being not merely posthumous, but apparently nothing more than a collection from papers neither digested nor intended for the press by the writer. 12. Extract from Lane's Reports, page 22.

AN information was exhibited against Bates a merchant of the Levant; and it was recited, that the king by his letters patents under the great seal had commanded his treasurer, that he command the customers and receivers, that they should ask and receive of every merchant denizen, who brings within any port within his dominions, any currants, five shillings a hundred for impost, above two shillings and six pence, which was the poundage by the statute of every hundred; and it was alleged, that Bates had notice thereof, and that he had brought in currants into the port of London, and refused to pay the said 5. s. in contempt of the king. Whereunto Bates came, and said, that he is an English merchant, and adventurer and a denizen, and that he made a voyage to Venice, and there bought currants, and imported them into England; and he recited the statute of the first of king James cap. 33. which grants 2. s. 6. d. for poundage, and he said, that he had paid that, and therefore he had refused to pay the 5. s. because it was imposed unjustly, and unduly against the lawes of the land; whereupon the king's attorney demurred in law.

This matter had been divers times argued at the bar, and at the bench, by Snig and Savil barons, and now by Clark and Flemming chief baron, whose arguments only I heard.

And Clark, who argued first this day, said, that this case being of so great consequence, great respect and consideration is to be had, and it seemeth to me strange, that any subjects would contend with the king, in this high point of prerogative; but such is the king's grace, that he had shewed his intent to be, that this matter shall be disputed and adjudged by us according to the antient law and custome of the realm; and because that the judgement of this matter cannot be well directed by any learning delivered in our books of law, the best directions herein are precedents of antiquitie, and the course of this court, wherein all actions of this nature are to be judged, and the acts of parliament recited in arguments of this case prove nothing to this purpose. The best case in law is the case of Mines in Mr. Plowden Com. where this ground is put, that the precedents of every court ought to be a direction to that court, to judge of matters which are aptly determinable therein, as in the Kings Bench for matters of the crown, in the Common Pleas for matters of inheritance and civil contracts, and in the Exchequer for matters of the king's prerogative his revenue and government. And as it is not a kingdom without subjects and government, so he is not a king without revenues, for without them he cannot preserve his dominions in peace, he cannot maintain war, nor reward his servants, according to the state and honor of a king; and the revenue of the crown is the very essential part of the crown, and he who rendeth that from the king pulleth also his crown from his head, for it cannot be separated from the crown. And such great prerogatives of the crown, without which it cannot be, ought not to be disputed; and in these cases of prerogative the judgement shall not be according to the rules of the common law, but according to the precedents of this court, wherein these matters are disputable and determinable. As for example, an action of accompt lies not by the common law against him, who had the land of the accomptant by mean conveyance. But if one be an accomptant to the king, and had land in fee, and alien it unto A. who alien it unto B. B. by reason of this land shall be charged with this accompt. In 14. E. 3. a coroner was elected by the king's writ as he ought to be, by the countie, and after he was amerced, and because he was not sufficient to answer the amercement the countie was charged therewith, and that appears of record here. And in 30. E. 3. Rot. 6. as appears also of record, in this court, one William Porter was magister monetæ, and had received bullion of divers merchants, and coyned it in the king's mint, and did not restore the coyne to the merchants, but was insufficient, and the king paid the merchants, and inquired of the sureties for the coyne, and it was found that he had none; then it was inquired who recommended him unto the king, and it was found by whom he was recommended; and they, who only recommended him as friends, were charged with the debt. And if one be outlawed in a personal action, and debt is due to him upon a contract, this shall be forfeited to the king, and this is ordinary by the precedents of this court; and yet this seems to be contrary to law, and is against our books. And the king's debtor shall have a quo minus against executors upon a simple contract, and therein he cannot release, nor be non-suited. And I put these cases to prove, that the precedents of this court ought to be pursued and observed, although they seem to cross the common law, and the books thereof. A case was here betwixt the king and Fourden. Fourden was receiver, and sold his office to one D. and he not being able to pay Fourden for his office at the day limited, it was agreed, that Fourden should come to the next receipt, and when D. received the king's money, that Fourden should take it for his office, which was done accordingly. After D. was indebted to the king, and this matter appearing as above, &c. Fourden was charged with the money which he had received. And as Stamford in his first cap. of prerogative saith, that the king is the most worthy part of a common-wealth, so is he the preserver, nourisher, and defender of the people; and true it is, that the weal of the king is the publick weal of the people, and he for his pleasure may aforrest the word of any subject, and he thereby shall be subject to the law of the forrest; and he may take the provision of any man by his purveyor for his own use, but at reasonable prices, and without abuse, the abuse of which officer hath been restrained by divers statutes; and the king may take wines for his provision, and also timber for his ships, castles, or houses in the wood of any man, and this is for publick benefit; and the king may allay or inhaunce coyne at his pleasure, for the plentie of the king is the peoples peace. And these imposts are not only for the benefit of the people, and for the king's profit, but are also imposed many times for the increase of merchandize and commerce, as the statute of Aulnageors made in the 2. E. 3. cap. 14. which was made principally to make cloathes more vendible. And so corporations granted by the king with immunities and privileges, and to seclude other subjects from them, are well limited and good; for it is for the increase of the peoples wealth, and thereby the king's revenue is increased. And sometimes there is contained in grants a prohibition to other subjects, that they usurp not upon the privileges of such corporations upon a pain, as in the custome of forraign bought and forraign sold in London, and York; and divers customes are permitted to such corporations, as in the chamberlain of London's case, Cook 5. and the breach or violation of these customes is a decay of the corporations, and so an impairing of the revenues of the crown; and therefore the king may make them, and also give them privileges, and make inhibitions to others, not to usurp upon them. King Edward the third in the sixteenth year of his reign proclaimed, that no man should sell wool-fels, or leather, under such a price, so that these staple commodities might not be debased, and this at no place but at Northampton and Anwick; and this proclamation was the cause, wherefore the merchant in 43. assise 38. was punished for using deceit to abate the prices. And for precedents in this matter of impost, there are many of antiquitie. And first for wines. In 16. E. 1. the custome for a tun of wine was 4. s. and in 21. and 24. E. 3. it was increased to ———— and 12. 13. & 14. of H. 8. it was increased to 17. s. the tun. And after in the 4th. of Mary it was increased to 4. marks; and as it appears by the records of this court, it was answered upon accompt for all this time according to that rate. And it is apparent, that no act of parliament gave this to the king, but that it was imposed by his absolute power; and shall it now be doubted if it be lawful? God defend. Prifage, that the king shall have one hogs-head before the mast, and another hogs-head behinde, is not given to the king by any statute, but was only an impost by the king's power. The impost upon cloathes in 31. E. 1. was two shillings for a scarlet, and 18. d. for other cloathes in grain, and after in the 37th year of E. 3. it was raised again, and in the 37. E. 3. an act was made for the length of cloathes; in the 33. H. 8. it was raised again; and in the time of queen Mary, because that the making of so many cloathes made the impost of wooll to be of so small value, therefore the impost of every cloath was raised by her to a noble; and in the first of Eliz. an impost was imposed, for the overlength of cloathes; and it appears in 30. E. 3. that the impost of the cloath was for a stranger 2. s. 8. d. and for a denizen 1. s. and all for cloathes. Another impost was for woolfels, and leather. The 31. E. 1. it was for wooll half a mark for a sack, and after that to 10. s. and in the time of E. 3. to 20. s. and after to 40. s. and after to 3. l. and so of woolfels and leather; and as the benefit and price of commodities did rise, so was the impost raised, and no act of parliament for the first imposing, and increase thereof. And so much for woolfels and leather. Now for allom. Upon every kintal of allom was imposed 3. s. 4. d. which was answered upon accompt; and in the case of Smith, it was not doubted, if it shall be paid, as here it is, but if it were contained in Sm the patent or not. The imposition imposed upon coles. Now the 1. s. increase is paid. The imposition upon tobacco was never doubted to be unjust as this is.

And so much for precedents. And now for statutes. The statute of Magna Charta, cap. 30. which was objected, that thereby all merchants may have safe &c. to buy and sell, without ill tolls; but there is a saving, viz. by the antient and old customs. The statute of Articuli super chartas, cap. 2. hath a saving in the end of it, that the king or his council did not intend thereby to increase the antient prices due and accustomed. So are all the other statutes of purveyors. The statute of the 45. E. 3. cap. 4. which hath been so much urged, that no new imposition shall be imposed upon woollens, wooll, or leather, but only the custome and subsidie granted to the king; this extends only to the king himself, and shall not binde his successors; for it is a principal part of the crown of England, which the king cannot diminish. And the same king 24. of his reign granted divers exemptions to certain persons; and because that it was in derogation of his state imperial, he himself recalled and adnulled the same. As to that which was objected, that the defendant had paid poundage granted by the statute of the first of the king, that is nothing to this purpose; for that is a subsidie, and not a custome; for when any imposition is granted by parliament, it is only a subsidie, and not a custome, for the nature thereof is changed, and the impost of wine is paid over and above the poundage, and so should it be here. And whereas it was objected, that if it were in the time of war, it is sufferable, but in peace not, this seems no reason; for the king cannot be furnished to make defence in war, if he provide not in peace, and the provision is too late made, when it ought to be used. And as to that which was said, that the subject ought to have recompence, and valuable satisfaction, it seemeth to me that he hath; for he hath the kings protection within his ports, and his safe conduct upon the land, and his defence upon the sea. And all the ports of the realm belong to the king, and in this court there is a precedent where one in the time of queen Eliz. claimed to have a port to himself as his own, and it was adjudged that he could not, for it belonged to the queen, and it could not be severed; and the king only shall have the customs, for landing throughout all the land. And in the 17. of E. 3. there is a notable precedent, where he reciteth all the benefits which the subject had in his forraign traffick, by the kings power and protection, and therefore he imposed a new impost. The writ of ne exeat regnum comprehends a prohibition to him to whom it is directed, that he shall not go beyond the seas; and this may be directed at the kings pleasure to any man who is his subject; and so consequently may he prohibite all merchants; and as he may prohibite the persons, so may he the goods of any man, viz. that he shall export or import at his pleasure. And if the king may generally inhibite that such goods shall not be imported, then by the same reason may he prohibite them, upon condition or sub modo, viz. that if they import such goods, that then they shall pay &c. And if the general be lawful, the particular cannot be unjust; and the words in the writ of ne exeat regnum, viz. et quamplurima nobis, et coronæ nostræ præjudicialia ibidem prosequi intendis are not traversable by the subject, but he ought dutifully to obey his sovereign. As to that which is said, that this command to the treasurer is not sufficient under the great seal, that is otherwise; for before the statute of R. 2. for matter of customs no command was directed to the treasurer, but alwayes the king signified his pleasure to his customers under his privy seal, and this gave authoritie to them to collect customs, and the same authority is given now to the treasurer, and derived from him to the customers. As to that which is said, that the conclusion is evil, because it is in contempt of the king; without doubt it is a contempt, for the king may inhibit traffick into any part of the world, if he will, or inflict a pain upon any who shall trade into such place inhibited. So may he do upon any commoditie either inhibit it generally, or upon a pain or impost; and if a subject use the trade after such inhibition, or import his wares, and pay not the impost, it is a contempt, and the king shall punish him for it at his pleasure. And as to that which is said, that it is a burthen to the merchant, that is not so; for the burthen layeth it only upon the better part of the subjects; and if it were a burthen, it is no more than they themselves imposed, which was in their hands by commission in the time of queen Eliz. and they have raised the prices to subjects more than the value of the impost; and it is not to be intended, that the king by any impost will prejudice the cause of merchants, for the trade in general is to him more beneficial, than any particular impost. The case of the 11. and 14. H. 4. of Aulnageor is not to be compared to this case; for there the king had made a grant to a subject, and it was also of a thing which was granted before to a maior, and also of a commoditie within the land, and not transported. And for the case of Darcy, for the monopoly of cards, it is not like; for that is of a commoditie within the land, and betwixt the patentee and the king, and not between the king and the subject. And as to the exception taken to the information, that it is unjust, and doth not prescribe, this needeth not; for it is a prerogative wherein lieth no prescription, for every prerogative is as antient as the crown. And as to the conclusion of the information it was objected, that it is not good, for the informer ought to pray the forfeiture; but this belongs to the court to judge of what shall be lost or forfeited, the offence being a contempt, and therefore the conclusion good enough. And so for all these reasons, judgement shall be given for the king.

Fleming chief baron. Touching the exceptions to the information, they are of no force. For the first unjust, &c. it hath been well said, that the king needs not prescribe in any prerogative, for it is as antient as his crown is, 2. E. 3. and for the conclusion viz. that he is in contempt &c. that deserves no other answer, but that which hath been given before, for it is enough, without doubt warranted by infinite precedents. But for the bar, it is an increase of the defendants contempt, and no sufficient matter to answer, an indigested and confused tale, with an improper and disobedient conclusion, and there is in it multa non nullum; but the conclusion is without precedent, or example, for he saith, that the imposition, which the king had laid, is indebita, injusta, et contra legem Angliæ imposita, and therefore he refused &c. In the case of Smith for allom, the conclusion was moderate, and beseeching a subject, judgement if he shall have impost by his grant; and in the case of mines, the defendant, being a great peer of the realm, concluded upon his grant and interest in the foyle, and that he took the mettall, as it was lawful for him, and did not confront his sovereign with terms of injuria, indebita, and the like. And the king, as it is commonly said in our books, cannot do wrong; and if the king seise my land without cause, I ought to sue to him in humble manner, humillimè supplicavit &c. and not with such terms of opposition in the information; and all his matter had been saved to him then as well as now, or he might have pleaded his matter, and said wherefore he refused, as it was lawful for him. But for the matter it is of great consequence, and hath two powerful objects, which it principally respecteth. The one is the king, his power, and prerogative, his treasure, and the revenues of his crown; and to impair and derogate from any of these was a part most undutiful in any subject. The other is the trade and traffick of merchantdise, transportation in and out of the land of commodities, which further publick benefit ought much to be respected, and nourished as much as may be. The state of the question is touching a new custome. The impositions or customs are duties or summs of money newly imposed by the king without parliament upon merchantdise, for the augmentation of his revenues. All the questions arising in the case are, aut de personis, de rebus, vel de actionibus, viz. form and proceeding. The persons are first the king, his power, and authoritie; secondly, not Bates the defendant, nor the Venetians, but all men who import currants. The imposition is properly upon currants, and for them, and is not upon the defendant, nor his goods, who is a merchant; for upon him no imposition shall be, but by parliament. The things are currants, a forraign commoditie, and a victual; the 5. s. for impost, which is said to be great. The action formed or process is the command by the great seal, and the words therein are petere et recipere, if they be sufficient, and if good without proclamation or other notice, and how notice shall be given, and if it be good without an ad quod damnum. And the case of Mines in Ploeden, which is the sole case in the printed books of law, to this purpose hath in it foure reasons of the judgement. First, the excellency of the king, or his person. Secondly, the necessitie of coyn for his state. Thirdly, the utilitie of coyn for commerce. Fourthly, the inconvenience, if the subject should have such royal possessions. And these reasons are not extracted out of the books of law, but are only reasons of policy; for rex est legalis et politicus, and reasons polittick are sufficient guides to judges in their arguments, and such cases and precedents are good directions in cases of judgement, for they are demonstrations of the course of antiquitie. Whereupon my judgement shall consist upon reasons polittick, and precedents. The case in Dyer 1. Eliz. fo. 165. was not like to the case in question, but only a conference; and the case there was for an impost upon cloath, a domestick commoditie. In this case, are recited their grievances, but it was paid, and it is denied here; but there was no resolution thereof. At the same time, was the impost of wines increased, and paid, and no petition or complaint thereof. And the customs for Englands commodities were at the first imposed by the king's will, for no statute giveth them, viz. for wool, woollens and leather, and it was called the great custome; and that it was paid, it will not be denied; and yet now it is doubted, if the king can impose it upon forraign commodities. The king may restrain the person, as it is in Fitz. Nat. Br. à fortiori he may restrain the goods. There was no custom for home commodities, but the great custome aforesaid, which was after increased by parliament, which was called the petit custome. It is a great grace in the king to the merchants, that he will command, and permit this matter to be disputed between him and his subject, and the most fit place is in this court, and the best rules herein are the precedents thereof, and polittick reasons, which I shall give, and apply them to the particulars before recited. And first, for the person of the king, omnis potestas à Deo, et non est potestas nisi pro bono. To the king is committed the government of the realm and his people; and Bracton saith, that for his discharge of his office, God had given to him power, the act of government, and the power to govern. The kings power is double, ordinary and absolute, and they have severall lawes and ends. That of the ordinary is for the profit of particular subjects, for the execution of civil justice, the determining of numi; and this is exercised by equitie and justice in ordinary courts, and by the Civillians is nominated jus privatum, and with us common law; and these laws cannot be changed, without parliament; and although that their form and course may be changed, and interrupted, yet they can never be changed in substance. The absolute power of the king is not that which is converted or executed to private use, to the benefit of any particular person, but is only that which is applied to the general benefit of the people, and is salus populi; as the people is the body, and the king the head; and this power is guided by the rules, which direct only at the common law, and is most properly named policy and government; and as the constitution of this body varieth with the time, so varieth this absolute law, according to the wisdom of the king, for the common good; and these being general rules and true as they are, all things done within these rules are lawful. The matter in question is material matter of state, and ought to be ruled by the rules of policy; and if it be for the king hath done well to execute his extraordinary power. All customs, be they old or new, are no other but the effects and issues of trades and commerce with forraign nations; but all commerce and affairs with forrainers, all wars and peace, all acceptance and admitting for current forraign coyn, all parties and treaties whatsoever are made by the absolute power of the king; and he who hath power of causes, hath power also of effects. No exportation or importation can be, but at the kings ports. They are the gates of the king, and he hath absolute power by them to include or exclude whom he shall please; and ports to merchants are their harbours, and repose; and for their better securitie he is compelled to provide bulwarks, and fortresses, and to maintain, for the collection of his customs and duties, collectors and customers; and for that charge it is reason, that he should have this benefit. He is also to defend the merchants from pirates at sea in their passage. Also, by the power of the king they are to be relieved, if they are oppressed by forraign princes, for they shall have his treaty, and embassage; and if he be not remedied thereby, then lex talionis shall be executed, goods for goods, and tax for tax; and if this will not redress the matter, then war is to be attempted, for the cause of merchants. In all the kings courts, and of other princes, the judges in them are paid by the king, and maintained by him to do justice to the subjects, and therefore he hath the profits of the said courts. It is reasonable that the king should have as much power over forrainers and their goods, as over his own subjects; and if the king cannot impose upon forrain commodities a custome, as well as forrainers may upon their own commodities, and upon the commodities of this land when they come to them, then forrain states shall be enriched, and the king impoverished, and he shall not have equal profit with them; and yet it will not be denied, but his power herein is equal with other states. And so much for the person of Bates the subject. It is said, that an imposition may not be upon a subject without parliament. That the king may impose upon a subject, I omit; for it is not here the question, if the king may impose upon the subject or his goods; but the impost here is not upon a subject, but here it is upon Bates, as upon a merchant, who imports goods within this land, charged before by the king; and at the time when the impost was imposed upon them, they were the goods of the Venetians, and not the goods of a subject, nor within the land, but only upon those which shall be after imported; and so all the arguments, which were made for the subject, fail. And where it is said, that he is a merchant, and that he ought to have the sea open and free for him, and that trades of merchants and merchandise are necessary to export the surplus of our commodities, and then to import other necessities, and so is favourably to be respected; as to that it is well known, that the end of every private merchant is not the common good, but his particular profit, which is only the means which induceth him to trade and traffick. And the impost to him is nothing, for he rateth his merchandise according to that. The impost is imposed upon currants; and he, who will buy them, shall have them subject to that charge; and it is a great contempt to denie the payment. And so much for the person. I will give a brief answer to all the statutes alledged on the contrary part, with this exposition, that the subjects and merchants are to be freed of Maletolt; and this was toll unjustly exacted by London, Southampton, and other ports within this realm; but they are with this saving, that they pay the duties and customes, due, or which hereafter shall be due to the king; which is a full answer to all the statutes. The commodity of currants is no commodity of this land, but forrain. And whereas it is said, that it is victual and necessary food, it is no more necessary than wine, and impost for that hath been always paid, without contradiction; and without doubt, there are many drinkers of wine, who are also eaters of currants. That which should be said victual for the common-wealth is that, which ariseth from agriculture, and of the earth within this land, and not nice and delicate things imported by merchants, such as these currants are. They are rather delicacy or medicine than a victual; and it is no reason that so many of our good and staple commodities should be exported to Venice for such a slight delicacy, and that all the impost shall be paid to the Venetians for them, and the king should have none for their commodity; and although that the price be thereby raised, this hurteth not the merchant, nor no other, but only a small number of delicate persons, and those also who are of most able and best estate, for their pleasure. But when the king is in want, he is to be relieved by a general imposition or subsidie upon all the subjects. The imposition, which is here, is said to be so great and intollerable as an evil precedent; for, if he may do so much, he may do it in infinitum, and upon all other merchandise. For the imposition I say, that it is reasonable, for it is no more than foure times so much than was before; and that there hath been as much done in ancient time in other imposts, as in that of wooll, which was at first but a noble a sack, and is now at 50. s. The impost of wine was in ancient time 3. s. 4. d. a tun, and now is foure marks. The lessening of custome and impost is much to be guided by intelligence from forrain nations; for the usage and behaviour of a forrain prince may impose a necessity of raising custome of these commodities. And so it was in the particular of currants. The duke of Venice imposed upon them a duckett by the hundred, which by the wisdom of the state was foreseen to be a means, that in time will waste and consume the treasure of the land; whereupon the queen writ to the duke, that he would abate his custome, which he refused. Wherefore to prevent, that so great a quantitie of this commodity should not be imported into the land, the queen granted to the company of merchants of the Levant, that none should bring in currants, but by their licence; and those merchants imposed upon them who did import, which were not of their company, if he were denizen 5. s. if he were a stranger 10. s. And this was paid by the merchants without contradiction. But there was a clause in the patent, that when the duke of Venice abated his impost, that the patent should be void, and after the duke was solicited again, that he would abate the impost, but he refused, and the first commission was recalled, and after a new grant was made, which was executed all the queens life time, which was as aforesaid. And whereas it is said, that if the king may impose, he may impose any quantitie what he pleases, true it is, that this is to be referred to the wisdom of the king, who guideth all under God by his wisdom, and this is not to be disputed by a subject; and many things are left to his wisdom for the ordering of his power, rather than his power shall be restrained. The king may pardon any felon; but it may be objected, that if he pardon one felon he may pardon all, to the damage of the common-wealth; and yet none will doubt, but that is left to his wisdom. And as the king may grant a protection for one year, so it may be said, that he may grant it for many years, which is a mischief, and so ought to grant none, which will not be denied but that he may. So it may be said, that the queen may grant a safe conduct to a stranger; for if she may do that, then she may grant to all, which would be burthenfome to the inhabitants; and yet it will not be denied but that she may grant to any on all, as in her wisdom shall seem convenient. And the wisdom and providence of the king is not to be disputed by the subject; for by intendment they cannot be severed from his person, and to argue a possessio ad idem to restrain the king and his power, because that by his power he may do ill, is no argument for a subject. To prove the power of the king by precedents of antiquitie in a case of this nature may easily be done; and if it were lawful in ancient time, it is lawful now; for the authority of the king is not diminished, and the crown hath the same attributes, that then it had. And in ancient time such imposts were never denied; and that which is given by parliament is not an impost but a subsidie. In ancient time small traffick or intercourse was betwixt the inhabitants of this land and forrain nations, so that the principal custome was of the commodities of this land, which were woollfells and leather; and that the custome for woolls, which was a noble for a sack, was an imposition, appears by the statute of the 14. of Ed. 3. St. 1. cap. 21. It is objected, that merchants cannot be restrained, but only persons suspected, as the writ of ne exeat regnum is. But as it is said in Dyer before cited, it is without doubt, that the cause is not traversable, and that the king may inhibit any man; for if it be not traversable, it is not material. And the reason, wherefore any man may be restrained, is for defence of the realm; and it may be done by privie seal, privie signet, great seal, or proclamation; and that appears by the writ of licentia transportandi in the register, which containeth licence for one to travail, and limits him to what place he shall go, and when he shall return, and with what goods, so that the king may prohibit body and goods. And when a man is beyond the seas, the king may command him to return; and if he doth not obey such command, he shall forfeit his goods. Now for restraint of commodities many precedents are to prove it. In the time of H. 3. and E. 1. it was forbidden, that the wooll should be transported into Flanders; and in E. 1. a commission was awarded to enquire, who had done against this ordinance, and the goods of one Freeston were seized; and therefore, an attachment awarded against the ships of Hull, for transporting contrary to the ordinance. In the 22. E. 1. it was forbidden, that no merchant should trade with France; for trade with forrainers is a forrain thing, which is only referred to the king. In the 17. H. 6. all merchants were forbidden to import wares from Flanders into this land; and the citizens of London complained of certain merchants, which had done contrary to this ordinance to the lords of the privie council, which I have here ready; for the record mentions it, and the kings attorney was commanded to exhibit an information against the merchants, which he did; and they pleaded that the proclamation was made here upon Easter eve, and that they were then at Bruges, and upon the Wednesday after Bruges market they bought the wares before notice of the proclamation, and before it were possible that they could have notice of it, and pray judgement, &c. And so much for restraint of the person and goods. By the statute of 31. E. 3. cap. 8. times were appointed in which woolls should be transported; and also cap. 9. authority was given to the chancellor and treasurer, to defer the passage at their pleasure. But that this was the common law, and that the king by his supreme authority might do it, it seems to me it is apparent by the statute of the 26. H. 8. cap. 10. which gives power to the king by his letters patents, to limit the time for importing of wines against the statute of 23. H. 8. cap. 7. which was no more but a restoring of his power abridged before; and so was the statute of 31. E. 3. for otherwise the parliament would never have given him authority to contradict an act of parliament by his letters patents, or to revive these acts. Impositions are merely a new custome. And so are they filed in the margin of the roll of the 3. E. 1. in this court, where it is recorded, that the king had assigned merchants to receive (using the same words which are used here) half a mark for every sack of wooll, and a mark of every last of leather, and that if the merchant, who is so appointed transport any after, it shall be forfeited; and out of this record I observe, that three hundred pelts make a sack of wooll. From the 21. Ed. 1. unto the 28. E. 1. the customs for woolls was 40. s. a sack, and in 25. E. 1. the imposition of Maletolt was repealed by act of parliament, which Maletolt was an increase of impost upon staple commodities; and therefore was given to the king a great subsidie with this cause, that it should never be drawn into precedent; which shews, that this Maletolt was rightly imposed, otherwise the parliament would never have given him so great a recompense for the abrogation of it. But after in the 13. of E. 3. because it was a thing of so great consequence to the crown, it was revived and made 40. s. for wooll, and woollfells, and 3. l. for leather for denizens, and double for strangers. In the 14. Ed. 3. a petition in parliament to abate it; and for a great subsidie it was released; and in the 18. of Ed. 3. it was again revived, and a new petition was made in parliament, and this petition was continued until the 36. of Ed. 3. and then it was abated; and also by the 45. E. 3. it was again abated; so that it seems, that between these times it was revived; but after it did not continue long, for in 48. E. 3. it was again revived, and for wooll the impost was 50. s. et sic de singulis, and in 1. R. 2. after it was answered to the king, as it appears in the accompts here, and in 5. R. 2. it was again suppressed by parliament for a subsidie granted to the king with a saving of ancient rights. All these statutes prove expressly, that the king had power to increase the impost, and that upon commodities of the land, and that he continually used this power notwithstanding all acts of parliament against it. And so much for commodities of this land. But for forrain commodities it appears by no act of parliament, or other precedent, that ever any petition or suit was made to abate the impost of forrain commodities, but of them the impost was paid without denial. As for example, for wines in the 16. E. 1. as appears in this court upon record, it was commanded to the bailiff of Dever to levie and collect of every tun of wine of a stranger 4. s. and in the 22. E. 1. 2. s. thereof was released, at the suit of the French ambassador. In the 26. of E. 3. the king granted privileges to merchants strangers; but there was given for it an increase of custome; and this was answered as it appears upon account in the times of E. 1. and E. 2. The case of almon was as it hath been recited by my brother Clark. It is objected, that the merchant ought to have free passage upon the sea; but that doth not conclude the king, but that he shall have his impost if he cometh into his ports, and here the question is for merchandise after that they are brought into the port. But it is said, that they cannot come into the port but by the sea. That is true; but if this reason should hold, then the king could not grant murage, pontage, and the like, because the common channel to them is free, and average is for securitie as well as ports. Another objection, that the defendant here is not restrained; but that is answered, for if a pain be inflicted upon them who import, this is an inhibition upon a pain to all. Another objection was, that there was no consideration of the imposition; and if it be demanded what differences between the cases, I answer, as much as is between the king and a subject; and it is not reasonable reasonable, that the king should express the cause and consideration of his actions, for they are arcana regis, and no satisfaction needeth, for if the profits to the merchant faileth he will not trade, and it is for the benefit of every subject, that the kings treasure should be increased. An objection was made against the form of proceeding; because it was by the great seal to the treasurer, and that he by the customers peteret et reciperet; and this could not be better, as it was answered before. It was objected that it should be by proclamation; and that needs not, for it toucheth not all the subjects, but only those who are traders in merchandising, and the best and aptest means to give them notice is by the customers, and it is alledged by the information expressly, that he had notice. It was lastly objected, that there ought to be a quod damnum in the case before the grant. That is not so; for that shall be only when the king granteth any thing which appertaineth to his prerogative, and not when he maketh charters to his servants to levy his duties due to his crown. Wherefore I think, that the king ought to have judgment, which was after given accordingly.

Argument of sir Francis Bacon, the king's solicitor, in the lower house of parliament, in 1610, for impositions by the crown; from volume 2. of the last 4to. edition of his works, p. 223.

AND it please you, Mr. Speaker, this question touching the right of impositions is very great; extending to the prerogative of the king on the one part, and the liberty of the subject on the other; and that in a point of profit and value, and not of conceit or fancy. And therefore, as weight in all motions increaseth force, so I do not marvel to see men gather the greatest strength of argument they can to make good their opinions. And so you will give me leave likewise, being strong in mine own persuasion, that it is the king's right, to shew my voice as free as my thought. And for my part, I mean to observe the true course to give strength to this cause, which is, by yielding those things which are not tenable, and keeping the question within the true state and compass; which will discharge many popular arguments, and contract the debate into a less room.

Wherefore I do deliver the question, and exclude or set by, as not in question, five things. First, the question is de portorio, and not de tributo, to use the Roman words for explanation sake; it is not, I say, touching any taxes within the land, but of payments at the ports. Secondly, it is not touching any impost from port to port, but where claves regni, the keys of the kingdom, are turned to let in from foreign parts, or to send forth to foreign parts; in a word, matter of commerce and intercourse, not simply of carriage or vecture. Thirdly, the question is, as the distinction was used above in another case, de vero et falso, and not de bono et malo, of the legal point, and not of the inconvenience, otherwise than as it serves to decide the law. Fourthly, I do set apart three commodities, wools, woollfells, and leather, as being in different case from the rest; because the custom upon them is antiqua custuma. Lastly, the question is not, whether in matter of imposing the king may alter the law by his prerogative, but whether the king have not such a prerogative by law.

The state of the question being thus cleared and freed, my proposition is, that the king by the fundamental laws of this kingdom hath a power to impose upon merchandise and commodities both native and foreign. In my proof of this proposition all that I shall say, be it to confirm or confute, I will draw into certain distinct heads or considerations which move me, and may move you.

The first is an universal negative. There appeareth not in any of the king's courts any one record, wherein an imposition laid at the ports hath been overthrown by judgment; nay more, where it hath been questioned by pleading. This plea, quod summa praedicta minus juste imposita sunt, et contra leges et consuetudines regni hujus Angliae, unde idem Bates illam solvere recusavit, prout ei bene licuit, is primae impressionis. Bates was the first man ab origine mundi, for any thing that appeareth, that ministered that plea; whereupon I offer this to consideration. The king's acts that grieve the subject are either against law, and so void; or according to strictness of law, and yet grievous. And according to these several natures of grievance, there be several remedies. Be they against law? Overthrow them by judgment. Be they too strait and extreme, though legal? Propound them in parliament. Forasmuch then as impositions at the ports, having been so often laid, were never brought into the king's courts of justice, but still brought to parliament, I may most certainly conclude, that they were conceived not to be against law. And if any man shall think that it was too high a point to question by law before the judges, or that there should want fortitude in them to aid the subject; no, it shall appear from time to time, in cases of equal reach, where the king's acts have been indeed against law, the course of law hath run, and the judges have worthily done their duty.

As in the case of an imposition upon linen cloth for the alnage; overthrown by judgment.

The case of a commission of arrest and committing of subjects upon examination without conviction by jury, disallowed by the judges.

A commission to determine the right of the exigenter's place, secundum sanam discretionem, disallowed by the judges.

The case of the monopoly of cards overthrown and condemned by judgment.

I might make mention of the jurisdiction of some courts of discretion, wherein the judges did not decline to give opinion. Therefore, had this been against law, there would not have been altum silentium in the king's courts. Of the contrary judgments I will not yet speak; thus much now, that there is no judgment, no nor plea against it. Though I said no more, it were enough, in my opinion, to induce you to a non liquet, to leave it a doubt.

The second consideration is, the force and continuance of payments made by grants of merchants, both strangers and English, without consent of parliament. Herein I lay this ground, that such grants considered in themselves are void in law: for merchants, either strangers or subjects, they are no body corporate, but singular and dispersed persons; they cannot bind succession, neither can the major part bind the residue: how then should their grants have force? No otherwise but thus; that the king's power of imposing was only the legal virtue and strength of those grants; and that the consent of a merchant is but a concurrence, the king is principale agens, and they are but as the patient, and so it becomes a binding act out of the king's power.

Now if any man doubt that such grants of merchants should not be of force, I will alledge but two memorable records, the one for the merchants strangers, the other for the merchants English. That for the strangers is upon the grant of chart. mercator. of three pence in value ultra antiquas custumas; which grant is in use and practice at this day. For it is well known to the merchants, that That which they call stranger's custom, and erroneously double custom, is but three pence in the pound more than English. Now look into the statutes of subsidy of tonnage and poundage, and you shall find, a few merchandise only excepted, the poundage equal upon alien and subject; so that this difference or excess of three pence hath no other ground than that grant. It falleth to be the same in quantity; there is no statute for it, and therefore it can have no strength but from the merchants grants; and the merchants grants can have no strength but from the king's power to impose.

For the merchants English, take the notable record in 17 E. III. where the commons complained of the forty shillings upon the sack of wool as a mal-toll set by the assent of the merchants without consent of parliament; nay, they dispute and say it were hard that the merchants consent should be in damage of the commons. What faith the king to them? Doth he grant it or give way to it? No; but replies upon them, and faith, it cannot be rightly construed to be in prejudice of the commons, the rather because provision was made, that the merchants should not work upon them, by colour of that payment to increase their price; in that there was a price certain set upon the wools. And there was an end of that matter: which plainly affirmeth the force of the merchants grants. So then the force of the grants of merchants both English and strangers appeareth; and their grants, being not corporate, are but noun adjectives without the king's power to impose.

The third consideration is of the first and most ancient commencement of customs; wherein I am somewhat to seek; for, as the poet saith, ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit, the beginning of it is obscure: but I rather conceive that it is by common law, than by grant in parliament. For, first, Mr. Dyer's opinion was, that the ancient custom for exportation was by the common laws; and goeth further, that that ancient custom was the custom upon wools, woollfells, and leather. He was deceived in the particular, and the diligence of your search hath revealed it; for that custom upon these three merchandises grew by grant of parliament 3 E. I. But the opinion in general was found; for there was a custom before that: for the records themselves, which speak of that custom, do term it a new custom, alentour del novel custome, as concerning the new custom granted, etc. This is pregnant, there was yet a more ancient. So for the strangers, the grant in 31 E. I. chart. mercator. is, that the three pence granted by the strangers should be ultra antiquas custumas, which hath no affinity with that custom upon the three species, but presupposeth more ancient customs in general. Now if any man think, that those more ancient customs were likewise by act of parliament, it is but a conjecture. It is never recited ultra antiquas custumas prius concessas, and acts of parliament were not much stirring before the great charter, which was 9 H. III. And therefore I conceive with Mr. Dyer, that whatsoever was the ancient custom was by the common law. And if by the common law, then what other means can be imagined of the commencement of it but by the king's imposing?

The fourth consideration is of the manner that was held in parliament in the abolishing of impositions laid: wherein I will consider, first, the manne of the petitions exhibited in parliament; and more specially the nature of the king's answers.

For the petitions I note two things; first, that to my remembrance there was never any petition made for the revoking of any imposition upon foreign merchants only. It pleased the Decemviri in 5 E. II. to deface chart. mercator. and so the imposition upon strangers, as against law. But the opinion of these reformers I do not much trust, for they of their gentleness did likewise bring in doubt the demy-mark, which it is manifest was granted by parliament, and pronounced by them the king should have it, s'il avoit le droit: but this is declared void by 1 E. III. which reneweth chart. mercator. and void must it needs be, because it was an ordinance by commission only, and that in the time of a weak king, and never either warranted or confirmed by parliament. Secondly, I note that petitions were made promiscuously for taking away impositions set by parliament as well as without parliament; nay, that very tax of the neufisme, the ninth sheaf or fleece, which is recited to be against the king's oath and in blemishment of his crown, was an act of parliament, 14 E. III. So then to infer that impositions were against law, because they are taken away by succeeding parliaments, it is no argument at all; because the impositions set by the parliaments themselves, which no man will say were against law, were nevertheless afterwards pulled down by parliament. But indeed the argument holdeth rather the other way, that because they took not their remedy in the king's courts of justice, but did fly to the parliament, therefore they were thought to stand with law.

Now for the king's answers. If the impositions complained of had been against

against law, then the king's answer ought to have been simple, tantum responsis categorica, non hypothetica; as, let them be repealed, or, let the law run. But contrariwise, they admit all manner of diversities and qualifications: for,

Sometimes the king disputeth the matter and doth nothing; as 17 E. III. Sometimes the king distinguisheth of reasonable and not reasonable, as 38 E. III.

Sometimes he abolisheth them in part, and letteth them stand in part, as 11 E. II. the record of the mutuum, and 14 E. III. the printed statute, whereof I shall speak more anon.

Sometimes that no imposition shall be set during the time that the grants made of subsidies by parliament shall continue, as 47 E. III. Sometimes that they shall cease ad voluntatem nostram.

And sometimes that they shall hold over their term prefixed or assented.

All which sheweth, that the king did not disclaim them as unlawful, for actus legitimus non recipit tempus aut conditionem. If it had been a disaffirmance by law, they must have gone down in solido; but now you see they have been tempered and qualified as the king saw convenient.

The fifth consideration is of that which is offered by way of objection; which is, first, that such grants have been usually made by consent of parliament; and secondly, that the statutes of subsidies of tonnage and poundage have been made as a kind of stint and limitation, that the king should hold himself unto the proportion so granted and not imposed further; the rather because it is expressed in some of these statutes of tonnage and poundage, sometimes by way of protestation, and sometimes by way of condition, that they shall not be taken in precedent, or that the king shall not impose any further rates or novelties, as 6 R. II. 9 R. II. 13 H. IV. 1 H. V. which subsidies of tonnage and poundage have such clauses and cautions.

To this objection I give this answer. First, that it is not strange with kings, for their own better strength, and the better contentment of their people, to do those things by parliament, which nevertheless have perfection enough without parliament. We see their own rights to the crown which are inherent; yet they take recognition of them by parliament. And there was a special reason why they should do it in this case; for they had found by experience, that, if they had not consent in parliament to the setting of them up, they could not have avoided suit in parliament for the taking of them down. Besides, there were some things requisite in the manner of the levy for the better strengthening of the same, which percase could not be done without parliament; as the taking the oath of the party touching the value, the inviting of the discovery of concealment of custom by giving the money to the informer, and the like.

Now in special for the statutes of subsidies of tonnage and poundage, I note three things. First, that the consideration of the grant is not laid to be for the restraining of impositions, but expressly for the guarding of the sea. Secondly, that it is true, that the ancient form is more peremptory, and the modern more submissive; for in the ancient form sometimes they insert a flat condition that the king shall not further impose; in the latter they humbly pray, that the merchants may be demeaned without oppression, paying those rates. But whether it be supplication, or whether it be condition, it rather implieth the king hath a power; for else both were needless, for conditio annektitur ubi libertas praesumitur, and the word oppression seemeth to refer to excessive impositions. And thirdly, that the statutes of tonnage and poundage are but cumulative and not privative of the king's power precedent, appeareth notably in the three pence overplus, which is paid by the merchants strangers, which should be taken away quite, if those statutes were taken to be limitations; for in that, as was touched before, the rates are equal in the generality between subjects and strangers; and yet that imposition, notwithstanding any supposed restriction of these acts of subsidies of tonnage and poundage, remaineth at this day.

The sixth consideration is likewise to an objection, which is matter of practice, viz. that from R. II.'s time to Q. Mary, which is almost 200 years, there was an intermission of impositions, as appeareth both by records and the custom-books.

To which I answer; both that we have in effect an equal number of years to countervail them, namely, 100 years in the times of the three kings Edwards added to 60 of our last years; and extrema obrunt media; for we have both the reverence of antiquity and the possession of the present times, and they but the middle times. And besides, in all true judgment there is a very great difference between an usage to prove a thing lawful, and a non-usage to prove it unlawful: for the practice plainly implieth consent; but the discontinuance may be, either because it was not needful, though lawful; or because there was found a better means, as I think it was indeed in respect of the double customs by means of the staple at Calais.

Transcript of part of sir John Davis's manuscript argument for impositions by the crown, from Carte's History, vol. 4. p. 191.—[From the title to the printed treatise by sir John Davis on the same subject, it appears to have been written the latter end of the reign of James the first.]

THE king is the fountain of all justice, as well commutative as distributive. The first is exercised chiefly in the ordering and government of trade and commerce; wherein he is to do justice, or procure it to be done, not only to his subjects who make contracts real or personal within the land, but to his merchants also, who trade with foreign nations, and to strangers who traffick in his dominions. For the administration of commutative justice within the land, the king receives various profits, which grew first by way of imposition; as fines for original process to recover debts, fines for passing lands from one to another in his courts, and in common recoveries, and the silver pro licentia concordandi, the profits of the seals in his courts for all manner of writs, &c. nor is the taking of these and the like duties any breach of Magna Charta; having been imposed by the king long before that charter was made, and taken as a recompence for the charge of the crown in maintaining the courts of justice. There is the same reason for his charge in doing justice, and procuring justice to be done abroad to merchants, whose commerce is for the most part out of the land, being recompensed out of the merchandizes exported and imported, not according to the will of the merchant, or the pleasure of the people, but in proportion to the king's charge, which being best known to himself, it is fit that the recompence should be fixed by himself. All leagues, truces, and treaties of state, with foreign princes (in which the public trade and commerce of merchants is ever included) are made and concluded at his charge; he maintains a court of admiralty for deciding all marine causes, which generally concern merchants; his council of state is applied to, in case of injuries contrary to the sense of treaties; he is at a vast expence in keeping resident ambassadors in different courts, chiefly for procuring justice to be done our merchants; and in case of their being wronged and denied justice abroad, the king, by his prerogative, grants them letters of marque or reprisal, to right themselves; and if those injuries are multiplied or continued with an high hand, it is his office directly to denounce and make war on such prince or state, as refuses to do justice to his merchants. So king Charles had lately done against France. It was for this cause (as Appian says) the Romans began the first Punic war; and Cicero (a) affirms, that they frequently waged war for the injurious treatment of their merchants. The making of war and peace is an undisputed prerogative of the crown: he maintains a fleet, to protect merchants from spoil and piracy (b) (which the Romans thought a just reason for customs) at a charge too great to be defrayed by the poundage laid by Edward I. at the rate of three pence, though silver being then at twenty pence an ounce, the groat was intrinsically worth near a shilling, and it being levied at this last rate, in the time of Edward IV. (c) was found insufficient for the maintenance of his navy. The flow of money from the East and West Indies vastly enhanced the price of merchandize, and the charges of the crown, as well in all other articles as in that of the royal navy. Hence arose a necessity of new impositions, it not being fit, that the king's charges, in supporting the trade of merchants, should be unlimited and infinite, and the duty on merchandize be stinted and restrained to such a proportion only as the subject shall be pleased to grant him. Subjects may live as privately as they please; but a king, by reason of the majesty of his estate, cannot well abridge his charge, and would be in a poor situation, if he had no power of himself, without their leave, to improve his revenue.

As he protects the merchants, and gives them convoys at sea, he grants them safe conducts at land (no other being allowed by the law of nations, or acknowledged by Magna Charta) and receives their ships into his harbours. The king is the custos, or guardian, of the whole realm, but he is more particularly lord of the ports, not only of the Cinque Ports, where he appoints a warden to exercise his jurisdiction, but of all the rest in the kingdom; and our kings have ever enjoyed the prerogative of opening and shutting them at their pleasure. In the reign of Edward III. great part whereof was spent in war, there are several petitions in the rolls of parliament for opening the sea, when it was shut by his prerogative; yet he never opened it again, without laying an extraordinary imposition upon merchandize. This prerogative was founded on excellent reason; for commerce is not to be held with all persons. Else enemies might discover the secrets of the realm, and corrupt religion or the manners of the people. Nor are all things fit to be exported, particularly such as the kingdom cannot spare, or may be of advantage to the enemy, as corn in a time of dearth, warlike stores in war, &c. Embargos are of the same nature with the stopping of ports, and equally appropriated to the king, being an incident annexed to his prerogative of making war and peace. When war is denounced, all trade is stopped between the nations engaged therein; and if a king can stop it, he must of course have a power to open it, and lay reasonable impositions on merchants for doing so. It is a rule in law, he that may do more may do less; and he, that can forbid people to trade or pass at all, may dispense with the prohibition, and give them leave to traffick under certain conditions. Our kings have forbid (d) trade, sometimes generally, sometimes between us and particular nations, sometimes for particular merchandizes only; of all which there are examples enough in our records and histories. All companies of merchants are instituted by the king; and he that gives their privileges may likewise prescribe the terms, on which they are to enjoy them, exclusive of others. The king is lord of the sea about this island, not only as to jurisdiction and protection, but as to property (e). Hence all land drained from the sea belongs, by the common law, to the crown (as Stamford (f) says) de jure gentium; and all seas belong to the next potentate, at least so long as they are formidable: and all navigable rivers, being like arms of the sea, so far as the tide floweth. Hence, antecedent to any statute, the king (g) might restrain all his subjects, of what quality soever, from going beyond sea, as Edward I. did in the 22d year of his reign; and the like prohibitions were (b) made in those of his successors. If he allows merchants to pass to and fro, to come in and out of his streams and ports, he may certainly prescribe the conditions, and what duties they shall pay. Trade was carried on by the English many hundreds of years, before there was such a thing known as an house of commons: it was carried on with so great profit, that our riches served for admiration to other nations, even to the Normans at the time of the Conquest: but if our kings had not the same authority, as other princes, both in commerce, and in impositions, it could never have been carried on with advantage. They could not without it have held the balance of trade upright, or have preserved an equality between their own subjects and foreigners. Our neighbours might otherwise drain off all our wealth, and ruin our trade at their pleasure: and their princes, having the sole right to lay impositions, might manage the market so, that their subjects should sell dear, and buy cheap, unless our kings had the same powers to prevent the ill effects of their measures, and the ruin of our commerce. Thus when the state of Venice laid a ducat upon every hundred weight of currants carried out of their dominions by the English merchants, queen Elizabeth, by a special patent, in the 12th year of her reign, enabled her merchants trading to the Levant, to levy a noble upon every hundred weight of currants brought into England by any merchant stranger. Thus when the Hanse Towns had got the emperor to banish all English merchants out of Germany, the same queen caused their house called the Steel-yard to be seized, forbade them to traffick with any of her subjects, and ordered their merchants to quit England, the same day that the English were to depart out of the empire. Nothing is more evident, than the necessity of our kings having the same power, in impositions as well as commerce, as other princes; they always exercised it well, and there was no danger of their abusing it, whilst the best part of their revenue depended thereon: and whoever will consider, how light, easy, reasonable, and calculated for the benefit of trade, the impositions of our kings were, must be allowed an uncommon measure of public spirit, if he is very fond of the change into heavier, because they are parliamentary impositions.

These are some of the reasons that may be assigned for the royal prerogative in point of laying impositions, which all monarchs enjoyed by the law of nations, and which the civil law considered as so inherent in the scepter, that it could not be taken away without the destruction of the scepter. In fact, it had been always exercised in this island; the British princes, whose territories were situated on the sea, laid (as Strabo says) heavy duties on the native commodities, which the Gaulic merchants transported hence to their own country: and some pieces of the tribute money paid to Cunobeline, with his image and superscription, are still preserved. The Romans laid the like impositions; the power of laying them was incident to the imperial authority; and when the empire was overrun by the Goths and other northern nations, the princes thereof succeeded to, and exercised the same right, in all the countries which they conquered. The Saxon kings did the same here: and even Magna Charta attests, that there were ancient and right customs paid by merchants, before the making of that charter, and before an house of commons was in being. These customs were indeed but small; such as half a mark on a sack of wool, or 300 woollfells, a mark on a last of leather, those on tin and lead were proportionably easy: and when king John laid 8d. a ton on wine; and Edward I. in his Carta Mercatoria, laid 3d. in the pound upon merchandize imported by strangers, generally called the petit custom, with an increase of all other duties on them; the one was as much a tonnage, and the other a poundage, as if higher rates had been imposed; and the question is only about the king's right in the thing itself, not about the quantum of the imposition. Nor was the difference in point of the rate or quantity anything considerable, for a poundage of 3d. in those days was more worth to the crown, than that of a shilling now; and the duty of two shillings a tun upon all wine imported by strangers (which Edward I. imposed by the same charter) was, each shilling weighing then as much as three now, double the value of the present tonnage. Those who were for stripping the crown of this branch of its authority, objected to Edward's charter in this point, that it was suspended by his successor's writ (i), in the 3d year of his reign, and in the 5th repealed (k) by ordinance: but this was done not by the king and parliament, but by certain rebellious barons, who assumed the government of the realm, and called themselves Ordainers. It is well known, how turbulent a reign this was, and how weak a prince sat upon the throne, scarce ever master of himself, and so distressed by this violence of the barons (several of whose ordinances were treasonable) that he was forced to take up large sums of money by way of loan (l) from the merchants, which being never repaid, the merchants received thence greater detriment, than they would have done by paying double the poundage imposed by his father. But no sooner did Edward III. get possession of the crown, than (m) he received his grandfather's charter, and ordered by his writs, the poundage and other customs therein contained to be levied to his use, notwithstanding the ordinances made, not by the king his father, but per quosdam magnates.

Edward III. was a great prince; and being embarked in expensive wars during the most part of his reign, he put extraordinary duties, sometimes of 4 s. sometimes 5 s. upon wool, and the like upon other commodities. This gave occasion to several petitions of the commons in parliament, upon which a greater stress hath been laid than they deserve. It doth not appear, that these petitions were of right, but rather of grace and favour; they are far from inferring, either that the people had received wrong, or that the king had no right to lay impositions. It never behoved any prince more, than Edward, to be well with his people, to whom he was obliged to apply every year for the support of his wars; he was infinitely careful in this respect: and his answers to their petitions were generally gracious, but wary and circumspect. On some heads he was silent; on others, his answers were general or doubtful; sometimes he granted them in part, for a certain time, and on condition he received a greater recompence; nor did he ever remit any imposition, without receiving a subsidy of more considerable value. In his 14th year (n), the commons prayed him not to take above the half mark on a sack of wool, nor more than the old customs on lead, tin, and leather. In his answer, he granted their request, not for tin or lead, but only for wool and leather; yet this grace was not to take place, till after the Whitsontide to come twelvemonth; it was granted but in part, to Englishmen only, not to foreign merchants: and yet though all these new impositions were to continue for above a year, he got a parliamentary grant, not only of 20,000 sacks of wool, but of the 9th lamb, the 9th fleece of wool, and the 9th sheaf of corn, of all persons, both clergy and laity, throughout the kingdom. In his 29th year, (o) the commons wanting to get the 40 s. duty, laid on a sack of wool, to be taken off, it was agreed in parliament, that the king should have a greater subsidy out of wool and leather for six years, so as, during that time, he laid no other imposition or charge upon the commons. This is evidently a conditional agreement (p), and the people would scarce have bought it so dear, if the king had not a right to lay them; and if he suspended his power of imposing for six years, it was in consideration of a recompence of greater value. The punishments of lord Latimer, John Pechy, and Richard Lyons, in the fiftieth of this king, when through age and grief at the Black Prince's death, he was become weak, sickly, languid, melancholy, and almost stupid, made as little to the purpose of those who urge them against the royal power in impositions. Pechy had got a patent, that none should sell sweet wines in the city of London, but himself, his deputies, and assigns; and under colour thereof, extorted ten groats for every pipe of sweet wines sold by others within the city; it doth not appear that he had any warrant for it from his patent, and his being punished for abusing it, and doing things of his own head, is no argument against the king's right of laying the like imposition. Latimer had, of his own authority, laid several impositions on merchandize at Calais, to the great decay of the staple there. He had likewise played the stock-jobber in buying the debentures, tallies, and ticquets, due from the king to his soldiers and pensioners, at a great discount, giving very little to the parties, and yet, in deceit of his majesty, had an entire allowance for them in the Exchequer. He had also defrauded the king of the pay sent to his forces in Bretagne, had sold a large quantity of provisions for his army there, converting the money to his own use; and had delivered up the towns of S. Sauveur in Normandie, and Becherel in Bretagne, to the enemy, not without the suspicion of corruption and treason. He was censured for all these crimes in the grofs, so that nothing can be drawn thence against the right of the crown in laying impositions on merchandize; especially since Latimer was charged with laying the impost at Calais, without any warrant, and purely of his own authority. Lyons, a farmer of the customs, was accused (q) of setting on wool and other merchandize, certain new impositions without assent of parliament, converting them to his own use without controul, the lord treasurer not being acquainted therewith; and of assuming to himself in divers other things, as a king. He pleaded indeed, that he laid them by the king's command, but he produced no warrant, nor could he have any without the treasurer's knowledge: and he was justly punished by fine, ransom, and imprisonment. The king's right could not be any ways affected by this sentence on a man, who had acted of his own head; especially since his charge was, 'that being but a subject, he had taken upon him, as a king, in divers things, particularly in laying impositions;' which intimates sufficiently, that a king might do it, but not a subject. This is still more plain in the bill exhibited by the commons in this parliament (r), praying, 'that those who should set new impositions by their own authority, accroaching to themselves royal power, might have judgment of life and member;' than which there cannot be desired a plainer acknowledgment, by parliament, that the setting of impositions belonged to the crown, and was a mark of sovereignty and royal power.

In 38 E. III. (Rot. Parl. n. 26.) they petitioned for the repeal of an imposition of ten groats on every sack of wool at Calais, and of all unreasonable impositions; an answer was given to the last of these points, but none at all to the former. In 6 E. III. (Rot. Parl. n. 4.) on a petition for the remitting of impositions, the king said, 'He would assent no such tallies for the future, but such as had been in the time of his ancestors, and as it ought to be by reason.' In 13 E. III. (Rot. Parl. n. 13.) there was a petition against a maletolt of wool: but no answer was given. (q) Rot. Parl. 30 E. III. n. 17, 18, 19, 20. (r) Ibid. n. 192.

Mr. Hakewill's argument in the lower house of parliament, in 1610, against impositions by the crown. (a)

MR. SPEAKER:

The question now in debate amongst us is, Whether his majesty may, by his prerogative royall, without assent of parliament, at his own will and pleasure, lay a new charge or imposition upon merchandizes, to be brought into, or out of this kingdom of England; and enforce merchants to pay the same.

I MUST confesse, that when this point was first stirred amongst us, and that wee, not contented to seeke redresse for the excesse of the present impositions, resolved to proceed farther, by calling his majesties right of imposing into question, I was very sory: for I saw we were then in a faire way to have obtained a very great abatement of the impositions that now are; and besides, we had his majesties promise never to lay any more but in parliament time, by the advice and free consent of his subjects, repaying hither from all parts of the realme. This hope of a present ease, and gracious promise for the time to come, gave me, I confesse, a full satisfaction; especially, seeing I was confidently perswaded, that his majesties right to impose was very cleere and not to be disputed; and that therefore by drawing into question the right, wee might give his majesty just occasion to withdraw from us his gracious purpose of the present abatement, as also his promise for the time to come. For, syr, when the case of Bates, who as you know was called into question for refusing to pay the imposition laid upon currants, was argued in the Exchequer, in which case his majesties right to impose was solemnly disputed, and there resolved for his majesty, I was then present at all the arguments both at the bar and at the bench; and I doe confesse that by the weighty and unanswerable reasons, as I then conceived them, of those grave and reverend judges, sitting in their seate of justice, I was much perswaded. But by those many records vouched by them, I was altogether overcome, and as it were vanquish't to yeeld to them; for syr, ratio suadet, auctoritas vincit. But though I were then, and when the question was first moved in this house, very confident, yet as you shall perceive anon, I was not very constant in that opinion; for being, amongst others, imployed by this house to make search in the Exchequer for records, which, by the practise of former ages, might guide our judgements in this weighty point, and having diligently collected the arguments made in the Exchequer, and not only so, but compared my owne collections with reports thereof made by divers other of my friends, and finding that some of the records urged in those arguments were untruly vouched, and many misapplied, I then began to stagger in my opinion, and presently fell to examine the weight of the reasons which had been alledged, which in my poore censure, I found not of strength sufficient, without the full concurrence of cleere presidents of former times, to maintaine the judgement given, or my opinion grounded thereupon. And therefore, syr, in love to the truth I did forsake my former opinion as erroneous, and do now embrace the contrary, that is, that his majesty hath no right to impose, and so am now become a convert. Those reasons that moved mee thus to change, and the weakenesse which I discovered in the reasons alledged against the opinion which I now hold, I will, with your patience, open unto you, and will therein follow the commandement of Christ to Peter, being converted, seeke to convert my brethren.

As touching the judgement in the Exchequer standing yet in force, so often cast as a block in our way, though I much reverence the persons of those yet living, and the memory of those that are with God, who gave the judgement: yet seeing (as I hope I shall bee able evidently to prove) the same to bee against the great charter of our liberties, I can esteeme no otherwise of it than the statute of 25. Ed. 1. cap. 10. pronounceth of all such judgements; that is, that it is void and to be held for nought. Thus much I thought good to say by way of preamble or introduction to the matter. Now, by your favours, I will enter into the debate of the question; in handling of which I will purposely avoid the repetition of any thing that hath been spoken by any man that hath argued before, as knowing in what presence I speake. That I may the better convey my selfe through my argument, and be the better conceived of you that are to heare me, I will divide that which I have to say into certain parts, which I will prosecute in order.

First, I hold it necessary to consider, whether custome were due to the king by the common-law.

Secondly, admitting it to bee due by the common-law, whether it were a summe certain, not to be increased at the kings pleasure or otherwise.

Thirdly, supposing that by the common-law the king might, by way of imposition, have increased his custome at his own will, by his absolute power, without assent in parliament, whether or no hee bee not bound to the contrary by acts of parliament. In the handling of which part, I will consider the strength of every act of parliament hitherto vouched to this purpose, answering, as I goe, such objections as have been made against those statutes by such as have maintained that the king is not bound by them. I will also add a statute or two as yet not remembered by any.

Lastly, I will discover unto you the weaknesse of such reasons as have been made in maintenance of the kings right to impose.

In the prosecuting of which parts I will, as occasion is offered, give some answer to that which hath been last spoken; as knowing it to be expected at my hands.

By Sir Robert Hitcham.

(a) This argument was printed in 1641, with this title, 'The Libertie of the Subject: against the pretended Power of Impositions. Maintained by an argument in parliament an. 7. Jacobi Regis. By William Hakewill, of Lincolns Inne, Esq.' It was preceded with the following address from Mr. Hakewill to the reader. 'Being very sensible of a great injury lately done mee, by the extreme false printing of a small treatise of my composing, stoln out without my consent, and hearing accidentally that some part of this also had passed the presse, I thought good for the preventing of the like wrong to stay the forwardnesse of the printer untill I had reviewed and corrected it by mine owne notes. For my part, I should have been contented altogether to have restrained it, if I might; but now seeing it must abroad, I shall not bee ashamed to let it beare my name, and owne the errors of it my self (those of the presse excepted) though heretofore it had gayned so much reputation by some, as it was attributed to a worthier author. Some there are yet surviving that heard this argument about thirty yeeres since in the commons-house of parliament; but it hath now extended itselfe beyond the probable proportion of a speech or argument, by the insertion of many records and acts of parliament more at large, which, at the delivery of it, were but merely quoted. The endeavour of it is to prove, that the just prerogative of our kings never warranted them to raise monies at their pleasure, by laying a charge on merchandize to bee exported or imported, without assent of parliament. But, on the contrary, the settled lawes of the land, the presidents of former ages, the acts of our most necessitous and powerfull princes, and indeed every thing requisite to make the truth apparent, doe as it were unanimously consent to discharge us of this unjust and heavy burthen. And you shall see herein, how the policy of active princes hath by many waies attempted to undermine those fortifications, which the wisdom of our ancestors hath raysted to maintaine themselves from this kinde of assault. You shall see with how great difficulty their prevailing was withstood. And (which is the glory of truth) you shall finde those designs, which were laid to overthrow our right, mainly to make for the evidence and confirmation of it. For, whatever unjust impositions were either exacted by a pretended lawfullnesse, or set up by a commanding power, were by complaint in parliaments presently following taken down, and remain on record as (witnesses against themselves) unlawfull, and against our libertie. These reasons and arguments of mine (how meane soever) those times, wherein I urged them, accepted favorably; and since, in their private passage in manuscripts, were entertained in many judicious hands, which made mee somewhat enlarge the conceit that before I had of them. And now seeing necessitie enforceth mee to make them more publique, I must adventure them to the censure of these nice times. Beneficiall (happily) they may be to some, prejudiciall I hope to none. In which confidence (having the leave of authority) they have likewise my leave to goe abroad.'

There are also prefixed the following heads of the argument:

1. That there was ever some custome due to the king by the common-law.
2. That it was a sum certaine by the common-law.
3. That all the revenues which the common-law giveth to the king (out of the interest of the subject) are certaine, or reduceable to a certainty by some legall course, and none left to the kings pleasure.
4. The reasons why the law requireth such certainty in those revenues which the king hath out of the interest of the subject.
5. Examples of revenues given by the common-law to the king, out of the interest of the subject, and that they are all certaine.
6. Answer to an objection, that the king may lay impositions upon extraordinary occasions.
7. Arguments drawn from the actions of our kings, that they had no power to impose.
8. Arguments drawn from the forbearance of our kings to lay impositions, notwithstanding their urgent occasions.
9. The difference between the presidents urged, of impositions laid by the ancient kings, and those which are now laid.
10. A particular answer to the imposition of 3d. in the pound laid upon merchant-strangers by Charta Mercatoria, 31 Ed. 1.
11. The urgent occasions which Ed. 2. had to lay impositions, and yet how he forbore.
12. The severall policies used by Ed. 3. for the introducing of the power of imposing. 1. Impositions taken by colour of a voluntary grant from merchants. 2. By way of dispensation with penall lawes. 3. By way of ordinance in parliament. 4. By colour of a loan by merchants. 5. By grants of merchants for liberties granted to them.
6. By expresse and direct commandement; with severall answers to all those severall waies.
13. In what statutes impositions are mentioned after Edw. 3. time, untill Qu. Maries; and upon what occasions, and how to be interpreted.
14. The signification of the words impositio, toll, maletoll, custuma & consuetudo magna & parva.
15. No imposition laid from Ed. 3. time till Qu. Maries.
16. What urgent occasions all the kings from Ed. 3. till Qu. Maries time, had to lay impositions, and yet did it not. Rich. 2. Hen. 4. Hen. 5. Hen. 6. Edw. 4. Hen. 7. Hen. 8. Edw. 6. with a corollary of all those times and occasions.
17. The impositions laid by Qu. Mary, and how answered.
18. Admitting the kings had power by the common-law to lay impositions, yet how they are barred by statutes.
19. Magna Charta, cap. 30. urged against impositions, and the objection made against it, answered. 1. Objection, that it extendeth onely to merchant-strangers.
2. That it was made onely against taxes within the land. 3. That by the exception in the end of the statute, the kings prerogative is saved.
20. The statute de Tallagio non concedendo urged, with the answers to the objections made thereunto. The exposition of the words tallage, ayde, subsidie.
21. The statute of 25 Ed. 1. cap. 7. urged against impositions, and cleared from objections: 1. That it is against the excesse of impositions, and not against the right.
2. That it is onely against impositions on wools.
22. The statute of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. urged against impositions, and cleared from objections. That it extendeth onely to impositions within the land, and not upon merchandizes, answered, with an exposition of the word charge.
23. Answers to the reasons urged in maintenance of impositions: 1. That because it cannot appeare that the ancient customes were set by parliament, therefore they were imposed by the king. The antiquity of parliaments.
24. Answer to the second reason urged for impositions, that the king may totally restraine importation and exportation, and therefore may restraine sub modo by laying impositions.
25. Answer to the third reason, that the ports are the kings, and that he may open and shut them on what conditions he pleaseth.
26. Answer to the fourth reason, that the king is bound to protect merchants, and safeguard the seas, and that therefore he may lay moderate impositions, for raising of money to defray his charges.
27. Answer to the fifth objection, that all forreign princes have power to impose; and if our king should not have the like, it might be very inconvenient to this state.
28. A summary conclusion of the whole argument.

First then to consider whether there were by the common-law any duty belonging to the king upon merchandize to be carried into or out of the kingdom, known by the name of custome. Though the maintenance of custome to be due by the common-law be a point of such consequence to them that maintained the kings right to impose, as without the upholding of which their opinion, as I conceive, is not so much as colourably to be maintained, and that to maintain the same, it be not at all necessary to induce my conclusion; and although to admit it, it may seem perhaps no good policy of argument, but rather a great disadvantage to me to admit that, without which the contrary part cannot uphold their opinion, and which being admitted cannot make any thing for me; yet because we are here not as arguers at the bar, but as judges in a high-court, and that all our ends tend to the discovery of the truth: I will therefore not only admit it, but will maintain it as well as I can.

That custome is due by the common-law I collect, first by the name thereof, for though at this day it bee (and so hath bene for more then 350 yeeres, as I shall have occasion more fully anon to open unto you) called in our law-Latin Custuma, yet in ancient time it had no other name here amongst us (for I meane not to wander into foreign-learning) then consuetudo, as may appeare by the statute of Magna Charta cap. 30. Per rectas & antiquas consuetudines; for I shall anon directly prove unto you, that consuetudo in that place is not to be understood an usage, as hath been said, but in that sense which I take it. This name consuetudo in the same sense is also found in many ancient records brought into this house upon the late search. That this name then consuetudo, which implies an approved continuance without a known beginning, should by the common-law be given to this revenue more then to any other revenue belonging to the king; nay, that this terme, which is the common and generall name to all common and approved usages of what nature or kinde soever, should be applied to this dutie rather then to any other amongst all the ancient usages and customes which the common-law imbraceth, cannot but denote the great antiquity thereof, and, more then so, the allowance and approbation thereof by the common-law; for doubtlesse, if, beside the antiquity of this dutie, the common-law had not also allowed the reasonableness of it, and in a manner the necessity of it, it would never have denoted it unto us by this name of excellency above all other customes which require reasonableness as well as antiquity. Therefore doubtlesse this duty, thus favored, is a childe of the common-law. Nay farther, it is of the very essence of a custome to have his only beginning by allowance of the common-law; for that, which beginneth by private contract of partie, or by act of parliament, and dependeth not wholly upon the allowance of the common-law, by one of which three waies all things considerable in law have their commencements, cannot bee called or bee a custome, in name or deede. Moreover, considering that this custome is not limited to any one place within the realme, wee shall so little neede to be curious in affirming it to bee due by the common-law, as wee may boldly pronounce it to be part of the common-law it selfe. Thus you see, that the very name consuetudo proves custome to bee a dutie by common-law. To this may bee added, that Magna Charta cap. 30. which statute was made little more then 150 yeeres after the Conquest, termeth this not only consuetudo, which, as I have said, implies antiquity beyond all remembrance of a beginning, but antiqua consuetudo; not onely custome, but old and ancient custome. And in comparison to this old custome due at common-law, the custome upon staple commodities, given or increased by act of parliament 3 E. I. not printed, was called nova consuetudo: before the making of which statute of 3 E. I. you may further see, that custome was due; for an. 52. H. 3. in the statute of the Exchequer, printed, you may read, that the collectors of the custome of wools were to yeeld their accompt twice every yeere into the Exchequer. But that, which most of all moveth me to believe that this duty was and is due by the common-law, is this; that in all cases where the common-law putteth the king to sustaine charge for the protection of the subject, it alwayes yeeldeth him out of the thing protected some gaine towards the maintenance of the charge: as, for the protection of wards lunatiques and ideots, the profits of their lands; for the maintenance of the courts of justice, it giveth him fines for purchase of originall writs, and fines pro licentia concordandi, which in supposition of law are no other then fines paid for not proceeding according to the surety by pledges put in upon purchase of the originall, and for troubling without cause the kings justices, who are maintained in their places at the kings charge. There are many the like profits of court, given by the common-law to the king for the maintenance of his charge in the administering of justice.

This observation, which might be further proved by divers other instances in things of other nature, maketh me to think, that because the common-law expecteth that the king should protect merchants in their trades, by maintaining, repairing, and fortifying the havens at home; by clearing the sea of pirates and enemies in their passage; and by maintaining ambassadors abroad to treat with forreigne princes upon all such occasions; that it also giveth him out of merchandizes exported and imported, some profit for the sustentation of this publique charge. Otherwise were the law very unreasonable and unjust. So as to prove, that by the common-law custome is due to the king, I shall need to say no more; especially considering it hath not onely been yeilded to, but proved by those, which maintain a contrary conclusion. I will therefore proceed to my second consideration: whether that profit upon merchandizes, which the common-law for these respects gave unto the king, were a duty certaine, not to be increased or inhaunced at the kings will and pleasure, without a common assent in parliament; or otherwise, whether the common-law hath left an absolute power in the king, to demand in this case more or lesse at his owne pleasure, and to compell his subjects to pay it? The resolving of which question will, as I conceive, make an end of this controvercie between us; for what are these impositions which wee complaine of, other than the enhauncing of the custome by the kings absolute pleasure?

VOL. XI.

That this duty given by the common-law, as I have proved, unto the king, was and is a duty certaine, not to be enhaunced by the king at his owne pleasure, without assent in parliament, I hope I shall be able cleerly to prove unto you: in maintenance of which, I will use some arguments of direct prooffe, and others of great presumption and probability. And first, I lay this as a ground, which will not be denyed me by any man; that the common-law of England, as also all other wise lawes in the world, delight in certainty, and abandon incertainty, as the mother of all debate and confusion, than which nothing is more odious in law: and therefore the rule is, quod certum est retinendum est, quod incertum est dimittendum; nay further, quod incertum est nihil est. This is the censure of law upon all the acts of men, which fall under the judgment of the law. If then the law so judge of the acts of men, holding them for nought and voyde, that are incertaine; how much more then doth the law require certainty in her own acts, which are to binde all men? And if in any of the acts of law certainty be to be specially expected, most of all is it requisite that bounds of limitation and certainty be set between the king and his poor subject, between the mighty and the weak, between the lion and the lamb. And if in any case between the king and his subject more than other this certainty be required, most of all it is requisite in cases where the common-law giveth the king a perpetuall profit or revenue to be raised out of the interest and property of his poor subjects estate, either in lands or goods. If in all other things the law, as I have said, and wherein I suppose you have yeilded to me, doe require certainty and limitation, and onely in this case where it is most requisite, it hath omitted and neglected it, we must conclude the law to be most unreasonable, improvident, and contrary to it selfe; which to say, were to conclude it to be no law. Out of these grounds I may then in my opinion safely and with some confidence deduce and maintain this position; that the common-law of England giveth to the king, as to the head of the common-wealth, no perpetuall revenue or matter of profit out of the interest or property of the subject, but it either limiteth a certainty therein at the first; or otherwise hath so provided, that if it be uncertaine in it selfe, it is reduceable to a certainty onely by a legal course, that is to say, either by parliament, by judges, or jury; and not by the kings own absolute will and pleasure. Though this position be grounded upon those sure foundations, out of which I have, as you perceive, drawn it, and needs no farther proof; yet because you shall see how plentiful the truth is in reasons to maintain it selfe, I will further open unto you the particular reasons of this position, which are these.

First, the law requireth certainty in matter of profit, between the king and the poor subject; because to make any man judge in his own case, especially the mighty over the weak, and that in a point of profit to him that judgeth, were to leave a way open to oppression and bondage.

Secondly, because by reducing it to a certainty, the king may know what certainty to expect; that so he may order his charge accordingly.

Thirdly, that the subject may know likewise what he is to pay, that so he may know certainly what shall remaine to him as his own.

Finally, that the king may not depend upon the good will of his subject for his revenue, seeing the law expecteth he should beare the charge, but may know in certainty what to claime as due to him, and may accordingly compell the subject to pay it; and that the subject may not be under the kings absolute power to pay what the king pleaseth, which may perhaps extend to the whole value of the merchandize.

You see in generall, how the law, by requiring certainty in matter of profit between the king and the subject, preventeth many mischeifes, which would fall out if the law were otherwise; and therefore without more saying, I might here conclude, that custome, being due by the common-law, was and is a sum certaine, not to be increased at the kings pleasure by way of imposition. But because there are many other revenues due to the king by the common-law, as well as custome; if they all, or as many as we can call to minde shall fall out to bee, as I have said, summes certaine and not subject to bee increased at the kings will, this will bee a forcible argument, that custome is likewise certaine and not to be inhaunced at the kings pleasure; for, this argument drawne à simili is of great force, and the most usuall of any other in debate of things doubtfull in law. Quæ legibus decisa non sunt, iudex ex his quæ decisa sunt statuet, & de similibus ad similia procedat. May it please you to consider in this respect other revenues, which the common-law of this land giveth the king; and according to the rule, to decide that which is in question, by the same rule and measure, by which other things of the same nature have been decided and ordered. The common-law giveth the king a fine for the purchase of an originall writ. Is it certaine? It is, and ever hath been. If the debt or damages demanded amount to above forty pounds, the fine is, and ever hath been, fixe shillings eight pence, and no more; if to a hundred pounds, then ten shillings, and no more. May the king increase this fine at his pleasure? There is no man that will say he may. There is a fine due by the common-law, pro licentia concordandi. Is it not certainly known, and so hath alwayes been, to be the tenth part of the land comprised in the writ of covenant? And is not also the post-fine thereupon due certainly known to be once and a halfe as much more as the fine pro licentia concordandi, or pre-fine; as for example, when the pre-fine is ten shillings, the post-fine to be fifteen shillings. And can the king demand any more of the subject? So likewise, when, in a writ of right, the demandant, alledging the seisin of his ancestor, will not be compelled to prove the seisin alledged, is he not to tender to the king a summe certain of a demy-mark, to have this benefit? Was it ever more or lesse? Or can it now be more, if the king would? These, amongst many others, are duties belonging to the king by the common-law from the subject, for the main-maintenance of his charge in the administration of justice, which the civilians call vestigal judicarium. There are also in divers other cases duties certain, belonging to the king by the common-law: as for example, the reliefe for an earldome is certainly knowne to be a hundred pounds, for a barony a hundred markes, for a knights fee a hundred shillings; all which in the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 2. are called old and ancient duties. This is vestigal patrimoniale; of which sort I could produce many others, all which have like certainty. Nay, there is one duty well known to us all, which the common-law giveth to the king; and is in his nature a custome (our very case) in which the king is bound to a certainty which he cannot exceed; and that is prifage, a duty given by the common-law to the king, upon every ship-loading of wine brought into the kingdom by English merchants; and is one tun of wine before the mast, and another behinde. I am unwilling to trouble you with any more particulars of this kinde. But let any man shew me one particular to the contrary, and I will then yeeld, that my position, being false in one, may be in more: but till my position hath been in this point infringed, this generall concordance of the law in all these particulars is argument enough for me, without having alleaged other reasons, to conclude, that custome being, as all these are, a revenue due to the king by the common-law, arising out of the property and interest of the subject, is, as all these are, limited and bounded by the common-law to a certainty, which the king hath not power to increase. Ubi eadem ratio, eadem lex. It may perhaps be here objected, that the ayd paid to the king upon the knighting of his eldest sonne, or marriage of his eldest daughter, was by the common-law uncertaine; and that the king did take more or lesse at his pleasure, untill he was bound to the contrary by statute. To this I make divers answers. Though it were indeed a summe uncertaine, yet the common-law did in some sort give it a limitation; for it is by a speciall name called reasonable ayd: so, as if the summe demanded doe exceed reason, it became from a reasonable ayd an unjust exaction. Besides, this revenue was a thing happening very rarely, and therefore the certainty thereof not so much regarded by the law. And yet it is to be observed, how the frame of this common-wealth could not long indure uncertainty even in this casuall revenue; but it was reduced to a certainty of twenty shillings upon a knights fee, and twenty shillings upon every twenty pounds soccageland, by the stat. of West. 1. cap. 35. 3. Ed. 1. If in this casuall revenue they were so careful to be at a certainty, to avoid unreasonable exactions, as the words of the statute are, how much more carefull would they have been, for the same cause, to have reduced the great and annuall revenue of the custome to a certainty, if they had not thought it to have been certaine by the common-law, or limited by statute-law before that time made? But, sir, that, which I rely upon for answer to this objection, is this. Reasonable ayd was and is by the common-law due as well to meane lords as to the king; but meane lords were not limited to a certainty, otherwise than in generall, that it must be reasonable, as I have said. Therefore to limit the king any further, was no reason: and this answer may be given for all uncertaine revenues belonging to the king, the like of which meane lords have of their tenants; for the uncertainty of which there may also be given especiall reason; because these duties first began by speciall contract and agreement between the lord and the tenant, and not directly by operation of the common-law, and so were certain and uncertain as they did at first agree. And therefore you may be pleased to remember, how in laying my position I was wary to say, that such revenues, as are due to the king as to the head of the common-wealth, (by which I purposely excluded such revenues as are common to him with other meane lords) are alwayes certaine.

I am now according to promise, and in maintenance of a second part of my position, to shew you, that where the common-law giveth the king a revenue not certaine at the first, that is alwayes reducible to a certainty by a legal course, as by act of parliament, judges, or jury, and not at the kings pleasure. Every man, that by his tenure is bound to serve the king in his warres, and faileth, is to pay, according to the quantity of his tenure, a fine by the name of escheage. This cannot be assayed but in parliament. Upon forfeitures for treason, or otherwise, to the king, though it be a kinde of a certainty that the law giveth, in giving him all the estate of the party convict, both in goods and lands, or in goods onely, as the case is; yet for reducing it to a more expresse certainty, the law requireth, that it be found by office. Wayfe, stray, wreck, treasure-trove, and such like, are no lesse certaine; for the king hath the things themselves in kinde. Fines for misdemeanors are alwayes assayed by the judges. Amercements in all cases are to be assayed by the country, and not to be assayed by the king; though the forme of the judgement be, et sit in misericordia domini regis, in the kings mercy, pro contemptu predicti. Nay, though for punishment of an offence it be by statute-law enacted, that an offender shall make fine and ranfome at the kings pleasure, the law even in this case, which is as strong a case as may be, will not leave the assaying of the fine to the kings pleasure, to be by him rated privately in his chamber; but it must be solemnly and legally done in an open court of justice by the judges, who in all other cases are to judge between the king and his people, where the interest or property of the subject, or any charge or burden upon them doth come in question, as may be proved by the booke of 2 R. 3. fo. 11. Inasmuch that I am of opinion, that if a statute were made, that the king might raise the customes at his pleasure, yet might it not be done as now it is, by the kings absolute power, but by some other legal course, of which the common-law doth take notice; as in the case of the fine and ranfome. Much lesse then will the common-law permit, that it should depend upon the king's absolute pleasure, there being no such statute in the case.

You have heard, out of what grounds I first deduced this my position, that the law requireth certainty in matter of profit between the king and his people. You have heard likewise the particular reasons of that position. You have also heard what prooffe I have made by particular cases of like nature to this in question; and how I have applied them to the point. And so leaving the judgement of the whole to your wisdoms, who can best discern whether the argument be of weight, I proceed to my second reason, which is drawne from the policy and frame of this common-wealth, and the providence of the common-law: the which, as it requires at the subjects hands loyalty and obedience to their soveraigne, so doth it likewise require, at the hands of the soveraigne, protection and defence of the subject against all wrongs and injuries whatsoever, offered either by one subject to another, or by the common enemy to them all, or any of them.

This protection, the law considereth, cannot be without a great charge to the king; and because, as Christ saith, no man goeth to warre upon his owne charge, the common-law therefore hath not onely given the king great prerogatives and favours touching his own patrimony, more (I beleeve) than any other prince in the world hath; but also hath, for the sustentation of his great and necessary expences in the protection of his subjects, given him, out of the interest and property of the subject, an ample and very honorable revenue in very many particular cases, some of which I will call to your remembrance.

He receiveth out of the subjects purse for wardships and the dependances thereupon, as we have of late accounted, about forty-five thousand pounds by the yeare. This is a revenue which no other king of the world hath: and as it appears by the statute of 14. E. 3. c. 1. it ought to be employed in maintenance of the warres. And so doubtlesse was the first institution of the common-law; for the lord hath the profit of the wards lands to no other end, than to maintain a man in the warre during the infancy of him, who otherwise should serve in person.

He hath likewise all forfeitures upon treason and outlawry, and upon penall lawes, fines and amerciaments, profits of courts, treasure-trove, prifage, butlerage, wreck, and so many more, as the very enumeration of the particulars would take up long time. To what other end hath the common-law thus provided for the maintenance of the kings charge, by all these wayes and meanes of raising profit out of the interest and property of the subjects estate in lands and goods, but onely to this end, that, after these duties paid, the poore subject might hold and enjoy the rest of his estate to his owne use, free and cleare from all other burdens whatsoever? To what end hath the law given a part to the king, and left the rest to the subject, if that which is left be also at the kings will, to make his profit thereof as he pleaseth? To give a small portion to him, that may at his pleasure take more or all, is a vain and an idle act; which shall never be imputed to a wise law. But it may be objected that as the revenues are ordinary, so are they by the law provided onely for the sustenting of the kings ordinary charge; and that if the law have not taken further consideration, and limited some certain course, how upon sudden and extraordinary occasions the kings charge may bee sustained, there is yet no reason shewed to the contrary, why the king may not upon such occasion take some extraordinary course for the raising of money, as by the laying of impositions upon merchandizes, or by a tax within the realme, rather than the common-wealth for want thereof, should perish or be endangered.

And hereupon by the knight that last spake, it was held, that upon occasion of a sudden and unexpected war, the king may not only lay impositions, but levy a tax within the realme, without assent of parliament, which position in my opinion is very dangerous; for to admit this were by consequence to bring us into bondage. You say, that upon occasion of suddaine warre the king may levy a tax. Who shall be judge between the king and his people of the occasion? Can it be tryed by any legall course in our law? It cannot. If then the king himselfe must be the sole judge in this case, will it not follow, that the king may levie a tax at his owne pleasure, seeing his pleasure cannot be bounded by law? You see into what a mischief the admittance of one error hath drawne you. But for a full answer to the objection, I say, that the providence of the common-law is such, and so excellent, as that for the defraying of the kings charge upon any occasions of a sudden warre, it hath, over and above all the ordinary revenues which it giveth the king, which in the time of warre cannot indeed but fall short, made an excellent provision; for, sir, the warre must needs be either offensive or defensive. Offensive must either be upon some nation beyond the seas, or against the Scots, or Welsh, or other borderers within the island. If it be an offensive warre upon some nation beyond the seas, it cannot be a sudden accident; for it is the kings own act; and he may, and 'tis fitting he should take deliberation; and if it be a just and necessary warre, he may crave, and easily obtaine assistance of his subjects, by grant of ayd in parliament. If an offensive warre upon some of his neighbours within the continent of this island, as the Scots, or the Welsh, which also cannot be sudden or unexpected to the king, being his own act; you know, how politickly the kings of this realme have provided, by reserving tenures, by which many of their subjects are bound to serve them in those warres in person, at their own charge. Only a defensive warre, by invasion of foreign enemies, may be sodain: in which case the law hath not left the king to warre upon his owne expence; or to rely upon his ordinary revenue, but hath notably provided, that every subject within the land, high and low, whether he hold of the king or not, in case of foreign invasion, may be compelled at his own charge to serve the king in person, as it appears by the opinion of justice Thimning, in 7 H. 4. The reason of which, in my opinion, was to no other end, than that the king might have no pretence whatsoever for the raising of money upon his subjects at his owne pleasure, without their common assent in parliament. I do then conclude this argument, that seeing the common-law, for maintenance of the kings ordinary charge, hath given him such an ample revenue out of the interest and property of the subject, and provided also for sodaine occasions; in so doing it hath secluded and secured the rest of the subjects estate from the kings power and pleasure; and consequently, that the king hath not power upon any occasion at his pleasure to charge the estate of his subjects by impositions, tallages, or or taxes, for I hold them all in one degree, or any other burden whatsoever, without the subjects free and voluntary assent, and that in parliament. If it were otherwise, you see how it were to the utter dissolution and destruction of that politike frame and constitution of this commonwealth, which I have opened unto you, and of that excellent wise providence of the common-law, for the preserving of property, and the avoydance of oppression.—These two arguments used by me, that of certainty, and this of the provision made by the common-law, are in my poor opinion, arguments of direct proofe, that the king cannot impose.—I will now, according to my division, urge an argument or two of inference and presumption; the rather, because arguments of this nature have been much enforced by those, who have maintained the contrary opinion, especially by Mr. Solicitor. I call them arguments of inference; and yet in my opinion, those which I shall urge, are also of good proofe. Such as they are, you shall judge of them. They are drawn, either from the actions or forbearances of the kings of this realme, or from the actions and forbearances of the people.

First, in the actions and forbearances of the kings, I observe, that all the kings of this realm since Hen. 3. have fought and obtained an increase of custome, more or lesse, by the name of subsidie, of the gift of their subjects in parliament. Nay, some of them, and those not the weakest in spirit, or power, but the most couragious and potent in that whole ranke, even that mighty and victorious prince, king Ed. 3. being to undertake a just and honourable warre, than which there could not happen a better or juster occasion to have made use of his prerogative of imposing, did nevertheless at that time steepe so low in this point, that he did, in full assembly of the three states, pray his subjects to grant him a reliefe in this kinde for the maintenance of his warre, and that to endure but for a short time; and further, was well content to suffer his prayer in that behalfe to be entred of record to the memory of all posterity. And the succeeding kings have also suffered the same to be printed, as may appear by the printed statutes at large, an. 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. Is it likely, that if any or all these kings had thought they had had in them any lawfull power by just prerogative to have laid impositions at their pleasure, they would not rather have made use of that, than have taken this course by act of parliament, so full of delay, so prejudiciall to their right, so subject to the pleasure of their people, who never undergoe burdens but with murmuring and much unwillingnes? Can there be any thing more hatefull to the high spirit of a king, than to subject himselfe to the pleasure of his people, especially for matter of reliefe, and that by way of prayer, having lawfull power in his hands to relieve himselfe without being beholding to them?

If perhaps the kings themselves were ignorant of this great prerogative, which cannot be imagined; had they not alwaies about them wise counsellors to assist them, and such as for the procuring of favor to themselves would not have failed to have put them in minde of it? Nay, if they had known any such lawfull prerogative, had they not been bound in conscience so to have done? What an oversight was it of king Ed. 3. and all his counsell, so much to prejudice his right in so beneficiall a prerogative, as to suffer him upon record, and that in parliament, to pray for that, which he might have taken out of his absolute power? Can there almost be a more direct disclaiming in the right? To compare great things with lesse, if the lord by matter of record claime any thing of his villaine, it is a disclaimer of the villaineage.

The kings of England have other noble and high prerogatives. I will only name two of them, the making of warre and peace, and the raising and abasing of coynes at their pleasure. Did they ever crave the assent of their subjects in parliament to make a warre? Their advice indeed they have sometimes sought, and their ayd for treasure to maintaine it. The prerogative of raising and abasing the value of money hath been oftentimes put in practise by them, and sometimes strayed to such a height, that the king might well suppose the subjects could not but be much discontent therewith. And yet never any king of this realme did it by assent of parliament, which perhaps some one milde king among so many would have done, and it may be, would also have prayed his subjects to yield thereto, only to avoid the grudging of the people, if the seeking of assent in parliament had not been thought to have been prejudiciall to the absolute power of their successors: and yet, as for some of these kings, it may be supposed, they made little conscience to prejudice a successor in one point, that made no scruple totally to depole a predecessor from his throne, and all his regalities, and to usurp it to themselves.

And so I proceed to my next argument of inference drawn from the actions of our kings. Some of the kings of England, as namely Ed. 2. in the yeere of his reigne, and Ed. 3. in the 1. and 24. yeere of his reigne, as may appear by the records here amongst us, were contented to accept an increase of their custome by way of loane from the merchants, and solemnly binde themselves to repay it againe. Would any wise man in the world, that thought he had but a colour of right, so much prejudice himself, as to borrow that which he might take without leave, and binde himselfe to repay it? If a poore man perhaps through feare might be enforced so farre to yeeld to a mighty adversary, yet that a powerfull man should steepe so low to one much weaker than he; nay, that a king, in a point of such consequence, should so farre descend from his greatnesse, as to borrow of his poore subject that, which without being beholding to him he might obtain as his right, and binde himselfe to repay it againe: I say, it cannot with any reason be imagined; but withall it must be concluded, that a king, that shall so doe, doth not thinke that he hath so much as colour of right to impose.

I will not much presse or enforce the actions of Ed. 2. who (I confesse) was but a weake prince; but as for his sonne and successor, Edward the 3. there was not, as I have said, a stouter, a wiser, a more noble and couragious prince than he, and none more careful to preserve the rights of his prerogative, as may evidently appear by all his answers in parliament, on any complaint of the subject. Besides, never had king of this realme more occasion than he to straine this prerogative of imposing to the utmost. For besides his excessive expence in the warres of France and Scotland, he had also a continuall charge of many expensive children. His wife queene Philippa had also for her maintenance a large allowance out of his revenue. But the dowry of queen Isabel his mother, who lived till about the 27. yeere of his reigne, was so great, as it is reported by some writers, that little more than the third part of the certaine revenue of the kingdome was left to him. Infomuch, as through these occasions of extraordinary expence, and the diminution of his revenue, he was driven to such necessity, as his queen in the yeere of his reigne, was enforced to pawne her crowne and jewels to procure money for him, as may appear by the record of that yeere in the office of the clerke of the pels. Nay, the king himselfe, in these extremities, was oftentimes driven to lay his jewels to pawne for money; and in an. 17. did also pledge his crown for 4000. pound, to certaine merchants of Florence, as by the records of that yeere, in the office of the lord treasurers remembrancer in the Exchequer, is manifest. By this you may see, that this powerfull king wanted not urgent and just occasion, if any occasion may be just, to have put in practise his absolute power of imposing; and yet, as you see, it appears of record, that in the midst of his great wants he tooke an increase of custome by way of loane, and bound himselfe to repay it.

It may be here objected, that he did lay impositions.

What impositions they were, and how to be compared with the impositions now in question, I purpose to tell you, when I come to answer objections, which I have referred to the end of my speech. In the meane time I will goe on with my course, and urge one argument more, drawne from the actions of our kings, touching the increase of custome.

A man would thinke, that the taking of the increase of custome by all the kings, both one and other, with the assent of their subjects in parliament, and sometimes by way of prayer and intreaty, for a short time; nay, the taking of it by way of loane, and binding themselves to repay it; and that to have been done by the most powerfull kings, in their greatest necessities; were argument enough, that they did not beleieve they might justly claime it as their right by their absolute power.

And yet is not this all; for, some of them, by name, Ed. 1. did not only take it by assent in parliament, or by Edward the 1st. way of loane, but (as one that buyes for his money in the market) did give for it a reall and valuable consideration, and that to merchant-strangers, of whom there was more colour to demand it as a duty, than of his naturall subjects. In proofe of which I produce charta mercatoria, made anno 31. Ed. 1. whereby it is recited, that, in lieu of certaine liberties and immunities granted by the king to the merchant-strangers, as also for the release of prisage, they granted to the king an increase of custome. What were all the special liberties that were granted them, I know not, nor whether they continue. But sure I am, that by vertue of that grant they are at this day free of prisage, paying onely 2 s. upon a tun of wine, by the name of butlerage, which they granted by the same charter; whereas English-men pay prisage in specie, viz. one tun before the mast, and one tun behinde.

And it is very worthy the observation, how the same king, E. 1. in the same yeere of his reign did command his customers throughout England, that, whereas certain English merchants were, as he was informed, of their own accords willing to pay him the like increase of custome which the merchant strangers had granted unto him, so as they might enjoy the like liberties and benefits; nevertheless they should not compell such English merchants, against their wils, to pay it. The words are worth the hearing. Cum quidam mercatores de regno & potestate nostri, ut ipsi dictis libertat. (having before recited charta mercatoria) uti & gaudere, & de prisas nostris quieti esse possint, prestationes & custumas hujusmodi, de bonis & mercandis suis, nobis dare & solvere velint, ut accepimus; assignavimus vos ad prestationes & custumas predictas, de his, qui prestationes & custumas illas grante & absque cohercione solvere voluerint, colligendum, & ad opus nostrum recipiendum; ita tamen quod aliquem mercatorem de dicto regno nostro ad hujusmodi prestationes & custumas nobis invite solvendum nullatenus distringatis. What stronger inference can there almost possibly be against the kings absolute power of imposing, than this: that he was contented, and so specified to all his officers of the ports, that if the merchants did of their own accords pay more than their ancient customes, they should have consideration for it; but if they themselves were not willing to pay more, then they should not be compelled thereunto?

One other observation I draw from the actions of the kings touching the increase of their custome, which is this, that those kings, which did lay impositions (which as I will shew you by and by, was very rarely) though it were never but in time of great necessity, and but to endure for a short time; yet they alwayes did it, not with the advice alone of the merchants, as at this day, but the merchants did alwaies solemnly grant an increase of custome; and the kings were alwayes wary, for the better justification of their actions to the people, in their commissions for collecting of custome, to recite not onely the great necessity which moved them to take an increase of custome, but also the grant of the merchants, as may appear by the records, of which we have the copies amongst us. I dare confidently say, there is not above one or two at the most that are otherwise, if the impositions be of that nature, which these are of which we complaine; and yet these impositions also, by the grant of merchants, though raised upon never so great a necessity of state, and to endure but for a short time, were alwayes complained of by the commons, when they met in parliament, as may appear amongst other records, by the parliament roll of 27. Ed. 3. No. 27. where in a petition of the commons, exhibited to the king in parliament, are these words. Les commons monstrent, comment que les marchants ayent grant per eux, sans assent de parliament, un subsidia de XLs. de face. de layn, outre le droituel maletoit de demy mark; et prient que soit amend a cest parliament; car est encounter raison, que le cominaltie de tout biens soient per marchants chargez. Which I English thus. The commons shew, how the merchants have granted by themselves, without assent of parliament, a subsidie of 40s. upon a sack of wooll, over and above the rightfull custome of halfe a marke; and pray that it may be redressed at this parliament; for it is against reason that the commonalty should be charged in their goods by merchants. With this agreeth the printed statute of 36. Ed. 3. cap. 11. in the Statutes at large, where you shall finde an expresse provision against the rayling of impositions upon woolls, by grant of merchants; in which petition I doe observe, that the parliament in thoe dayes did distinguish, even as we now doe, between impositions laid by act of parliament, and impositions laid only by the grant of merchants, acknowledging that impositions laid by parliament only are lawfull, and condemning all other as unlawfull; for otherwise why should they tearme the demy-marke, which was laid by act of parliament, 3. Ed. 1. (Droiturel maletout) a lawful imposition, but with relation to the unlawfulness of these impositions granted by merchants, which they then did complaine of? Besides, I observe that they say, that it is against reason, that merchants should by their grant, without assent in parliament, charge the whole commonalty; by which it plainly appears, that they complained not so much of the excesse or greatnesse of the impositions, as of the unlawfull manner of the raising of it by grant of merchants, without assent in parliament.

Hitherto I have, according to my division, drawn arguments from that which our kings have done, and put in practise for the increase of their custome.

I will now make some observations of their forbearance to put this pretended power in practise, considering the severall occasions of the times, which I will prosecute in order.

Arguments drawn from the forbearance of our kings to lay impositions, notwithstanding their great occasions.

First therefore in generall, I observe, that from the Conquest, untill the reign of queen Mary, being no lesse then 480. yeeres space, whatsoever the occasions were, whatsoever the disposition of the kings were, yet in the practise of this pretended prerogative of imposing the kings have been so sparing, as, notwithstanding this curious search that hath been made, wherein I suppose nothing that might make for the clearing of the question hath escaped us, it cannot be found or proved by matter of record, that six impositions, such as we now complaine of, were laid by all those kings, who were in number 22. And those sixe, if they were so many, though they were unlawfull, yet were they in some sort to be borne withall. First, by reason they were very moderate. Secondly, that they were laid in the times of great and apparent necessitie, and that they were to endure but for a yeer or two; for none of them, except onely that upon wine, laid 16. E. 1. lasted longer. They were, I say, notwithstanding their unlawfulness, yet in these other respects so farre to be borne withall, as, if the impositions which are now laid had been so qualified, we should, I suppose, never have complained of them. And yet not one of these few impositions laid in former times, but was complained of, and upon complaint taken away, as may appear by the records here amongst us. How much more reason is there then, that we should expect the like justice now; considering that not one merchandise alone, as then, but very neere all the sorts and severall kindes of merchandises that are, are charged; that not a moderate and easy charge is laid upon them, but such, as though we should confesse his majesties absolute power to lay what he list, yet we had just cause to complain of the excessiveness of the burden? For first, the rates of merchandises, for the subsidies of poundage and tonnage, are extreemly rayfed, a thing also though lawfull, yet hath been rarely put in practise. Then comes the impost upon the back of that, and is as much as the subsidie it selfe is. In some few merchandises, 'tis true, the impost is perhaps lesse then the subsidy; but 'tis as true, that in divers others the impost is farre more. Besides, these impositions were not laid in the time of warre, but even then when we were at peace with all the world, except perhaps there were some sparks of rebellion in Ireland, then not fully quenched. Lastly, these impositions are not, as those in former times were, limited to endure for a yeere or two, but are to come to his majestie his heirs and successors for ever, as may appear by his majesties letters patents in print, prefixed before the new book of rates. So as if those few impositions laid in former times had been lawfull, yet can they not by any means be a warrant or precedent for our present impositions, differing so far from them in all these points of consequence. But if even those few, so qualified as they were, were complained of and taken away, what shall we then say of ours, so farre exceeding them in all the degrees of irregularitie? Besides, if so few presidents, as five or six in so many yeeres space, and those in times of so great necessitie, without any expresse judgment in law, or good authoritie in approbation of them, but accompanied with as many complaints against them, be argument enough to prove the lawfulness of the act, I dare undertake, that as well taxes within the land, as impositions upon merchandises, may be proved to be lawfull. But to alledge the acts of kings, in rayling a profit to themselves upon their subjects, to prove thereby their right, is of all other arguments, that are, the weakest. And so I leave it, and call to minde, that when I told you, it could not be proved by the records amongst us, that from the Conquest to queen Marys time, there had been any more than sixe impositions laid; I did in that number limit my selfe to such impositions as those are which we now complaine of; for I must confesse, that in that space, many more impositions were laid, but they were of a farre differing nature from ours; differing, I say, not only in those circumstances by which I did even now compare the impositions of these times to those five or six of former ages, but in very essence and propertie, insomuch as they may not properly be called impositions. And yet the frequent practise of them hath been objected and relied upon, as so many presidents, to prove the lawfulness of the impositions now complained of. It behoveth me therefore, that in maintenance of my assertion, that so few impositions have been laid, as I have alledged, that I open unto you the difference betweene the one and the other, which being done, your selves will easily judge, that the greater part make nothing towards the defence of these present impositions. For these impositions, which now are in question, are no other then an increase of custome at the kings pleasure, and commanded by him to be taken, the passage being free and open to all men. Those other, which make such a great shew in number, and are produced as so many presidents in maintenance of these, are no other then so many dispensations or licences for money, to passe with merchandises prohibited by act of parliament to be exported; as will evidently appeare by comparing the times, and examining the statutes. I will therefore in this place, as shortly as I can, runne over those presidents, that have been, or may be alledged by the contrary part, out of those records which are here amongst us, and leave it to your judgement, whether I maintaine my assertion, or be not rather better then my word for the number.

The first imposition by them alledged, is that of 16.

Ed. 1. which, as it appears by the record, was 4. shillings upon a tun of wine. This indeed, for aught I know to the contrary, was a meere imposition, such as are now in question. And yet if I did deny it, and say that it was layd by assent of parliament, I know not how the contrary could be proved; for though indeed the words of the record are, cum rex precepisset, ut de singulis doliis vini caperentur 4. solidi, it follows not that it was laid therefore only by the kings commandment; for we see that even some acts of parliament, in those auncient times, though they were made by the full assent of all the three estates, yet they have these words in their preambles, rex precepit, rex vult. But as for recitalls of acts of parliament by the king, in his commissions, and otherwise, it was in those times usuall to say, cum nuper ordinaverimus; and therefore notwithstanding the recitall be, cum nuper rex precepisset, it is no cleere proof, that therefore it was done onely by the kings commandment. Neverthelesse I will, I say, admit this to be a meere imposition, and to be one of the number; and indeed, as this is the first they produce, so is it their best. Only this, (amongst all the rest) is not limited to endure for a time certain. But give me leave, I beseech you, to open unto you, with what circumstances this imposition was accompanied, and what followed of it; and then I will leave you to judge, who best are able, how far the present impositions may be justified by this.

Flem. Clark.
Doderidge.

The first circumstance to be observed in this imposition is, that it was laid immediately after the warre against Wales was ended, and at the time, when for the selling of the estate of Gascoigne, the king himself was in person enforced to undertake a voyage thither, as may appear by our histories of those times, which also may be collected by the very words of the record, which are these, cum rex ante ultimum recessum suum ab Anglia precepisset, &c. That as these times were troublesome, they were also very chargeable to the king, and did put him to try all means for the levying of money, I shall not need to urge it: it cannot be otherwise.

One other circumstance is this, that this imposition laid in this time of great necessity was not, as now, upon all merchandises, nor so much as in generall upon one kind of merchandize, coming from all the parts of the world, but onely upon such wines as were brought hither from two towns in Gascoigne, Bergerac and St. Emilians, as may appear by the records; and it is probable that these towns were then in revolt, and that the sooner to reduce them to obedience, the king laid this burden upon their commodities, thereby to hinder the vent of them.

16. E. 1.
Scaccario.

Another circumstance is this, that though that this imposition were indeed laid without limitation of any time, as touching the continuance thereof, yet within six yeeres following, viz. 5. Decemb. a. 22. upon complaint of the merchants the king released two shillings of the foure shillings, as may appear by the records of 22 E. 1. with which the merchants not holding themselves contented, the very same yeare within eight or nine months following, viz. 23. Julii an. 22. the whole imposition was released, as may appear by a recitall in the accompt of one William Randall receiver of the impost money, entred an. 26 E. 1. And within three yeeres after the release, viz. an. 25. there followed an act of parliament against all impositions in generall, as when I come to shew you what statutes there are, in the point, I shall I hope cleerly prove unto you. In the meane time I will proceed to examine the rest.

The next president urged is an imposition of 40. shillings upon a sack of wooll laid by E. 1. an. 21. For the proove of which, a record of the Exchequer of that year hath been vouched. I must confesse I have not seen that record. But by another record of the same court, an. 26. E. 1. it is evident, that the said imposition was not raised by the kings absolute power, but by grant, and that also the same was in the time of warre, and to endure but two or three yeeres, if the warre should so long continue, as will best appear by the words of the record. Cum custuma 40s. nobis, in subsidium guerræ nostræ contra regem Franciæ, de quolibet sacco lane exeunte regnum nostrum, percipiendum per biennium vel triennium si tantum durasset guerra illa, nuper concessi fuit, &c.

By this you perceive, by what means, upon what occasion, and with what limitation this imposition was laid. If you will further know, what followed of it, may it please you to read the printed statute of an. 21. E. 1. c. 7. where it is said, that the more part of the commonalty found themselves sore aggrieved therewithall; and by the same statute, not only that imposition of 40. shillings upon a sack of wooll, which was the occasion of the great grief and complaint, was taken away; but upon occasion thereof, there was at the same time provision also made against all other impositions whatsoever, as, I say, I hope I shall anon cleerly prove unto you. Insomuch as this imposition of 40. shillings upon a sack of wooll ought to be so farre from being urged as a president for the present imposition, and consequently of the grievance of the commonwealth which followes thereupon, as that rather on the contrary part it may be thought to be the happiest accident in the consequence thereof, that ever befell the commonwealth in this kinde. For it was the occasion of the making of the first law that ever was made against impositions, and other charges and burdens of that nature to be imposed by the kings absolute power without assent of parliament.

And so I leave their second president, and come to the third, which in time was 31. of the same king E. 1. It is no other then that increase of custome, which by the merchant strangers was granted to king Ed. 1. by that charter now familiarly known unto us by the name of charta mercatoria, which, by all that have maintained his majesties right to impose, hath been stood upon and urged, as an imposition by the kings absolute power; but more especially by master Solicitor hath been strongly enforced with all the advantage possible for the maintenance of his opinion. Nevertheless I doubt not but I shall give it a very full answer, such as yet this objection hath not received, though divers, that have spoken before, and some this day, have undertaken to cleere it; wherein I will arrogate nothing to my selfe, but leave it wholly to your censure. It hath been said by master Solicitor, that though this increase of custome may seem to some, to proceed from the grant of merchants, yet that this grant of theirs was to no other purpose, nor had other effect, then only thereby to declare their assent; for that, those which did grant were no corporation or body in the estimation of law, and so could not binde any but themselves alone, and not such as should succeed them; and that it was only the authority of the kings pleasure to accept and take this increase of custome, that gave it life at the first, and strength to continue as an imposition till this very day. For even at this day, saith he, the 3. pence upon the pound, granted by the said charter, is paid by the merchants strangers, and they likewise enjoy some priviledges granted by the said charter. And it was further by him observed; that notwithstanding all the statutes that have been urged against impositions, yet this imposition hath continually stood and hath never been denied to be paid by any man; and that therefore it is likely that no man till now ever conceived, that these statutes were made against impositions upon merchandizes, but were rather to be understood to extend onely to impositions within the realme.

To this objection I make this answer, that it is indeed true, that the grant of merchants in this case, cannot binde the whole common wealth; as I have heretofore proved by the petition exhibited in parliament by the commons 27 Ed. 3. No. 27. and by a statute of 36 E. 3. c. 11. And therefore I cannot but confesse, that this increase of custome may very truly be called an imposition; for that indeed it did at first take strength, onely by the kings pleasure to accept it, as hath been said, and not by the grant of the merchants. Admitting it therefore to be a meer imposition; let us consider with what extraordinary circumstances it is accompanied.

First, as you may perceive by the record it self, and as it hath partly been said already, the king took it not without yeelding recompence for it; for the merchants strangers, by submitting themselves unto this charge, obtained divers liberties and immunities from the king, by the same charter, amongst which freedome from prisage is one which at this day they enjoy, in which respect this imposition is in some sort tolerable, though not at all lawfull.

Another considerable circumstance, and difference from our present impositions, is this, that it was a composition made by the king with merchant strangers, which, though it be by strictnesse of our common law, not of force to binde in perpetuities; yet how farre by the civil law this doth binde strangers, which are governed by these lawes, is not so easily decided; and this may be a good colour to uphold it.

These speciall reasons, though they may well serve the turne, to make an evident difference betwixt this and our present impositions, and so consequently to avoid the conclusion drawn from the president, and may also seem colourable, and particular reasons to uphold the imposition it self; yet is not this that, which I mean to relie upon for answer. For even this imposition, in recompence of which the king parted with so large priviledges and benefits, and which, because it concerned only merchant strangers, did neither in the burden thereof, nor in the president, so directly touch the English; yet in the detestation, as it seems, of all impositions, of what nature or kinde soever, and upon what pretext or colour soever they were grounded, I say, even this imposition also was complained of in parliament within few yeeres following; and upon complaint, taken away, as may appear by the clofe roll of 3. Ed. 2. membr. 23. where you shall finde inrolled a superfedeas, commanding, that the new custome, granted by the merchant strangers, reciting the particulars as they are contained in charta mercatoria, shall cease at the kings pleasure; and this is there said to be yeilded to at the request of the commons, which cannot be but in parliament. But because the renewing of it again rested at the kings pleasure, therefore, within two yeeres after, by a publicke ordinance made by the principall prelates earles and barons and other great men of the kingdome, authorised by the kings commission, dated the 16. of May, the same third yeere of his reigne, the charter it selfe was declared to be utterly void; for that it was hurtfull to the commonwealth, against magna charta, and made without assent in parliament. And not only that charter, but all other new customes or impositions whatsoever, imposed since the coronation of Ed. 1. till that time, were also taken away, saving onely the old custome upon wooll woollfells and leather. And further it was ordained, that if any man should presume to take any more then the auncient custom rightfully due, and should be thereof convicted, he should answer to the partie grieved his costs and damages, be imprisoned according to the quantitie of his offence, and be further punished as an offender against magna charta, according to the discretion of the justices. Ro. ordinationum 5. Ed. 2. in the Tower.

Though the force and authoritie of this ordinance may perhaps be doubted and blemished; because it was made by the barons, at the time when they had the better hand of the king, as hath been in part objected; yet you see, that they deliver not their censures, without alledging also their reasons; and this their ordinance is no more in effect, then that which was thought fit by all the commons in the parliament of 5. Ed. 2. before mentioned.

But it hath been yet further said, that, notwithstanding this ordinance, the imposition doth nevertheless continue in force, and is at this day paid by the merchant strangers, and that therefore in likely hood the ordinance prevailed not against it. 'Tis true, that at this day the merchant stranger doth pay three pence more in the pound for subsidie of poundage, then the English doth, and that by vertue of charta mercatoria. But let me tell you, that charta mercatoria in it selfe had not strength and vertue sufficient to subsist for so long a time. It was, as I have said, suspended by the king himselfe an. 3. condemned by the ordinance of 5. E. 2. and had at this day been of no more force, then it was all the time of Ed. 2. after 3°. that is, of none at all, had it not been confirmed by act of parliament an. 36 Ed. 3. cap.—. This was onely that which protected charta mercatoria against all those statutes made against impositions, and that hath kept it in life till this day; and this indeed, I mean an act of parliament, is the only means, that our law acknowledged, for the laying or establishing of impositions, and without which they cannot long last.

You have now heard opened three of those six presidents, which are most relied upon for maintenance of these present impositions, which are all that have been urged, or can be found to have been practised from the Conquest till the reigne of Ed. 3. during which time there are, as you see, as many publique acts in opposition of them, which are of so much the more force, in that they are the legall regular acts of great counsellors; whereas, on the contrary part, those three impositions were the acts of powerfull kings wills, in the times of extreame necessity. As Edw. 2. for Ed. 2. his successor, there hath not been one imposition alledged to have been laid by him of one kinde or other. Nay, all the records touching this business found in his time, being onely foure, make directly against them.

The first is anno 3. which was (as you have heard) a release at the kings will, upon complaint of the commons, of the impositions raised by charta mercatoria.

The second was the ordinance made an. 5. declaring charta mercatoria and all other impositions to be void, and inflicting punishment upon such as should demand any.

The third was an. 11. which is a superfedeas to discharge certain commodities from yeelding an increase of custome granted by merchants by way of loane, which in great probability the king would never have released, but upon complaint. The rather I think so, because, as the record recites, it was granted in a time of great necessity.

The fourth is an. 12. and is much of the same nature, the recitall of which contains some very observable things, which I will open unto you. It shewes first in very effectually words the greatnesse of the kings wants, and the causes thereof. The words are, Cum pro expeditione guerra nostra Scotiae, & aliis arduis necessitatibus nobis multipliciter incumbentibus, pro quarum exoneracione quasi infinitam pecuniam profundere oportebit, pecunia plurimum indigemus in presenti; ac insuper, pro eo quod exitus regni & terra nostra, simul cum pecunia nobis in subventionem praemissorum tam per clerum quam per communitatem regni nostri concessa ad sumptus predictos cum festinatione, qua expediret, faciend. non sufficiunt. Here was cause, if any cause may possibly be just, for the king presently to put in practise his prerogative of impositions. His expence by reason of a necessary warre in Scotland was so great, as the whole revenue of the kingdome, together with an ayd which had been lately granted him, could not with that expedition that was requisite supply his present want. Doth hee for all this make use of his prerogative of imposing? Or doth hee hastily, for want of advised proceedings, take some other course prejudiciall to his right? No. The record further sayes, that he enquired by all wayes and meanes, how he might most commodiously and fitly levy money for these occasions. After which advised deliberation, the course at last resolved upon was, not by absolute power to lay impositions, which of all other courses, if it had been lawfull, had been the most speedy and beneficiall, but a course more justifiable; which was, that merchants should be called together, and that they should be intreated to lend the king upon every sack of wooll 10. shillings, and upon every last of leather 5. shillings, above the ancient custome; and that for their security of true repayment, without fiction or delay, which are the words of the record, whereby it seems that onely a pretence of a loane and repayment had been before that time used to colour impositions, commandment should be given to the customers to certifie into the Exchequer the names of every particular merchant that should so lend unto the king, that they might accordingly receive full satisfaction. And 'tis worth the observing, that this loane was for no longer time, then from April, till October following. Thus much is warranted by the record. So as you see, that in all this time of this king Ed. 2. impositions were not only altogether forbore even in the times of his greatest necessity, but they were also condemned as unjust and utterly unlawfull.

We come now to the reigne of king Ed. 3. in whose time Ed. 3. there was no practise or meanes, that by the policy of man could be thought on to bring the people under this yoke of impositions without assent of parliament, but it was by him attempted: inso much, as I have in my observation out of the records collected no lesse then five or six severall waies, all of them very colourable, which in his time were put in practise for the raising of impositions; and yet none of them but was resisted by parliament and condemned.

That which was most usuall with him was, that merchants should grant to pay him so much upon every commodity exported or imported by way of increase of custome. This seems not unreasonable, for that every man might grant of his own what he listed; and this also, to make it more colourable, was never attempted but in the time of warre. And yet, as it hath been partly said already, this was alwayes held unlawfull, as may appear by the record of 17 E. 3. where the commons in parliament say, that it is a great mischief, and against reason, that they should be enforced to pay the deerer for commodities, by reason of a charge upon merchandizes, by the grant of merchants, the which is a charge to the people, though none to the merchant. come to the king, pray, that commissions to collect such new increase of custome by singular grant of merchants be not awarded. Anno 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11. amongst the printed statutes, grants of subsidies upon woolls by merchants without assent of parliament are declared to be void, which act was made upon a petition of the commons in anno 36 Ed. 3. desiring a law to be made to the same effect. If impositions raised by the grant of merchants, which I suppose to have been by some publicke and solemn instrument, under the hands and seals of the principall merchants of all the great towns of England, being called together for that purpose, were not of force in this behalf, much lesse was their bare assent without any such solemnity, which also was a course in practise in the days of Ed. 3. and was also used in the laying of these present impositions, which wee now complaine of.

Another meanes of raising impositions used by Ed. 3. was by way of dispensation for money with some statute in force, which restrained the passage of merchants. Most of his impositions of one kinde or other, laid after 11 E. 3. were of this nature. For anno 11. cap. 1. amongst the printed statutes, you shall find it enacted, that no man upon paine of death, losse of lands and goods, should export woolls. Immediately after the making of this statute, impositions by way of dispensations for money came to be so frequent and burdensome, that the very yeere following the king, being in person to undertake a warre in Scotland, and for the raising of treasure having laid heavy impositions in this kinde, which he perceived to be very burdensome to the people, he wrote to the arch-bishop of Canterbury. His letter is extant upon record, to this effect; that whereas the people were much burdened with divers charges, tallages, and impositions, which he could not mention but with much grief, but being enforced by inevitable necessity could not as yet ease the people of them, he required the arch-bishop to exhort the people patiently and humbly to bear the burden for a while, and to excuse him towards the people, hoping he should ere long recompence his said people, and give them comfort in due time. His necessities were nevertheless so great, and this means of raising money was so colourable, seeing no man was compelled to pay, that did not himself desire to be dispensed with, for the breach of a penal law, by which his life goods and lands were forfeited, as he spared not to lay on load in this kinde; inso much as you shall finde, that in an. 13. he took for dispensations to passe onely to Antwerp of Englishmen 40. shillings upon a sack of wool, 40. shillings upon 300. woollfells, and 4. pound upon a sack of leather; of strangers 3. pound upon a sack of wool, 3. pound upon 300. woollfells, and 6. pound for a last of leather; whereas the ancient and due custome was no more then 6. shillings upon a sack of wooll, the like upon 300. woollfells, and 13. shillings 4 pence upon a last of leather. Immediately hereupon, even this very yeere, was this complained of in parliament, and a petition exhibited by the lords and commons, that it might be enacted, that this maletolt or imposition, because it was taken without assent of parliament, might be taken away, and that a law might be made, that no such charge might be laid, but by assent of parliament. And they further prayed, that they might have a charter under the great seal, confirmed and enrolled in parliament, to the same effect, which was performed the next parliament, as may appeare by the statutes printed, where, an. 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. you shall see an act of parliament to this effect, and that a most effectuell one.

And immediately after, follows the charter to the same effect, of both which I shall have more occasion to speak hereafter. But such were the kings wants, that, even in the mean time between the petition and the making of the act, he could not forbear to raise money by this meanes; for in an. 14. the eleventh day of March, in the end of which month the next parliament began, as may appeare by the preamble to the statutes of that parliament, he tooke by way of dispensation 40. shillings upon a sack of wool, when it should be safely landed at Bruxells, and 40. shillings at the port within England, which was indeed an intollerable charge. But the better to colour it, the king, in his commissions for collection thereof, pretended, that the merchants had been humble suiters to him, that the passage for woolls might be open till Whitsontide following; and that to obtaine the same, they had of their free wills offered to give him the said summes, as may appear by the recitall in the beginning of the said record.

In further prevention of this mischief, in an act of parliament printed, made an. 27. Ed. 3. cap. 2. there was a speciall provision made against all licenses to transport. Nevertheless, as it may be collected by a record of the same yeere, the king raised 40. shillings upon a sack of wooll, 40. shillings upon 300. woollfells, and 4. pound upon a last of leather, by the same means, I meane by way of dispensation. For though indeed it be recited to be granted by merchants, yet was it no otherwise granted by them, then for licenses to transport; for at that time the staple of wooll was in England, as may appear by the printed statute of 27. Ed. 3. cap. 1. and 2.

And here I thinke it fit to make this observation in general, that, whereas in some other of the records of Ed. 3. there is mention made of impositions upon woolls granted by merchants, because the passage of woolls was in those daies so often restrained by statute, as may appear by very many printed statutes of that time, it is very likely, that these grants of merchants were also for dispensations to transport, as appears that this of 27. was; and it may well be, that some of the statutes, being but temporary, were not committed to the presse. This kinde of imposition, by way of dispensation, I finde not to have been at all practised from 27. till 39. where without any colouring of the matter, with pretence of the grant or gift of merchants, or any recital of suite made by merchants to have the passage open, as usually in former times, but plainly and aptly, the king recites, that whereas English merchants were by act of parliament restrained to transport woolls, nevertheless, upon advice with his counsell, he thought fit to give leave, that such as would might transport woolls, paying 46. shillings 8. pence upon a sack, which the king commandeth to be levied. This imposition lasted a very little while; for the next parliament following, the subjects granted to the king a subsidie upon woolls woollfells and leather, to endure for a very short time. And yet, as it appears by the words of the record, the king doth thank his people for it, with all his heart. At which time, for the maintenance of his warres in Scotland, he obtaineth the continuance thereof for two yeeres, at the end of which two yeeres he further obtaineth in parliament a continuance of the same from Michaelmas following, for three yeeres, for the supplie of treasure for the warre. Two yeeres following, viz. in an. 45. the commons doubting, as it seemeth, that the king had secretly concluded to increase, by way of imposition, this subsidie, which was yielded to in parliament, and granted for three yeeres, made a conditional petition, that if any imposition be laid upon woolls wooll-fells or leather more then the subsidie granted in parliament, that it may be taken away. The king answereth, that if any be laid since the statute, it shall be taken away; and then follows the printed statute, an. 45. Ed. 3. cap. 4. that no impositions be laid upon woolls, wooll-fells, or leather; which is the first place where I finde impositions named in our printed books. I finde them first named upon my Latine record, 12. Ed. 3. in the kings letter to the archbishop; and first upon my record in French, not printed, an. 21. Ed. 3. Num. 16. Ro. Parliament.

But to proceed. About a yeere following this parliament of 45. neere which time the subsidie granted an. 43. for three yeeres was expired, there was another subsidie of forty three shillings four pence upon a sack of wooll, as much upon twelve score wooll-fells, and five pounds upon a last of leather, above the ancient customes, granted in parliament, for the maintainance of the warre in Guyen, to endure for two yeeres; for which, the king likewise gave thanks.

The next yeere following, the subsidie granted the last parliament, was continued from Michaelmas for a yeere without any condition, and for the next yeere upon condition, amongst other things, that no imposition be laid during the two yeeres, and that the money levied be employed upon the warres. In the next yeere following, the king took, as by the grant of merchants, upon a sack of wool, of denizens fifty shillings, and of strangers four marks; upon 240. wooll-fells, of denizens fifty shillings, and of strangers four marks; and upon every last of leather, of denizens five pounds, and of strangers eight marks. Though this record pretendeth nothing but the grant of merchants, yet it is upon the matter no other than a dispensation for so much money; for, at this time, the passage was not open, other than to Calise, where the staple then was, as may appear by the two records of 38. Ed. 3. Ro. Parl. & 50. Ed. 3. Num. 24. And yet you may see, how hatefull even these impositions by way of dispensation, which are farre more tollerable then our present impositions, were in those dayes. For within two yeeres following, one Richard Lions, farmer of the customes, among other things laid to his charge, was accused in parliament for setting or procuring to be set new impositions, not shewing of what nature, without assent of parliament, and was adjudged to forfeit his goods and lands. But more particularly the lord Latymer, lord chamberlain of England, was expressly accused, that he combined with Richard Lions and others, who for their own profit had procured and counselled the king to grant many licences for the transporting of great quantities of wooll beyond the seas, other then to the staple at Calise, against divers ordinances and commandements to the contrary, and had put upon woolls and wooll-fells new impositions. Here you see, that the device of dispensations for money had the name of an imposition in those dayes, though indeed it be not in its nature a meere imposition, or at least not such a one as those are which we complain of: but such as it was, you see how from time to time it hath bene condemned, and how it is reckoned up amongst the most hainous faults of those two great offenders, who, though perhaps they were condemned also for other offences, yet the laying of these to their charge did shew the great hate generally conceived against impositions of this kinde. I might here further adde in prooffe of the invalidity of these dispensations, that certain merchants, having obtained some of these, and having also the advantage of the kings proclamation to dispense with the statute which restrained their passage, yet they never thought themselves secure from this punishment of the statute, till they were provided for by act of parliament, as may appear by a statute printed anno 35 Ed. 3. cap. 21. To alledge therefore any of this kind, thereby to prove the lawfulness of ours, cannot but argue a weak cause.

For first, as I have said, there is farre more reason and colour for these, then for ours; for in this case no man was compelled to pay, that did it not to avoide a greater mischefe; for by paying the imposition, he was free from a grievous punishment for breach of a penal law which restrained his passage; whereas in our case a charge is laid upon him for exercising his lawfull trade, where no statute law or common law is to the contrary, but rather both the one and the other make for him.

But it may bee here objected, that the king may lawfully restrain, the breach of which restraint is a contempt and against law, and that to impose doth imply a restraint upon a penalty. Suppose it were so, yet, if in case where the restraint is not onely by the king, but the whole estate assembled in parliament, for some urgent cause, it be unlawful to give license for money, as you perceive it is, how much more is it so, where the restraint is for no other purpose then to raise an imposition, as in our case? But of this more largely hereafter.

Another device of raising impositions without assent of the commons in parliament, practised by Ed. 3. was by way of ordinance, which indeed is in the next degree of strength unto a statute. For it is a constitution made by the king himselfe, and all the prelates, earls, and barons, not at the counsell table, or in the kings chamber, but sitting solemnly in parliament, and hath also the like solemnity of inrolement that a statute hath, onely it is enrolled in a roll by it selfe, which hath the name of the roll of the ordinances. But the only essentiall difference between this and an act of parliament is, that this hath not the assent of the commons.

Impositions raised by way of ordinance in parliament.

Some ordinances have had that estimation amongst us, that they have at this day the force of statutes; as the ordinance of Merton, made 20 Hen. 3. which, though it were no other then an ordinance made by the king the prelates earls and barons, without assent of the commons, yet hath it by continuance of time gotten not onely the strength, but the name also of a statute. There be some others of this nature, and we finde it usuall, that the names of statutes and ordinances have been indifferently and confusely used to expresse the one or the other. So as there was not any other more probable devise or invention to have brought the people under the yoke of imposition, without their own assent, then was this, by the way of ordinance. Nay, to adde yet a further strength to this high authority of an ordinance in parliament, the assent also of merchants was usuall joyned therewithall, to make it have the cleerer passage with the subject; and further it was never, but in the time of warre.

The first imposition of this kinde by way of ordinance, 7 Ed. 3. R. 9. which I finde amongst the records, was 7 E. 3. amongst the Orig. de Scac. originals of the Exchequer, where it is said by way of recital, that the king considering how merchants, which make great gaine by trading, ought as well as others to assist him with treasure for his warre, especially considering how at their intreaty he had placed the staple in England; therefore at his parliament held at Yorke, by the prelates earls and barons it was ordained, that the merchants should yeeld unto the king a subsidie upon merchandizes. This subsidie or rather imposition, thus solemnly ordained, and in the times of so great necessity, was no sooner established then revoked, as may appear by the words immediately following in the same record, whereupon the merchants of their own accords yeilded, and freely gave ten shillings upon a sack of wooll, as much upon three hundred woollfells, and twenty shillings upon a last of leather, for a short time, by way of dispensation or licence, towards the maintenance of the warre.

The like is found anno 20 E. 3. where the commons complaining of an imposition of this kinde, laid by the prelates earls and barons in parliament, and by the agreement also of merchants, it was not denied unto them, but that their suit was just. Onely it was answered them, that as yet it was not convenient to take it away; for that the king had taken up great summes of money of divers merchants, for his present necessity, to be repayed out of the said subsidie, and therefore it could not be as yet discharged without great damage to the king and the merchants. But the most materiall record, against impositions by way of ordinance, is the yeere following, where the king, in excuse of impositions complained of, answereth, that they were laid in times of great necessity, and by the assent of the prelates, earles, and barons, and other great men, and some of the commons then present; nevertheless his pleasure is, that such impositions, not duly laid, be not drawn into consequence, but taken away, 21 E. 3. No. 17.

There are some others of this kinde, but never any that did abide the triall, though they have alwayes been accompanied with all such circumstances, as were most likely to give them passage without controullment; as to be laid in the time of warre, to be limited to a short time, with consent of merchants. If the authoritie of an ordinance in parliament, joyned with the assent of merchants, were in those dayes not of force sufficient to uphold impositions, much lesse will an order of the king and his counsell out of parliament uphold them at this day, especially after so many yeeres discontinuance.

Another invention to raise impositions, practised by Ed. 3. Impositions raised by way of loane from the merchants, of so much above the old custome of loane by merchants, upon merchandize exported or imported, which loane was never repaid to the merchant. That this was an old practise, may be collected by the president, 12 of Ed. 2. already cited, where the king promisseth, that without fiction or delay he would repay them their money; implying thereby, that sometimes fiction had been used: and doubtlesse that loane which was 11 Ed. 2. the very yeere before, was such a fained loane as I speake of; for otherwise, without question, the king would not have released part of it, as may appear by that record that he did. For if the money be, bona fide, borrowed, and truly intended to be repaid, then doubtlesse the course is lawfull; if otherwise, I hold this kinde also as unlawfull as any of the rest.

Edward the third did once or twice borrow in this kinde, as may appear by records already cited to another purpose, with which I will not againe trouble you.

There was yet another device for raising of impositions, begun indeed by Ed. 1. and condemned in the time of Ed. 2. but revived, and much practised by Ed. 3. which was also by way of grant of merchants, and yet not altogether the same that I first observed to have been so much practised by Ed. 2. but is much more colourable and tolerable. For whereas that was a grant, or rather a meere gift, without any thing granted back againe in lieu thereof; this, I now speake of, is a solemn grant indeed, made by merchants, of an increase of custome, for liberties and freedoms, and other valuable priviledges and exemptions, granted unto them by the king. That former was data nihil expectantes. This is, data & dabitur vobis. And indeed the recompence that the merchants had by this charter granted unto them, made their grant to the king lesse subject to controull, then otherwise without such recompence it would have been. I mean the grant of merchant strangers, so often remembered amongst us by the name of charta mercatoria, which though it were damned all the time of Ed. 2. from the third yeere of his reign, yet was it revived by E. 3. even that very yeere, when he likewise deposed the king his father, and usurped to himself his crown. For it appears by the records, that he commanded the same to be levied the very first yeere of his reigne. What hath been said against this kind of imposition, I shall not need here againe to repeat, onely let me call to your remembrance, how this charter, as needing a better prop then his owne strength, and validity in law, was in the same kings reigne confirmed by parliament, and onely by that strength continueth in force at this day.

You have heard five or sixe severall politique inventions and devices for the easie drawing on and sweetning of this yoke of impositions, all practised by this prudent and potent king, Ed. 3. whose times were indeed so troublesome, and his charge every way so excessive, as it is no marvell, that he left not any way unattempted to raise money, without the assent of the commons, whom he always found unwillingly and hardly drawne to matters of charge.

One other way of impositions he used, not coloured or masked under any such pretence, or politick invention, as you have heard, but plain and direct, only his owne expresse commandment to his officers, to collect of every merchant so much for such a commoditie, exported or imported, and to answer it into his Exchequer, without any recital in his commissions, of grant, assent, gift, loane of merchants, dispensation, or ordinance in parliament, or any other such colourable pretext whatsoever.

These indeed, and only these, are meer impositions, and may be aptly compared with these of our times. Of this kind, amongst all the records of Edward the third's time, I find only two, which I will truly open unto you. The first is in the twenty-one of his reigne, where it appears, that Lionell, afterwards duke of Clarence, named upon the record Lionell of Antwerp, because I suppose he was there borne, the kings second sonne being then guardian of England, whilest the king his father was at the siege of Callice, at a counsell by him held the same yeere, which I take to be no other then the privie counsell, assented without assent of parliament, upon every sack of wooll two shillings, upon every tun of wine two shillings, upon every pound of aver de poys of merchandizes imported six-pence. This imposition was, I must confesse, for ought I know to the contrary, such as our present impositions are; I mean, in that it was imposed onely and simply by the kings absolute power, and may in that respect be the fourth, of that number of fixe, which I told you were all that could be found in any degree like to ours, ever to have been practised in this commonwealth, from the Conquest till queene Maries time. But though in the authoritie of imposing it be like, yet in circumstances very materiall you shall find an apparent difference between them.

First, this imposition is very moderate in the sum, as you may perceive; for it was but two shillings upon a sack; whereas in 13. Ed. 3. forty shillings upon a sack of wooll was usuall, and sometimes fifty shillings. Secondly, it was to continue no longer then till Michaelmas following. Thirdly, it was laid in the time of a most chargeable warre, and ordained to be employed for the maintenance of ships of warre at sea, for the safeguard of merchants in their passage, of which it is apparent there was at this instant very great necessitie; for it was, as I have said, imposed then, when king Ed. 3. lay at the siege of Callice.

Besides, such as it was, and so qualified as you perceive, it was nevertheless complained of in parliament, by a petition from the commons, as may appear by the records of the same of 21. Edward the third. To which petition or complaint this answer was given, that all the said impositions were already taken away, save only the two shillings upon a sack of wooll, which should last no longer then Easter; and seeing the same was ordained for the safeguard of merchants, in which there had been greater sums of money expended by the king, then could be collected between that and Michaelmas, therefore to continue the same till Easter; he hoped it would not seem over-burdensome or grievous unto them. In the parliament following, viz. anno 22. the commons pray, that writs may bee directed to the customers to forbear at Easter next to take the two shillings upon a sack, according as it was granted at the first parliament, and that it be not any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant. The king answereth, let it cease at Easter, as it was agreed the last parliament.

Here you see it was absolutely taken away; and therefore though it had wanted these qualifications and circumstances which I have observed it had, yet, it being a thing so publicly condemned, it ought to be of little force with you to justify these present impositions. But that which I observe out of this last record, maketh me rather to incline, that this imposition was onely by way of dispensation, then that it was an absolute imposition, such as ours are. For to what end, I pray you, should the commons pray that it might not be any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant, except it were likely that merchants for their benefit should pray the longer continuance thereof; and what benefit can any imposition whatsoever bee to a merchant, except it bee by way of dispensation to give him leave to trade, where before such dispensation given he stood altogether restrained? If then it be an imposition by way of dispensation with a penall statute of restraint, then is it no president for our present impositions. But whether or no it be a dispensation or absolute imposition, I leave it to your judgements. You have heard my observation.

And so I come to the next president in the times of Ed. 3. produced for maintenance of our impositions, which was in the 24 yeere of his reigne, the record of which and that which followed thereupon, I will, without any inforcement at all, open unto you, and so leave it to your censures. The king reciting, that whereas the Spaniard and French had joyned in league to make warre against him, and that for the withstanding of his said adversaries, as also for the safeguard of merchants against pirates, he had ordained, that certaine ships should be set forth, and that for maintenance of the said ships there should be paid by merchants two shillings for every sack of wooll, two shillings for three hundred woollfells, foure shillings for a last of leather, a scute of gold, or foure shillings for a tunne of wine, and sixpence of the pound upon all other merchandizes for one yeere following; he commandeth his customers to levy the same accordingly.

The very next yeere and parliament following, the commons exhibite a petition in parliament against impositions and other like charges, without assent of parliament: to which answer is given, that it is not the kings intention they should be charged.

I have now gone through all the materiall records here amongst us, of the times of Ed. 3. in which, though his reigne were very long, and by reason of his warres, and other excessive charge, more occasion was given him to try the strength of this point of the prerogative, then ever any king before or since; though oftentimes, and by many politicke inventions, as you have heard, he attempted to establish this prerogative, of laying impositions without assent in parliament; yet can there not be produced in all his time, any more then two presidents of impositions like to these of ours; that is, imposed by the kings absolute authority. And yet these two were also, as you perceive, qualified with such circumstances, as, if ours were such, we should have held them tolerable, though perhaps not lawfull. Yet they, such as they were, escaped not without being complained of, and condemned also in parliament, as you have heard.

It may perhaps be, that some one or two of these impositions, which were by assent or grant of merchants in this time of Ed. 3. were in times when the passage was open, and not restrained by act of parliament, and so to be compared to our impositions. But whosoever shall, by looking over the statutes and records with never so much heed, consider the times of opening and shutting of the sea by statutes, shall finde it so intricate, as hee shall bee very hardly able directly to say, that, at the time when any of these impositions were granted, the passage was open.

If in my observation I had found any such, I should have admitted it for an absolute imposition, as I have done charta mercatoria, which was by grant of merchants; for certainly, as I have yielded, the grant of merchants is in this case of no other effect, then the declaration only of their assent; and the imposition resteth meerly upon the king's authority. But I finde none such. If any such could be produced, you have heard, how they have beene from time to time controlled in parliament.

And so I passe from Ed. 3. to the times following. From the end of the reign of Ed. 3. till the reign of queen Mary, who was the eleventh prince of this realme after Ed. 3. (as Ed. 3. was the eleventh after the Conquest) being the space of 170. yeeres or thereabouts, it hath been confessed by all those that have argued in maintenance of his majesties right to impose, that there hath not been found one record that proves any one imposition to have been laid. There are indeed in our printed bookes some three or foure statutes during that time, in which mention is made of impositions. But they are, as I shall prove, impositions of another nature then those are which we complaine of; and so make nothing at all to the proove of his majesties right: or if they were such as ours are, yet are they no where found mentioned but with disgrace, and to the end to be taken away; which may be the reason, that notwithstanding the great use that might have been made of three or foure presidents of impositions in these times, for the patching up of a continuance of the practise, which otherwise by this long discontinuance receives a great blemish; those which argued for impositions did not take hold of these, but chose rather to confesse, that no impositions at all were laid during all this time, and labored to seek out the reasons of the discontinuance.

I will briefly shew you what statutes they are, during that time, which mention impositions. The first is 11 R. 2. cap. 9. No imposition nor charge shall be put upon woolls, leather, or woollfells, other than the custome and subsidie granted to the king this present parliament; and if any be, the same shall be repealed and annulled, as it was another time ordained by statute, saving alway to the king his ancient right. If by this saving the pretended right of imposing should be excepted, as was said in the Exchequer, the saving should then be contrary to the body of the act; and therefore it must needs have some other interpretation, that it may stand with the rest of the act, and not condemn the law makers of so much want of discretion. Therefore doubtlesse this (saving) is no other then an exception of the ancient rightfull customes, due upon those staple commodities. And for my part I am of opinion, that the statute was made, not so much to take away any imposition laid by this king R. 2. as out of a provident and prudent care in the law makers, proceeding from the fresh memory of the practise of Ed. 3. in this kinde; for all those that were of this parliament, did live and were at mans age in Ed. 3. time, and could not but well remember the grievousnes of his impositions. Besides, I observe, that they desire, that no imposition be laid by way of addition to the subsidie upon woolls and leather then granted. It was never heard till of late, that an imposition upon any merchandize was charged at the same time with a subsidie; and therefore without question, this was no other then an abundant provision by them, wherein they were no more carefull then any wise man would be in the like case. When they had of their own free wills given the king a liberall gift, they were carefull not to be further charged by him.

The next statute in these times, where impositions are found mentioned, is 23 H. 6. cap. 18. By which it appears, that English merchants, being restrained from repaying to Gascogne and Guien, to buy the wines of that country, they were nevertheless suffered to repaire thither paying certaine new impositions, which were demanded of them. Upon complaint hereof, it was enacted, that all English merchants might freely passe into those parts, and buy wines there at their pleasure, without any new imposition or charge to be put upon them; for that such impositions were to the damage of merchants, and to the hindrance of all the kings people: if any were demanded by the kings officers, the officers so demanding them should forfeit twenty pound, besides treble damages, to the party grieved.

That these impositions were by way of dispensation with a statute, which restrained the repaire of English merchants into those parts, and not by the kings absolute power, thereupon to ground an imposition, is evident by the statutes in print. For from 27 Ed. 3. till this, 23 H. 6. there are five or six statutes in print to this purpose, some more strict then other, which continued in force till 23 H. 6. The reason of the restraint by Ed. 3. I suppose to have been; because Gascogne and Guien were then in his possession, and he was desirous his subjects, the merchants of those countries, should have the sole profit of their own commodities; and that they onely should import them into England, and not the merchants of England. Whatsoever the cause of the restraint was, it is very cleer the restraint was by statute, and that this imposition raised by way of dispensation was condemned; which nevertheless, suppose it had not been controled, yet, as I have said oftentimes, it is in nature so farre differing from ours, as the practise thereof will not so much as help to salve this long discontinuance.

The next mention of impositions is found 1 R. 3. cap. 12. The words are, the subjects and cominality of this realme shall not from henceforth be charged by any such charge or imposition called a benevolence, nor by such like charge. You perceive by the words of the statute, what impositions are intended within that statute.

The next mention of impositions in these times, I finde to be, 7 H. 7. where a charge of eighteen shillings, laid upon a butt of malmesie by parliament, is called an imposition.

Another mention of impositions, I finde to be, 12 H. 7. cap. 6. In the preamble of the statute the words are, that every person ought to use himselfe to his most advantage, without exaction, fine, imposition or contribution to be had, or taken of him, to, or by any English person, or persons.

Though some, that have argued before me against impositions, have urged this statute, as making against our present impositions, yet for my part, I am not of that opinion, but upon perusing the statute, doe rather thinke, that it extendeth only to impositions laid by the merchants of London, upon the merchants of other cities and townes not incorporate into their companies, as will evidently appeare by the statute: so as notwithstanding this statute, that which I have averred, and hath been yielded to by the kings counsell, that no imposition was laid from Ed. 3. to queene Maries reigne, is not yet impeached.

There is yet one other statute of later time, in which mention is made of impositions, and that is 14. H. 8. cap. 4. The words are, every subject borne in England, and sworne to be subjects of other princes, as long as they shall so abide subjects to the other princes, shall pay such customs, subsidies, tolls, and other impositions, within this realme, as strangers doe. I hold that this word impositions, in this place, is used as a generall to all the particulars before mentioned, and no otherwise; and is no more in effect then charges; a thing usuall in statutes of this nature, to adde generall words for the more securitie, which I collect by the word (other) going next before it: for to what end should it be said, no (other) impositions, if those particulars first named, were not contained within that generall word of impositions? This word (other) is a relative, and must needs be answered with words going before, when there are no other words following.

Besides, it is common in the statutes and records of Ed. 3. No imposition upon woolls shall be laid, but in parliament; by which it appears, that a charge laid by parliament may be called an imposition; which is very evident by a statute made not above 28 yeeres before this, I meane the statute of 7. H. 7. cap. 7. which I spake of even now, where a charge of eighteen shillings upon a butt of malmsey, laid by that act of parliament, is called an imposition; and as I have shewed you, the word imposition hath been applied to all these severall inventions, used by Ed. 3. for the charging of merchandizes. Nay, the word maltoll, which is Englished by Rastall an evil toll, as indeed it signifies, and in that respect is of a farre harder sense then the word imposition, is used indifferently for a charge set by parliament, or a charge set by the kings absolute power upon merchandizes.

Impositio, derived from the verbe imponere, is no other then the act of laying on, or imposing; and therefore in my opinion, impositions are more properly by the merchants called imposts, which signifieth the things imposed. But I shall not need any further to enforce this, considering it hath so liberally been confessed by the kings counsell, that there is no record or statute from Ed. 3. till queen Maries reigne, that giveth any assurance that impositions, or so much as any one imposition was laid, during all that space of above 170. yeeres. Only it behoves me for further opening the truth, to testifie, that, being one of those that were by you employed to make search in the ancient custome books of those times remaining in the Exchequer, together with some of the best experienced merchants of this house, some of which had sate at the receipt of custome, wee had many meetings, and spent many whole dayes in turning over the old custome books, and as carefully as we could did survey some books of every age and time; but after all our search ended, could not finde any one imposition from the time of Ed. 3. till queen Maries reigne, to have been received by any customer or collector. And if you please to give me leave to remember to you the passages of those times, you cannot but marvell, that none of all those princes should so much as attempt to trie the strength of this so beneficiall a prerogative, so much practised by Ed. 3. and when you have heard their occasions, and compared their other actions with their forbearance in this kinde, you will, I think, conclude, and say in your hearts, that surely none of all those kings had so much as any imagination, that any such prerogative belonged unto them, as to raise money at their pleasure, by laying a charge upon merchandizes to be exported or imported, without assent in parliament.

Richard

Richard 2. Richard the second, being the grand-childe and next successor of Ed. 3. in whose times impositions of all sorts did so much rage, had little leile occasion then his predecessor had. For first, he had little treasure left him, and he was no sooner in his throne, but news was brought that the French had invaded the realme. They had burned Rye and Hastings in Suffex, they had taken and possessed the Ile of Wight, they had besieged Winchelsey. From the northern parts, the Scots had burned Roxborough, and were ready to overrunne all the north parts of England. Being thus beset with warre on all sides, doth his counsell, which in all likelyhood had most of them been of counsell to his grandfather, advise him to raise money by impositions, as his grandfather had done (for this course of raising money by way of impositions, was yet fresh in all their memories)? They do not, but he taketh the ordinary course, by calling a parliament, which for maintenance of his charge in the war, the second yeere of his reign, granteth him a fifteenth. He calleth another parliament, and hath another fifteenth granted, the fourth yeere of his reign. The warres increasing, his necessities were such, and so conceived by the parliament, as they granted him a most unusuall tax throughout the whole kingdome, upon every ecclesiasticall person, one and other, fixe shillings eight pence; upon every other man or woman within the realm, four pence; which when it came to be levied, caused (though causelessly, because it was legally granted) that notorious rebellion, of which Wat Tyler was the captaine. This tax, as it was levied not without that great rebellion, so questionlesse was it unwillingly yeelded to in parliament; and yet because there was no other course thought lawfull for the raising of treasure upon the subjects goods, then by their own assent in parliament, onely that course was thought fit to be practised, which was such as ought to be obeyed.

From the 5. to the 18. yeere of his reign, he obtained every other yeere one aide or other in parliament; sometimes a tax, sometimes a fifteenth, sometimes a subsidie of tonnage and poundage. In the eighteenth yeere, he was enforced to go in person into Ireland, to settle the state of that country, then in rebellion. All these troubles he had from abroad, besides those famous rebellions here at home, which afterwards cast him out of his seat; yet did he never for all this attempt to lay impositions, though he wanted not about him to put him in minde of his absolute power. For Edward Strafford, bishop of Exeter, lord chancellor of England, in a sermon made to the parliament held anno 21. as our chronicles report, did publicly maintain, that the king was not bound by any law, but was of himself absolute and above law, and that to controle any of his actions was an offence worthy of death; at which parliament all that were present came armed, for fear of the king; and the parliament house it selfe was beset with 4000. archers by his appointment. I will speak no more of him then this. Though he were a king of a weak spirit, yet did he not spare to practise upon his people the most grievous things that were; insomuch that he so farre discontented them that they deposed him by common consent in parliament, the onely desperate example of that kinde that our histories doe afford, or I hope ever shall.

Henry 4. His successor Henry the fourth, in respect he held the crown by so weak a title, had cause to give the people all the content he could possible. And yet he was so oppressed with warres on all sides, from France and Scotland, but especially by continuall and dangerous invasions made by the Welsh, as without the aide of his people for the supply of his treasure, it had not been possible for him to have held his crown on his head. And therefore he pressed his people so farre, that in a parliament held the fifth yeere of his reign, they yeelded to him so great and so unaccustomed a tax, as that the grantors thereof, as our chroniclers say, tooke speciall order, that no memory thereof should remaine of record onely to avoide the president; and yet the very next yeere following, his wants were againe grown so great, as his subjects, being assembled in parliament to give him further ayde, did resolve, that there was no other way to supply his want, then to take from the clergie their temporall lands and goods, and to give them all to the king; which being withstood by the clergie, a resumption of all the gifts of Ed. 3. and Ric. 2. was propounded. At last, after they had sate a whole yeere, they gave him two fifteenths. At this time, most of his counsell and the great officers of the kingdome were spirituall men: Had they not now, if ever, a iust occasion given them to have put the king in minde of his prerogative of laying impositions, not onely to the intent to have diverted him from the harkning to that desperate motion, that had been made against them to all their utter undoings; but were they not also bound in duty and conscience, in this time of so great necessitie, seeing the parliament knew not otherwise how to supplie the kings wants, to have advised him to have made use of his lawfull right of imposing; by which means, he might, without troubling the parliament, quickly have raised great summes of money? Certainly it was not, because they were ignorant of any such practise in former times; for none of them that were then of the counsell to Henry the fourth, but they lived in Ed. 3. time; and most of them, doubtlesse, were in Ed. 3. time men of age and discretion. But in all likelyhood as they knew that Edward the third did lay impositions, so likewise they knew, that impositions had been from time to time, in those daies, condemned as unlawfull, and were become hatefull to the people; and onely for that reason they did forbear to advise the king to take that course, though the necessitie were never so great.

Another prerogative, as much concerning the interest of the subject as this of impositions, namely the abasing of coyne, this king made no scruple at all to put in practise, because he held it to be lawfull.

Hen. 5. His sonne, and next successor, Hen. 5. who, by his many victories over the French, and his noble disposition and behaviour towards his people, was so farre beloved of them, as never was king of this realme more, though the kingdome were now, by one degree of descent, more firmly settled upon him then it was on his father, who usurped it; though also his expence of treasure, by reason of that great warre in France, were as much, as any king's of England ever were; though he had troubles also from his neighbours the Scots, and within his owne realme by rebellions; and lastly, though he spared not, for supplie of treasure, to suppress above a 100. priories of aliens; yet neither out of the strength of his love with the people, nor in his extreame necessity, by reason of these honorable warres in France, for the maintenance of which the people would willingly have undergone any burden which he would have laid upon them, especially after the victory at Agencourt, did he ever so much as attempt the laying of impositions.

His successor Hen. 6. though indeed of a meek spirit, yet he was so followed with troubles within the realme, and from abroad, that he was enforced to crave such an extraordinary aide of his subjects in parliament, as the levying thereof was the cause of that famous rebellion of Jack Cade in his time. Besides, in the 18 yeere of his reign, for the ease of his charge and supply of his wants, all grants by him made, of any lands, rents, annuities, or fees whatsoever, since the first day of his reign, were resumed: and this is never yeelded to, but in cases of extreame necessity. As for impositions, notwithstanding his great wants, he thought not of them.

Edw. 4. that succeeded him, was no lesse free from troubles; for he was, as you know, driven to forsake his kingdome, and to live for a while like a banished man with the duke of Burgundy. He was also enforced in the 5 yeere of his reign to make a resumption; and the same yeere to abase his coyne. And Comines observeth of him, that he obtained a subsidie of his subjects in parliament, upon condition that he should himselfe in person undertake the war in France; and that only to get the subsidie, he passed the seas into France, but presently returned without doing any thing. What should such shifts as these have needed, if he might, without being beholding to his subjects, lawfully and without controll have raised treasure by laying of impositions? It is well worth the remembring, that which the same Comines, speaking in commendation of the frame of this common-wealth, saith, that this state is happy, in that the people cannot be compelled by the king to sustain any publique charge, except it be by their own consent in parliament.

I proceed from Ed. 4. to Hen. 7. omitting Ed. 5. and Ric. 3. because of the shortnes of their reignes. Hen. 7. had indeed a more peaceable time than any of his predecessors; and yet he was not altogether free from troubles, both within the realme and from abroad. But his naturall inclination was rather to embrace peace. He was so provident and politique in the gathering and storing up of treasure, as never any prince of this realme was therein to be compared to him. He did himselfe take the accounts of his revenues, which I have seen under his own hand. He had for his assistants about him Empson and Dudley, men learned in the lawes, and by all probability very cunning in all the profitable points of the prerogative; men that intended or studied little else than the advancing of their masters profit; men even till this day infamous for their wicked counsell, in perswading that good king to lay such heavy exactions and burdens upon his people as he did. If these men, who in all likelihood should have best knowne the kings right, especially in so high a point of profit, had but had the least notice of so profitable a prerogative as this, would they not have been at strife which of them should first have put the king in minde thereof? Or if they had held it questionable, would they not have put it to some trial? Certainly there can be no cause imagined, that should make them thus to forbear, but either they were utterly ignorant of any such prerogative; or, that knowing such a thing to be claimed by some of the ancient kings, especially by Ed. 3. they knew likewise, that it was in the same times continually complained of in parliament, and always condemned; and that there were acts of parliament directly against it. And this is more probably to be conceived of them, being men of such searching spirits, and so well studied in point of prerogative, then that they were ignorant of the practise of Ed. 3. considering also that they were neerer to those times by 120 yeeres then wee are.

But that which most of all moves me herein is, that there was in H. 7. time such an occasion offered of making use of this prerogative, as there could not possibly happen any other that might better have justified the laying of impositions, which was this. The Venetians, to the intent to drive our merchants from fetching sweet wines at Candy, that they might the better employ their owne ships and merchants, did impose upon every butt of malmesey brought thence by English merchants foure ducats; by which means the English wholly lost that trade, and the Venetians made the whole profit thereof. This mischief was no other way better to be remedied, than by imposing the like, or a greater charge upon merchants of Candy bringing malmesey into England; that so they of Candy not being able to afford them better cheape than the English, the English might still fetch them from Candy, as they had wont to doe. I say, there could not possibly be a more justifiable occasion of laying impositions, than this was. And did this king, so carefull in other things of preserving his prerogative, and most of all in matters that concerned his profit, take hold of this occasion to lay an imposition by his absolute power? Nay rather, though he saw it convenient, and in a manner necessary, yet he conceived it to be unlawfull so to do; and therefore did it not by his absolute power, but by assent of parliament, as may appeare by the statute of 7 Hen. 7. cap. 7. printed; where, in the preamble of the act, you shall see the occasion of the making of the act to be as I have opened it unto you: and you may perceive by the body of the act, that for the counterpoysing of the imposition of foure ducats laid by the Venetians upon our merchants, there was imposed 18s. for a butt of malmesey, upon their merchants bringing it hither, to last as long as the imposition of foure ducats, which, as appeares by the act, came but to 18s. of our money, should endure. It is not probable, that this king, considering his other actions, would have suffered this to have been done by parliament, if he had thought he might have lawfully done it by his absolute power; and therefore it cannot almost be gaine-said, that in these times this pretended prerogative of laying impositions without assent of parliament was held to be against law.

Hen. 8. his sonne and successor, was so farre from the disposition of his father, in this point of thrift and providence, as there was not in the whole ranke of our kings any one like to him, for excessive prodigality. The great riches stored up by his father with so much care, and left unto him, hee so sodainly consumed in triumphs, maskes, mummeries, banquets, pompous and braving warres, as was that of Turwin and Turney, and in the satisfying of his lust, as he was out of very necessity enforced to crave most unreasonable aids of his subjects in parliament, such as never before had been granted, which through very dread and feare were yielded to him. Yet not so satisfied, that no meanes for the raising of money might bee neglected or unattempted, in the 15 yeere of his reigne, by the counsell of that proud prelate cardinall Woolsey, he spared not to send out commissions into every shire throughout the whole realme, with privy instructions to the commissioners, how they should with most advantage behave themselves, in perswading the people to contribute to the king the sixt part of their whole estates, to bee paid presently, either in money or plate; whereupon followed extreme cursing, weeping and exclamation against the king and his counsell, and the people were in point to rebell, had not the king stayed the proceedings of the commissioners by his letters. Finding that this way would not serve his turne, hee demanded a benevolence; which not answering his expectation, hee did the same yeere raise unto himselfe a great deale of treasure by abasing his gold.

Such things as these, princes never put in practise, but when all other meanes faile them; and yet hee went many degrees beyond this. For, in the 27. yeere of his reigne he suppressed above 370 religious houses, the yearly value of whose revenues I have read to be no lesse than 32000*l.* per annum in those days: and that of their goods, sold at very low prizes, he made above 100000*l.* in present money. About 4. yeeres after he dissolved all the monasteries, abbeies, priories, nunneries, and all other religious houses of what kinde soever throughout England. By which meanes, and by the sale of their goods, he gathered such a masse of treasure, as it might have been imagined that never any king of this realme should have needed to have sought reliefe at his subjects hands. Yet hee himselfe, no longer than within 3. yeeres after following, craved and obtained, as may appear by the statutes of that time, an excessive great ayde by parliament; and yet the yeere following hee did also abase his coyne more then halfe in halfe, such an abasement as never before or since was heard of, and could not but bee very grievous to the people; but because perhaps they held it lawfull so to doe, they made no publique complaint thereof. And it is worth the observing, that though this prerogative of abasing coyne be a thing which trencheth as deeply into the private interest of the subject as the laying of impositions; for by this meanes a man, that this day is worth in revenues a hundred pounds per an. shall to-morrow, if the king be so pleased, be worth but fifty or forty, or lesse, in reall value; and though also the practise of this prerogative hath not been forborne by any of the kings of this realme, and that some of them have used it very immoderately; yet cannot there be found any one publique complaint, that ever I have met withall, upon record against it, as from time to time there have bene many against impositions; which argues that the subject did make a difference between these two prerogatives; this, of laying impositions; and that, of abasing coyne; thinking the one lawfull and the other not. But to conclude my observations upon the actions of Hen. 8. The next yeere after this unconscionable abasement of his money, hee craved a benevolence. The yeere following hee tooke the profits of all the chantries, colleges and free chappels, &c. during his life, which ended the next yeere. Can any man imagine, that during this kings reigne it was held lawfull, or any such thing so much as dreamed of, to raise treasure by laying impositions? I will enforce it no farther, but leave it to the judgement of any reasonable man, that shall consider these things which I have remembered, whether or no it bee likely.

Edward 6. Out of the time of his sonne and successor Ed. 6. I can observe little, because of the shortnesse of his reigne. But methinkes, if his governors had imagined that any such prerogative had been due unto him, they should not in honor have forborne the practise thereof for the supplying of the kings great necessities, and instead thereof have craved of the subjects that unaccustomed and unreasonable subsidy, granted an. 2. of a certain sum of money upon every sheep and every cloth within the realme, for 3. yeeres; which afterwards for the unreasonable thereof was released.

A corollary of connexion of all the times before mentioned.
 I have now gone through in such sort as you have heard, the times of all the kings from Ed. 3. till Q. Maries reigne; during which time what can there be more imagined, that might possibly have happened to have awakened impositions, if they had not been more than asleepe? Neither the necessity of just and honorable warre, nor the subtilties and curiosities of peace, nor the prodigality of some of these kings for the better satisfying of their pleasures, nor the covetousnesse of others, nor the softnesse of some of their dispositions, nor the nonage of others apt to be abused by evil counsellors, nor the dreadfull and fearefull awe in which some of them held their subjects, nor the assurance of the peoples extraordinary affection, which might have emboldened some others, nor the evil conscience of usurpers, nor any other motive whatsoever, which happened during this long time, could revive them; untill Q. Mary did at last raise them out of the grave, after they had been so many yeeres dead and rotten.

Q. Mary. The first imposition, that shee layd, was that upon cloth, continued till this day, which grew upon a speciall reason; as may appear by the printed booke of the rates of her customes and subsidies; in the end whereof you shall finde a declaration expressing the losse sustained by reason of the difference between the customes and subsidies of wool and cloth. By which it appears, that a sack of wool yielded in custome six shillings eight-pence, and in subsidy thirty-three shillings four-pence; that the custome upon a short cloth was fourteen-pence, and that a sack of wool did commonly make foure short clothes, the custome of which was foure shillings eight-pence; so that the custome of wool made into cloth was lesse, then the custome and subsidie of so much wool not cloathed, in every sack in short clothes thirty-five shillings foure-pence; which difference was reduced to an equality by rating upon every short cloth ten shillings. After this declaration made of the difference, and of the rate which reduced both to an equality, follow these words; 'Which difference considered, and the great losse sustained by us in the same, by reason that cloathing is much increased, it is thought convenient by us, with the advice of our counsell, towards the reliefe of the losse, for to assesse, upon the clothes carried out by way of merchandize, some larger rate then heretofore hath been used; and though it were reason to appoint such a rate as might recompence the full of the losse sustained, yet upon divers considerations, at this time, us and our counsell moving, we are pleased only to assesse upon every short cloth, by the name of custome, six shillings eight-pence, &c.'

I thought good to open this at large unto you, that you might see, upon what speciall reason of equity this imposition was grounded, and how it differeth from ours. And it is worthy the observing, how the queene commandeth this increase of custome to be yielded unto her, not as an imposition, or by the name of impost, but by the name of custome; because it cometh in lieu of the ancient custome upon wool; which is the reason, that at this day it is demanded and paid by that name; whereas no other new raised duty hath that priviledge, but they are either called subsidie of tonnage or poundage, if they be raised by act of parliament; or impost, if by the kings absolute power.

The name of custome was anciently given to none but to wools, woollfells, and leather; and upon this occasion, to cloth also.

This imposition, though grounded upon such equity as you have heard, yet in Dyer, 1 Eliz. fo. 165. a. and b. it was, as appears by my L. Dyer, complained of by the merchants of London with great exclamation, (which are his words,) and suit to the queen to be unbundred of it, because it was not granted in parliament, but assented by queen Mary of her absolute power: whereupon there were divers assemblies and conferences of the justices and others, but their resolution is no where to be found, at least by us. It is very probable, that, if they had given judgment for the queen, it would not have bene kept close. But howsoever the profit was too great to be taken from the crowne, and therefore it continues till this day.

Howsoever the reason in equity in the laying this imposition upon cloth may seeme to bee found unto some men, and so to allow of this imposition as differing from ours, yet for my part I hold it not so, when I consider what course was taken by Ed. 3. upon the same occasion. An. 11. E. 3. cap. 1. and 2. it was enacted, that no wool should be carried out of England, but by the kings licence; and that no man should weare cloth, other than such as should be made in England. This law tooke such effect, as within ten yeeres the greatest part of the wool in England was made into cloth; and it became to be transported in such abundance, by reason that there was no custome at all due upon cloth, and the custome and subsidie upon wools was very high, that in the 21. yeere, the king, finding his custome of wools so much decreased, doth seeke to remedy it, not by imposing a new charge upon cloth by his absolute power, as queen Mary did, but did it by assent of his subjects in full parliament, as I collect partly by my L. Dyer in the place last mentioned, but more fully by a recital in a record amongst us, of 24. E. 3. ro. 13. Orig. de Scaccar. to this effect: that whereas the customes and subsidies due and granted upon wools are much decreased, because a great part of the wool of England is made into cloth, for which no custome is due; and whereas in consideration thereof, at our council held the 21. yeere of our reigne, by the common assent of the prelates earles and barons and others, it was ordeined and accorded, that 14*d.* by denizens, and 20*d.* by strangers, should be paid for every cloth of assise, &c. made of English wool, and transported; upon paine of forfeiture of the clothes. And so followeth an authority given to collect the same.

The next imposition laid by queen Mary was forty shillings upon a tun of French wines, imposed in the 5. yeere of her reigne: at which time there was first a proclamation made, that no wines at all should be brought from France, being then in enmity with England, upon paine of forfeiture of the wines; which, by the way, is a strange clause in a proclamation. Immediately after this restraint there was an order made by the queen and her privy counsell, that such as would might bring in French wines, notwithstanding the proclamation, paying forty shillings upon every tun by the name of impost, as doth appear by record in the rolls of Exchequer, in the case of one Germaine Ciol, against whom an information was exhibited for not paying the said imposition. Whereunto, taking it by way of traverse, that there is any law of the land by which he may be charged with impost, he pleads a licence made unto him, an. 1. and 2. Ph. & Mar. to import a certaine number of tunnes of wine within a certaine time, any restraint then made, or afterwards to be made to the contrary, notwithstanding; provided alwayes, that the custome, subsidie, and other duties due and accustomed to be paid to the king and queen, were duly satisfied: and he shewes, that, for all wines brought in by him during the life of queen Mary, hee paid the subsidie of tonnage, viz. three shillings for every tun, which was all that was due and accustomed to be paid. Upon this plea a demurrer was joyned, and judgement given thereupon against the queen. This judgement hath been enforced in the maintenance of impositions. Whether or no it make not rather against them, I leave to your censures.

Neere about the same time there were impositions laid also by queen Mary upon all French commodities whatsoever to be imported; as may appear by the port-booke of those times in the Exchequer; which impositions were received to the use of queen Eliz. in the beginning of the 1. yeere of her reign. But ere the year ended they were all taken away, as may appear by the same port-booke; which in my opinion is a great argument, that they were not then held lawfull. For princes doe not so easily give over their hold in matters of profit, if they be any way able to maintain tain it. What hath hitherto upheld the imposition upon wines, I know not, except it be the great profit that comes by it to the crown, and because there was never any late judgement given directly against impositions.

You have hitherto heard what reason and direct prooffe I have used to maintaine, that by the common-law the king cannot at his will increase his custome by way of imposition. You have, secondly, heard what the practise of former ages hath been in this kinde, till this day; from which I have also drawn reasons of inference, that prove the common-law so to be. But now, admitting that by the common-law it had been cleere and without question that the king might at his will have laid impositions, and that also the same could have been cleerly proved by the practise of the ancient kings; yet I affirme, that so stands the law of England at this day, by reason of statutes directly in the point, as the kings power, if ever he had any to impose, is not onely limited, but utterly taken away; as I hope I shall be able evidently to prove, notwithstanding any objection that hath been made against the interpretation of the statutes to this sence.

The first statute is in Magna Charta, cap. 30. The words are, All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, shall have their safe and sure conducts, to enter and depart, to goe and tarrie in the realme as well by land as by water, to buy and sell without any evill tolls, by the old and rightfull customes, except in the time of warre. And if they be of the land making warre against us, and be found in our realme at the beginning of the warre, they shall be attached without harme of body, or goods, untill it be knowne to us, or our justices, how our merchants be intreated there in the land making war against us, &c.

The statute, of which this is a branch, is the most ancient statute-law we have, wonne and sealed with the blood of our ancestors; so revered in former times, that it hath been by parliament provided, that transcripts thereof should be sent to all the cathedrall churches of England, there to remaine; that it should be twice every yeere publicly read before the people; that likewise twice every yeere there should be excommunication solemnly denounced to the breakers thereof; that all statutes and all judgements given against it shall be held as void; that it should be received and allowed as the common-law, by all such as have the administration of justice; and it hath been no lesse than 29 times solemnly confirmed in parliament. I will, therefore, with so much the more care, endeavor to free this law from all the objections, that have been made against it.

The first objection doth tend to the diminishing of the extent of this statute, as touching the persons whom it may concerne; for it hath been collected out of the latter words of the statute, that it should extend onely to merchant-aliens, and not to denizens.

First, it is improbable, that the makers of the law should be more carefull to provide for the indemnity of merchant-strangers than of English; except perhaps they might imagine, that English merchants were already sufficiently provided for by the common-law. If that were their reason, as there could be no other that I can imagine, it doth as much maintaine my opinion, as if they had been contained within the statute.

Again, the words are generall, all merchants; and, qui omnes dixerit, nullos excipit.

Besides, the statute is a beneficiall law; in which case particular and speciall words doe alwayes admit a generall extent: and therefore, to restraine generall words, as the objectors would, is against all reason, and rule of law. As for the latter words, 'tis true, they doe indeed extend onely to merchant-strangers; but the sence of the first sentence is perfect without this: and as long as no absurdity nor contradiction doth follow by interpreting the first words to extend to all merchants in generall, and the latter onely to merchant-strangers, the most ample and beneficiall construction is ever the best, as in all other statutes of this nature.

But this objection is, in my opinion, cleerly removed by two statutes made by Ed. 3. in declaration of this very clause. The first is, 2 Ed. 3. c. 8. the words are, *All merchants, strangers and privies, may goe and come with their merchandizes into England, after the tenure of the Great Charter. I take it, that privies in this place, being the very word that is found in the original, which is in French, ought to be understood denizens; for, otherwise I suppose it would have been joyned to the word strangers by a conjunction disjunctive, which is usuall where the words are of one sence, and not by a copulative, as here it is. Besides, I take the word privy to be derived from the Latine, privatus, which signifieth a particular property; as res privata, a mans owne private estate; so, mercatores privati, our own merchants. That merchant-strangers should be first named, is common in statutes and records.*

The next statute explaining this of Magna Charta, is, 14 Ed. 3. c. 2. The words are, Whereas it is contained in the Great Charter, that all merchants shall have safe conduct, &c. We grant that all merchants, denizens and forreins, may freely passe, &c. which I take to be no other than a mere declaration of Magna Charta.

The second objection made against this branch of Magna Charta, is, that the meaning thereof was to secure the merchants, not from a new increase of custome to be imposed by the king, to be paid at their entrance or going out of the ports, such as our impositions are; but from certaine petty exactions, as tolls and such like, which were then usually demanded of them within the land, by the townes through which they were to passe, and where they sold their merchandize; for the farther remedy of which there were afterwards divers statutes made, which doe evidently manifest that such was the mischief. And they doe the rather make this collection because of the words, buy and sell without evill tolls; for, say they, impositions are not paid upon the buying and selling of merchandize, but when they are to ship or unship. They take hold of the word toll, which properly is an exaction for passage within the land, or for sale in markets or faires. These objections notwithstanding, I hold it somewhat cleere, that the meaning of this statute was principally to secure merchants touching impositions. My first argument is drawn ab autoritate, from the authority of the wisest and most sage men in greatest places and offices within this kingdom, in the times wherein they lived, and who also could so much the better judge of the true meaning of this statute, in that they lived so neere the time of the making thereof, even in the beginning of the reigne of the next king (save one) to him that made this statute. I meane those, who made the ordinance in 5 Ed. 2. heretofore divers times mentioned by me, who, in alledging their reason against charta mercatoria, doe amongst other things say, that the same was made against Magna Charta. What was the cause of the griefe conceived against charta mercatoria, other than the impositions by colour thereof laid upon forraine commodities? It appears by the ordinance, that was the onely cause. If then charta mercatoria were by them adjudged to be against Magna Charta, onely because by colour thereof new impositions were raised without assent of parliament, it is evident, that they interpreted the statute of Magna Charta to be made against impositions. If they had thought it to have extended onely to petty tolls and exactions within the land, as is objected, then could it not have extended to charta mercatoria. As for the words, buy and sell, without any manner of evill tolls, I denie not but the words may perhaps have that sence which hath been collected out of them, viz. that in buying and selling, they should be free also from unjust exactions within the land. But I say further, that these words, without any manner of evill toll, by the old and rightfull customes, do extend not onely to the next precedent words, buy and sell, but also to the former words, enter and retorne, and more principally to them then to any other; for to have provided, that they should be free from those petty exactions of tolls in markets, and for passing through cities and townes, and to leave them subject to impositions to be laid on at the kings pleasure, had been but a slender security. This exposition of mine is confirmed by a record here amongst us, of 16 Hen. 3. no longer than seven yeeres after the making of this statute; by which it appears, that the king commanded his officers at the ports, to signifie to all merchants, that they might with safetie enter into his kingdom, paying the rightfull and ancient customes, 'Nec timeant sibi de malevolis quas faciet rex.'

As touching the word toll, which they say is to be understood of tolls for passages, and for buying and selling in faires and markets, it behoves me to say something of the derivation thereof; the rather, because it is very often used in our ancient statutes and records in the same sence as it is in this place; and by the derivation thereof the naturall and true meaning of the word shall be best understood. I hold it therefore to be derived from the Latine word telonium, which signifies custome, by cutting off the latter part of the word, and retaining onely the first part teol, by contraction toll; of which manner of derivation there are infinite examples in our language. The Latine telonium, as saith Calvin in his Lexicon Juris Civilis, is derived from the Greek telos, which signifies as well custom as it doth finis. Hence it is, that the customers are called in Latine telonarii.

Thus you see, that the genuine and primitive signification of our word toll is no other than custome upon merchandizes. From the word toll, are come those two barbarous Latine words found in our statutes and records; tolium, which is the word used in the record of 16 H. 6. but even now vouched by me; and tolnetum, the original word in the statute now in question, which I must confesse is also in our law Latine used by us for toll in the market and toll for passage, as may appear by the register and the book of entries. But in this place, malum tolnetum properly signifies, not a toll in the common sence, but an unlawfull charge laid by the king upon merchandizes, as an increase of custome, according to the primitive signification; which is evidently proved, in that it is here opposed to old and rightfull customes, sine omnibus malis tolnetis per certas & antiquas consuetudines. Wherefore it ought so to have been translated, for so it signifies, without impositions, by the old and rightfull custome. This exposition and translation is further warranted by the use of the word maletoll, so often found in our ancient statutes and records, which without scruple is derived from the Latine, malum tolnetum, the very word of our statute. I find it diversly written, maletout, maletoli, maletoi, and sometimes maletent; but I never find it any where used in any other sence then for an imposition by way of increase of custome upon merchandizes. Sometimes indeed, but that very rarely, it is taken in the best sence, for lawfull and rightfull custome, as the word imposition sometimes is; but then commonly it is accompanied with another word to free it from the worst sence, as droitourl maletout, &c. That malis tolnetis in this place ought to be translated impositions, may be farther proved by that which I find in a writer of the French history, one Jean Serres, who saies, that in the time of Philip le Beau, king of France, which was about the time of Ed. 3. king of England, there were rebellions in France because of impositions laid by the king, which in those days they did, saith he, call maletouts, the very word then anciently used in Engl. for impositions, as may plentifully appear by the statutes and records of H. 3. Ed. 1. Ed. 2. & Ed. 3. for the word imposition was not used in any French record, The word imposition, statute, or other, for ought I have seene, till Ed. 3. I find it once used in Latine, 12. Ed. 3. in the letter which king Edward the third writ to the archbishop, to excuse him to the people for laying impositions; and as all that letter throughout is of an eloquent stile, so as it seemeth he was carefull to avoid also that barbarous word, malum tolnetum, though common and familiar, and instead thereof to use the pure Latine word impositio. Sylvius, writing upon Tullies oration for Marcus Ponticus, where these words are used by Tully, imposuit vectigal, saith, Ita usitatum vulgo est ut vectigalia nova appellantur impositiones. The word vectigal, in this place, though in a generall sence it may be applied to any revenue whatsoever, yet, with the civill lawyers, it is by way of excellence commonly used for custom, as may appear by Calvin in his Lexicon. Vectigal, quod fisco vel republ. portorii nomine penditur, id est, pro mercibus, qua invehuntur vel evehantur. Sometimes they use to joine with it, for a more cleere distinction, the word portarium; as a man would say, the revenue of the ports; ports; agreeable with which, upon some records of Henry the third's time, I have found it to be called exitus portuum. By this it is evident, that impositio in pure Latine, and imposition in English, is the same with maletolt in French and malum tolnetum in our law Latine; and they doe all signifie a new increase of custome, and not any thing else. Wherefore I conclude, that these words, sine malis tolnetis, in our present statute, are naturally and properly to be expounded, and understood of impositions, and so ought to have been translated, and not as they are. And although the word imposition itself, as also the word maletolt, and malum tolnetum may be, as I have confessed, taken as well for a new increase of custome by a lawfull means, viz. by assent in parliament, as for an increase of custome by the kings absolute power, which is unlawfull; yet by the words that immediately follow it is evident, that this statute doth onely intend unlawfull impositions, that is, impositions laid by the kings absolute power, without assent in parliament. Otherwise would they not have been opposed to due and rightfull customes, as by the words of the statute they are.

Derivation of the word toll.

But because there hath been some exception also taken to the exposition of the word custum in that sense in which I take it, that is, for custome upon merchandize, for that the word in the originall is consuetudo, which signifies an usage, and not custuma, which is the Latine word we now use for custome upon merchandize; it behoves me therefore to say something touching these words, consuetudo and custuma, for the clearing of this scruple. This word consuetudo, in his first and proper signification, doth, I confesse, signifie an usage, or practise of a thing time out of minde. But it is evident by the records in the time of H. 3. and Ed. 1. this word in a more speciall manner was applied to all, or most of the duties belonging to the crowne by reason of trade; as, consuetudo aquæ Thamefis, consuetudo piscis venientis ad vicum pontis London, consuetudo quæ vocatur scavagium, consuetudo quæ vocatur gauge. But yet more specially it was applied to that dutie, which we, following the same rule, because of the greatnesse of the revenue, doe likewise per excellentiam call custome. This may appeare by the pipe roll of 52 Hen. 3. with this title Consuetudo mercandizorum, and by divers other records of Hen. 3. times. The rolls and records of the beginning of Ed. 1. doe likewise prove the same very evidently, inasmuch that not onely that, which in this kinde belongs to the king by the common-law and by ancient prescription, was called consuetudo; but in later time, if any increase were of that dutie, though it came not by prescription, but by grant in parliament, or otherwise, yet it still retained the name consuetudo, which by continuance of time came to be the proper name to that kinde of dutie howsoever it began. And therefore in 3. Ed. 1. you shall finde, that after the old custome of woolls was increased to a demy-marke by act of parliament, yet the word consuetudo was nevertheless still retained, but with an addition; for it was then called nova consuetudo. Nay, though the increase were by the kings absolute authoritie, and upon the matter a meere imposition, yet the king in his commission did alwayes call it consuetudo; as in 16. Ed. 1. the imposition of foure shillings upon a tun of wine is, in the kings commission to collect it, called consuetudo. Nevertheless, I assure myself, the people called it by some worse name, as maletolt or the like.

The severall applications of this word consuetudo to all duties whatsoever belonging to the crowne by reason of trade, is the reason, as I conceive, that the word is used in the plurall number in the statute of Magna Charta, per antiquas & certas consuetudines; that so they might bee secure against all unjust exactions upon merchandizes whatsoever. But, as I have said, the principall scope was to provide against impositions; and by reason also that the word consuetudo was taken as well for impositions as for rightfull customes, therefore, to make all sure, they insert the words antiquas & certas. This word consuetudo in this sense continued till about the twentieth yeere of Ed. 1. after which time I cannot call to minde that I have seene it upon any record. In stead and place thereof came in the word custuma, which I find first in charta mercatoria an. 31. Ed. 1. where the increase of custome by the grant of merchant-strangers is called parva custuma; and that which before was called nova consuetudo, doth now begin to lose that name, and to bee called magna custuma; which termes of magna custuma, intending thereby that increase made by parliament, anno 3. Ed. 1. upon the three staple commodities, woolls, woollfells, and leather; and parva custuma, intending thereby the increase granted by the merchants-strangers, an. 31. Ed. 1. are the termes used at this day by the customers, and by which they distinguish their entries. This word custuma I finde to have been also promiscuously used by E. 1. E. 2. and E. 3. in their commissions, and applied, as well to increase of custome by way of imposition or by acts of parliament of those times, as to ancient custome upon the staple commodities. But regularly none ought to be called custuma, but that which is due upon the staple commodities; and so is it used at this day, except only cloth; for if it bee laid by act of parliament, it is called a subsidie; if without assent of parliament, impos. You see in what sense the words malum tolnetum and the word consuetudo have been used in former times, and are thereby able to judge how they ought to be understood in this present statute, which, as I have said, ought to have the most benign interpretation that the words may beare.

But it hath beene likewise objected, that in this statute there is a speciall clause of exception, which leaveth the king at his liberty to lay what impositions he pleaseth, this statute notwithstanding. And that is the words in the beginning of the statute, All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, shall have their passage, &c. which implies, say they, that if they be prohibited, which rests wholly in the kings power, then they are not to have benefit of this statute touching the freedome from impositions; and they say farther, that the very laying of impositions doth imply a restraint sub modo. Though I purpose to speake more fully in answer of this objection, when I come to shew you the weaknesse of the reasons alledged for impositions, yet I cannot forbear in this place to speake a worde or two in answer thereof, having the statute now before us. Except they be prohibited, they shall have free passage. (saith the statute) without paying evill-toll. This doth imply, say they, that if they be prohibited, they may be compelled to pay impositions. But that cannot be necessarily concluded. It implies indeede somewhat strongly, that they may bee prohibited. The statute of 1 R. 2. cap. 12. inhibiteth the warden of the Fleete to deliver any prisoner out of execution, unlesse it bee by writ or other commandment of the king. It may be as strongly implied out of this statute, that the king may, by his commandment without writ, deliver a prisoner out of execution; but the contrary hath alwayes been held. The same objection is made, and the same answer may be given to another exception in the latter end of this branch, except in the time of war.

I come to the second statute against impositions, which is the statute de Tallagio non concedendo, touching the time of the making of which there is great variety of opinion; for it is not, for ought I could ever learne, found any where upon record. Justice Rastall accounts it to have been made 51 of H. 3. and with him agrees an old manuscript which I have seene. It may well bee; for in one of the statutes you shall finde a pardon to Humfrey earle of Boham earle of Hertford and Essex constable of England, and to Roger Bygott earle of Norfolk and Suffolk marshal of England, who both lived in that time. Thomas of Walsingham in his History of England saith it was made in the 25 yeere of Ed. 1. Hee reciteth the statute de verbo in verbum as it is in our printed bookes; otherwise I should have thought he had meant another statute against impositions made indeede 25 Ed. 1. and found upon the records of that yeere. In our printed statutes at large, it is placed last of all the statutes of E. 1. Though there be some disagreement about the time of the making of this statute, yet they all agree the occasion to be the laying of a great imposition upon wool. The words of Thomas Walsingham; Auxit rex tributum lanæ ad 40s. cum prius ultra dimidiam mercam non daretur. Tota autem communitas sentit se gravatam de vestigali; lana enim Angliæ fere extendit ad medietatem valoris terræ & vestigal ad quintam partem terræ. The custome of woolls, as you perceive, was in those dayes esteemed to bee the first part of the value of the whole land. It followeth in him, that upon complaint the subject at last obtained the statute I nowe speake of, the words of which are, No tallage or ayde shall bee rayed or set by us or our heires in our realm, without the assent and good will of arch-bishops, earles, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land. After these generall words, by way of provision against all manner of burthens whatsoever to bee laid in time to come without assent of parliament, followeth in the next branch (save one) especiall provision for the taking away of the imposition then in demand upon woolls; which latter clause, as it doth cleerely shew the cause of their present grieve to bee the same which our chronicles say it was, so doth it likewise make it evident, what it was which they sought to be secured of for the times to come. Neither are the words themselves so obscure, by reason of the generality of them, but that they also without knowing the occasion of the making of the law doe directly point at impositions; for, though indeede the word tallage be, as I conceive, to be understood only of charges within the land, yet the word ayde extendeth to all charges of what nature soever. Nay, that even impositions themselves have beene called aydes or subsidies, which is all one, is evident by almost all the records of the Exchequer here amongst us, especially by those of Ed. 3. time; in which, wheresoever you finde any mention made by the king, in his commissions, of an imposition raised by him, hee ever calls it subsidium or auxilium. So likewise in the printed statute of 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11. you shall finde, that the imposition by grant of merchants there mentioned is called a subsidie or ayde. This exposition of the word ayde, concurring with the occasion of the making of the statute, doth in my opinion strongly enforce this statute against impositions. And 'tis to be observed, that in this statute there is no saving or exception of the kings ancient right, which, as our chronicles say, was a point principally insisted upon at the making of this law, earnestly pressed by the subject to bee without that clause, and for a long while stood upon by the king, but at last yeelded unto in such sort as you have heard.

The next statute against impositions is 25 Ed. 1. cap. 7. The words are, Forasmuch as the more part of the cominalty hath found themselves sore agrieved with the maletolt of woolls, viz. a toll of 40s. for every sack of wool, and have made petition to bee released of the same, wee at their requests have cleerly released it, and have granted for us and our heires, that wee shall take no such things, without their common assent and good will, saving to us and our heires the custome of woolls, skins and leather granted before by the cominalty aforesaid. I might, in enforcing this statute, rely upon a rule of law for the exposition of statutes of this nature, Omnis impositio est odiosa, ideo stricta contra impositiones, & large ad favorem gravatorum interpretanda est lex contra impositiones data. But there shall not need any such favourable construction; for the words are in themselves very cleere. The law consisteth of three parts. The first is the kings grant of a petition made by the commons for the releasing of an imposition of 40s. upon a sack of wool, then in demand. When the present grief was ended, the next care was to prevent the like mischief in all times to come. It therefore followes, And wee have granted for us and our heires, that we shall take no such thing without their common assent, which is the second part of the law. The saving in the end is the third part.

Against this general provision two objections have beene made. First, that the words no such things are to be understood only of the burthenfomnesse and excesse of impositions, and not otherwise. No such things, that is, say they, no such grievous impositions as this present imposition is. It had beene a poore security for times to come, to have left it to interpretation, whether or no impositions, which might happen to be laid in after ages, be as grievous as the imposition complained of in this time, by comparing one with the other. 'Tis so uncertain a computation, as no man, say farther, that the very laying of impositions doth imply a restraint sub modo. Though I purpose to speake more fully in answer of this objection, when I come to shew you the weaknesse of the reasons alledged for impositions, yet I cannot forbear in this place to speake a worde or two in answer thereof, having the statute now before us. Except they

The first objection, that this statute is only against the excesse of the impositions then laid, and not against the right of imposing, answered.

when hee thinks thoroughly of it, can imagine, that men, worthy to sit at the making of laws, should suffer such a thing to passe them. Who can certainly say, whether our impositions bee more or lesse grievous then the rate of 40s. upon a sack of wool? Beside, how easily had this lawe beene to have beene eluded by abating only 12d. or but 1d. in the next imposition? For, if it be but a penny lesse, it is no such imposition, for the burden. Therefore it must needes bee expounded of the quality and very nature of the thing complained of, and not of the quantity. No such thing, that is, no such thing as this is, that is to say, an imposition. But that, which will cleere this objection, is a proclamation made the very next year after the making of this act, in which the king reciting this act, instead of these words, wee will take no such thing, useth these words, nullam aliam custumam sine communi consensu capiemus, not only no such, but no other. By which you may see, that the words were then interpreted in that sence, in which I doe now interpret them.

But admitting, say they, that it bee so to bee expounded that the king will lay no other imposition without assent in parliament, that is to be understood, say they, no other imposition upon wools, and not otherwise; which is their second objection. It were a very strict construction for a statute of so beneficiall an intent as this is so to restraîne it; if there were no other words in the statute that did enlarge the exposition. But by the words following it is most evident, that the scope of this law is more liberrall then so; and that the kings intent was for ever to secure his subjects, against all charges of this nature, I meane impositions, not upon wools only, but upon any other merchandise whatsoever, which I collect from laying all the parts of the law together.—The petition for present ease is to be releafed onely of the maletolt of foure shillings upon a sack of wool, which is yielded to. The security for the time to come is, we will take no such thing. The saving, which followeth that, is, saving the custome of wools, woollfells, and leather. I observe, the saving extends not to wools alone, as the petition doth, but also to woollfells and leather, by expresse name; by which it is evident, that the securitie for the time to come is of a larger extent than to stretch onely to wools, as hath been objected. For else, to what end should woollfells and leather be excepted in the saving, if they had not been contained in the generall words, no such thing? An exception cannot be but of a thing contained in former words. If therefore the grant would have extended to woollfells, if they had not been specially excepted, then do I conclude by the same reason, that it doth extend to all other merchandizes not excepted; for the words are generall.

And so I leave this law cleared of all objections, and very full against impositions.

The next statute made against them is 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. By the first part of which law you may perceive, that, whereas the commons had prayed the king not to take of wools, woollfells, leather, tyn, or lead, any more than the ancient custome, the king prayed them to grant him forty shillings upon a sack of wooll for a yeer and a halfe, which they granted. Whereupon the king, by way of retribution, and in answere of their petition, as touching the wooll causeth it to be enacted for their security in time to come, that neither he nor his heires would demand, assesse, nor take more custome of a sack of wooll than fixe shillings eight pence: and so likewise upon wools and leather, no more than the ancient custome, without assent of parliament. All this while there is no answere given touching the tyn and lead mentioned in the petition; upon which, as it appeares, the king had also laid impositions. But there doe follow certain generall words, by which, not onely tyn and lead, but all other commodities whatsoever are freed from impositions. The words are, the king promised in the presence of his earles, barons, and others of his parliament, no more to charge, set, or assesse upon the custome, but in manner aforesaid. Except these words doe extend to lead and tyn, to free them from impositions for times to come, as well as wools woollfells and leather are freed by the former speciall words, their petition touching tyn and lead is no way answered. And if they doe extend to tyn and lead, by reason of the generality of the words, they doe by the same reason extend to all commodities; for what more liberrall words can there be than these; that the king will not charge, set, or assesse upon the custome? These words, the custome, being words indefinite, are, you know, equivalent to an universall, according to the rule, indefinitum aequipollet universali. And although the king doe but promise, yet I doubt not but in this case his promise is a law. And it is worth the observing, that the lords doe in very extraordinary and unusuall manner solemnly undertake, as much as in them lyeth, that they shall procure the king to hold the same, and that they shall in no wise assent to the contrary, if it be not by the assent of the prelates, earles, barons, and commons, and that in full parliament; and for the greater surety, and to give cause to eschew all counsell to the contrary of this ordinance, the prelates have promised to give sentence upon them that counsell against the same in any point; which are the very words of the statute in print.

The statute of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. was yielded unto by the king, upon a petition exhibited the parliament before, both by the lords and the commons, praying that a law might be made against impositions, as may appeare by the records of the 13. yeere of Ed. 3. at which time they likewise prayed, that the king would be pleased to grant them a charter to the same effect, to be inrolled in parliament. The statute you have heard. The charter followeth in our printed bookes immediately after the statute, where the king, in the preamble thereof, reciting the great gift that he had given him at the same parliament, that is to say, the 9th sheepe, 9th sheep, and 9th lamb throughout the kingdom, which indeed, was a very extraordinary great gift, (and therefore his grant, in regard thereof, is to be intended so much more beneficially) doth in lieu thereof, for him and his heires, grant to his subjects in these words: From henceforth they shall not be charged, nor grieved, to make any ayde, or to susteine charge, if it be not by the common assent of the prelates, earles, barons and other great men, and the commons of our said realme of England, and that in parliament. It hath been objected, that these words, ayde and charge, are to be understood of charges within the land, such as are taxes and tallages, and not of impositions upon merchandizes. And this is the only objection made, or indeed can be made against this statute; for the cleering of which, I can say no more then already I have proved by matter of record for the opening of the fence of this statute, viz. that this charter and the last statute were made upon a petition exhibited in parliament, for a law and charter to be made against impositions upon merchandizes. And therefore that conjecture of theirs, that it should extend only to taxes, and not to impositions, cannot but fall to the ground; especially since there is not in the petition, any mention at all of taxes or tallages, or of any other charge or aide but impositions onely, then which there cannot almost be a clearer proof, then that this law being made upon this petition, is to be expounded against impositions. Which, if this petition had not been extant, would with no lesse cleernesse have been proved, by considering the mischief at the time of the making of this law, which was not tallage or taxes, but those heavey impositions of foure pound and five pound upon a sack of wool, by way of dispensation with the statute of 11 E. 3. cap. 1. of which I have formerly made mention. So as this statute, being made in the first intention against dispensations for money with a penall law, though the occasion were particular, yet, the words being generall, I hold, that with reason it may be extended against all dispensations, with penall lawes for money. In particular, I hold, that the raising of money, by dispensations with the statutes against ale-houses, is, if not by the common law, yet by the force of this law, unlawfull; for certainly, quod prohibitum est una via, non debet alia permitti.

As for the words ayde and charge, I have already proved, that it was a terme by which impositions were commonly called in those times. That they were also called charges is evident by very many records of those times, where complaint is made against them, as 21 Ed. 3. numb. 11. Les commons prient que la charge de 21s. sur sack de lane soit ouste, 21 Ed. 3. numb. 16. 'The commons pray that no charge be set upon them without assent of parliament.' The kings answere is, if any imposition be levied unduely it shall bee taken away. Of this kinde there are very many presidents, so as if the precedent petition had not assured us of the scope of this lawe as it doth, the very words themselves, rightly understood, would have made it cleere.

In the same charter there is another clause as beneficiall as this, to this effect, all merchants denizens and forreins, except those which be of our enmitie, may without let safely come into the realm of England with their goods and merchandizes, and safely tarry, and safely returne, paying the customes, subsidies and other profits reasonably thereof due. The objection to this clause is very obvious, for what, say they, can these words, other profits reasonably due, signifie other than impositions; for, by the words going before, custome and subsidies are expressly named, and there is, say they, no other third profit upon merchandize but impositions, and indeed this statute they themselves have vouched in maintenance of impositions. To this objection it might serve for a full answer, that there are other duties then customes and subsidies due upon the landing of wares; for example wharfage, cranage, scavage, and such like, the which with more probability I may conjecture to be intended by these words, other duties, then they can conjecture it to bee meant of impositions. Sed in planis non opus est conjecturis. The best expositors of this act are those that lived in the same times, and they doe cleerely expound this clause to be made against impositions, as may appeare by the record of 21 E. 3. no. 29. for you shall there find a petition exhibited in parliament by the commons to bee relieved touching an imposition upon wools, alledging for a reason of their petition, that every man ought freely to passe, paying the ancient custome as it was ordained by the kings charter. This petition against impositions was exhibited by the whole parliament, within six yeeres after the making of the charter, as may appeare by comparing the times; and if they had not then thought, that impositions had been meant to have beene provided against by this charter, they would not certainly have made such a speciall reference thereunto.

In discovering the weakenesse of the reasons alledged in maintenance of impositions, I shall not greatly neede to say any thing more then hath been said; because the state of the question hath beene already so thoroughly opened unto you, that whatsoever can, with any colour of reason, be said for impositions, may receive an answer out of that which hath beene spoken against them. Nevertheless, I will in a few words recall to your memories their reasons; and in as few apply the answers to them, with some additions of mine owne, that, by laying both together in your view at one time, the weakenesse of the one and strength of the other may the better appeare unto you.

It hath beene said, that the old custome of a demi-marke upon a sack of wool must have his beginning, either by the kings absolute power, or by a legall assent of the people, which can bee no where but in parliament, and cannot but appeare of record; but because no such assent can be showne, therefore they conclude, that it began by the kings absolute power, and inferre that the same power remains still. The substance of this argument is found in my lord Dyer in the place cyted by me. It was much enforced in the Exchequer. But as touching the particular of the old custome of a demi-marke upon a sack, and the other old custome upon fells and leather, it is now no longer urged; because it appeares expressly by divers records of 3 E. 1. in the Tower, that it was granted per les grandes et al prier des comons et de les merchans de tout Engleterre, and by a record of 12 E. 1.

An objection that the Stat. of 14 Ed. 3. an. 21, extendeth only to impositions within the land and not to imposition upon merchandizes is answered.

The word Charge.

Answers to the reasons urged in maintenance of impositions.

The first argument, that because it cannot appear that the ancient customes were set by parliament, therefore they were imposed by the king, is answered.

25 E. 1. cap. 7. stat. printed, per communitatem regni nostri Angliæ, which concures also with the statute of 25 E. 1. cap. 7. in print: 'saving to us and our heires the customes of woolls, skins and leather granted heretofore by the communitie aforesaid.' The patten roll of 3 E. 1. which hath these words, cum prelati magnates ac tota comunitas mercatorum regni nostri nuper nobis concesserunt quandam novam consuetudinem, viz. de quolibet sacco lane 6s. 8d. &c. being something obscure, are by the concurrence of all those other records so cleerly expounded, as there cannot be, neither now is there, any question made, but that the custome of a demy-marke, and the other old customes, which by my lord Dyer, and by all those who argued for or against impositions in the Exchequer, was held to be due by the common-lawe, was by grant in parliament. Nevertheless the strength of the argument they still retaine. Though the demy-mark and those old customes upon the staple commodities were by act of parliament; yet, say they, before that increase by parliament the king had custome, and no doubt a some certaine. Otherwise could not this increase be called nova consuetudo. Besides, say they, the custome reduced to a certainty by 3 E. 1. is only upon three commodities, wool, skins, and leather. There are many other commodities, which did likewise pay custome. How began that custome, say they, if not by the kings absolute power? And when was that power taken away? I answer, admit it were by the kings absolute power, yet that the king hath cleerly discharged himself of that power by act of parliament, I hope I have cleerly proved. But this question, how began the first customs, is best answered by another question, how began the fine for purchase of originall writs, the fine pro licentia concordandi, the certainty of prisage? Nay, who reduced it first to certaintie, that the tryall of issues should be by twelve jurors, no more nor no lesse; that the full age of a man should be accounted twenty-one yeeres; of a woman fourteene, twelve yeeres her age of consent, and nine yeeres capable to be endowed; a yeere and a day given to sue an appeale; the like limitation of a yeere and day in very many other cases? In effect, who reduced all the known grounds of the common-law to that certainty that now they are? Because wee cannot tell how or when they began, shall wee therefore conclude, that they began by the kings absolute power, and inferre, that by the same reason, they may be changed at his pleasure? If the king may increase his fines upon the purchase of originall writs (which by the same reason hee may doe, that he may doe his custome, nay, hee hath more colour for this then for that, because there is no statute against this) hee might easily raise that revenue to the value of his customes. But no man can, nor will I hope offer to mainteine it to be lawfull. You see the weakenesse and the dangerous consequence of this argument, by comparing it to other cases of like nature. To say the truth, all these things began no man can say certainly when or how, but by a tacit consent of king and people, and the long approbation of time beyond the memory of any man, and yet no man can directly affirm but that most of them might begin by act of parliament, though now there be no records extant of such ancient parliaments. The first parliament was not kept 9 H. 3. though it be the first in our bookes. If we will give credit to other records, and to our best chroniclers, we shall heare and reade of divers parliaments in the reigne of king John, and of his predecessor Ric. 1. and in the reign of H. 2. of two famous parliaments, one at Clarendon in Wilshire, the other at Ged-ington in Northamptonshire. And although our chroniclers say, that the first parliament kept in this realm was held 19 Aprilis, 16 H. 1. yet I am of opinion, that William the Conqueror held parliaments; for what can be else understood by these words, per commune consilium totius regni nostri stabilitum fuit, which I finde in Mr. Lamberts collection of the ancient lawes of England, in the beginning of the lawes of William the Conqueror? Many of the statutes of E. 1. have no other words. Nay, long before him, in the yeere of our Lord 712. in the time of Inas king of the West-Saxons, I assure my self there were parliaments held, and that of the three estates, as at this day; as may appeare by these words in the beginning of the lawes of king Inas, in Mr. Lambert, Suasi & instituto episcoporum nostrorum omnium, senatorum nostrorum, & natu majorum populi nostri in frequentia magna: and more plainly in the conclusion of some other of his lawes; hoc factum fuit per commune consilium & assensum procerum, comitum, & omnium sapientium seniorum, & populorum totius regni, & per preceptum regis Inas, which are the same in Latine which ours is in English, by the king, the lords spirituall and temporall, and the commons. Why might not the custome upon woolls be first granted at one of these parliaments, as well as to have it first begun by the kings absolute power? There is no more probability of the one than the other. Because most of the ancient records were burnt in H. 2. time, when the Exchequer was burnt, shall we conclude therefore that there were never any such? You see the weaknes of this argument in all the points thereof. I leave it, and passe to another.

The second argument, that the king may totally restrain the importing and exporting of merchandizes, therefore he may do it sub modo by laying an imposition, answered.

The king may, say they, restrain the passage of merchants at his pleasure, which they prove by divers records; 2 E. 1. m. 18. Ro. Par. 2. E. 1. m. 17. Ro. fin. 31. E. 1. n. 44. Ro. Pat. 17 H. 6. Ro. Cla. in dorso. Upon which they inferre, that if he may restraine a merchant that he shall not passe at all, he may much more so restraine him that he shall not passe except he pay a certaine sum of money: for this, say they, is lesse than totally to restraine him; and cui licet quod majus, licet etiam quod minus. Of this argument my lord Dyer gave light in his case of impositions, 1 Eliz. and this hath been diversly enforced by all that have argued for impositions. In answer of which, I will consider, how farre the king may restrain the passage of merchants; and then will examine the consequence of the argument.

For my part, I think the king cannot restrain the passage of merchants, but for some speciall cause; wherein to define certainly and resolutely, to say for what causes he may, and for what not, I will not undertake. Onely let me inform you, that there is not one of these presidents vouched by them to prove the kings power to restraine, but they are upon speciall reasons; as by reason of enmity with such a nation from whence they are restrained, or because such a commodity may not be spared within the kingdome. Besides, they are not restraints from all places, and of all manner of merchandizes, but from certain places onely, and for certain sorts of merchandizes. And for my part I thinke that restraints in all these cases, and of like nature, are by the common-law left to the kings absolute power; for if it were otherwise, it should be in the power of a merchant for a little private lucre to enrich the kings enemies, or to furnish them with munition to be employed against the state, or utterly to ruine the common-wealth, by carrying out a commodity which may not be spared, or by bringing in of some that may be hurtfull. Nay, which is more, such may be the occasion, that the king may, I doubt not, stop the passages of all merchants from all places for a short time, as upon the death of the late queen it was put in practise, to prevent intelligence. There may likewise be such necessary use of their ships, as the want of them upon some sodaine attempts may be a cause of the overthrow of the whole state. In such cases as these, if the common-law did not give the king leave to restraine their passage by his absolute power, it were very improvident in the highest points, which cannot be imagined of so wise a law. And yet the kings of this realme have alwayes been sparing in the practise of their absolute power in this point; for there are little lesse then 30. acts of parliament, touching the opening and shutting up of the passage of merchants, most of which, as I conceive, were made rather for the increase of punishment, then for want of power in the king; for the breach of a restraint by absolute commandment is punishable, as all other contempts, onely by fine and imprisonment, and not by forfeiture of the merchandizes, as in the president of the wines, an. 5. of queene Mary, vouched by me, and in some of those old presidents. If it be otherwise, I must confesse I know not the reason of the difference of this from other contempts. You see, that I have yeilded to their proposition, that the king may by his absolute power restraine the passage of merchants, and have therein granted more then their presidents prove. But is the consequence good, that because the king may restraine, therefore he may impose upon such as passe? First I denie, that in our case there is any restraint at all, as there was in the case of the French wines, by queen Mary, by her proclamation going before the imposition. For proove of which, I referre you to the kings letters patents prefixed before the last book of rates; by which instrument, the impositions now complained of were altogether raised. You shall finde it no other then a declaration of the kings pleasure so to have it, and a course prescribed for levying of it. But admitting, that the very laying of an imposition did imple a restraint, yet I denie the consequence, because the king may restrain totally, that therefore he may restraine for a time, or from certaine places, or certaine commodities, or certaine merchants; this indeed is a good argument, a majori ad minus. But because he may restraine totally, therefore, that he may give passage for money, is no good consequence; for in our case, there is no restraint at all, but it is rather a passage for money. If there be just occasion of restraint, the law giveth the king power to restraine. But when merchants may without hurt to the state have passage, as in our case, to enforce them to pay for that passage is in my opinion as unlawfull, as to enforce any man whatsoever to pay for doing that which he may lawfully doe. Merchants have, as I may say, as good inheritance in their trade, as any man in his lands; and when it may stand with the good of the state, that they may passe, they ought to passe as freely without charge imposed on them, as any man ought to hold his inheritance, or any artificer or other tradesman ought to exercise their lawfull trades and means of living, free from burdens to be laid on by the kings absolute power. If all others should be free, and onely merchants, who adventure their persons and estates in so many dangers, to bring us from farre places such things, as without which we cannot subsist, and to return us profit for our superfluities, should be subject to involuntarie burthens, their estate were of all other mens most unhappy and slavish, which, of all other trades, is indeed the noblest, and most worthy to be cherished.

And here by the way I note, that, in all other nations of the world, where the merchant is subject to impositions at the kings pleasure, the landlord, the farmer, the artificer, the very plowman, and all others, are in like sort subject to taxes and burdens, when the king pleaseth. The merchant is not the man alone that is subject to taxes, and all other men free. If, in the frame of our common-wealth, it were thought fit to free all other trades and professions from taxes, much more ought it to be thought reasonable, that our merchants should be free, and by all means possible incouraged in their trade; for our case is not as it is with other nations of the Continent. We are islanders, and divided by the sea from all the world, and in that respect have such use of merchants, as we cannot live without them. If therefore any should be free amongst us, it should be the merchant; and not the quite contrary, onely the merchant charged, and all others free. Plato in his 8. book de Rep. is of opinion, that the merchant, for his incouragement to trade, should be free from all custome whatsoever. We seek only to be free of involuntary impositions. But to return to the argument of restraint, from whence I am a little digressed. If it be a good argument, that because the king may restraine in toto, he may restraine in tanto; it will not be denied unto me, for it followeth necessarily, that in cases where he cannot restraine in toto, he cannot restraine in tanto. But there is no man that will say, that he may restraine the entrance and passage of all merchants, to and from all the parts of the world whatsoever, without any limitation of time, but the restraint to endure for ever, and for all kinds of merchandizes whatsoever, of most necessary and common use, to be brought into, or carried out of the realme. There is no man I suppose will say, that the law hath given the king power to make so unreasonable a restraint as this; for it were to give him a power to destroy merchandize, and consequently to ruine the common-wealth. Beside, it were against the law of nations, and of reason itself. It cannot be imagined, that any wise law in the world should allow it. But if our impositions, as it is said, doe doe imple a restraint, and that a restraint be always the fore-runner of all impositions, then such an unreasonable restraint, as I have spoken of, must needs be presupposed to have been the ground or fore-runner of our present imposition. For in our impositions, are not all the merchandizes of necessary and common use charged? Are not all the merchants denizens and strangers, importing from any part, or exporting to any part of the world, subject to the charge? Is there any limitation of time, but to endure for ever? If I say such a restraint had been unlawfull, which I suppose no man will denie, then whatsoever implieth such a restraint, which our impositions doe, is likewise unlawfull. But the ill consequence of this their argument drawne from the kings power of restraint, will best appeare by comparing it to other cases.

I little doubt, but the king upon some occasion may lawfully restraine the passage of all men through the gates of London; as for the purpose, when the citie shall be besieged, or in the time of an extreme plague. Nay is it not by authoritie derived onely from him, that the gates are shut every night? Doth it follow therefore, that because he may doe it upon some extraordinary occasion, or at some time, that he may shut up the passage for ever; or that presupposing such a restraint by his absolute power, he may lay an imposition upon every burthen of any thing brought in, or carried out, as the duke of Florence and many other states in Italy and Germany doe, or upon every man by the poll, that shall passe thro' the gates? You see the weaknesse and danger of the consequence of this argument, and how it tends to justifie impositions within the land. And so I leave it, and proceed to the next.

The third argument, that the ports are the kings, and that he may open them and shut them upon what conditions he pleaseth, answered.

1. That the position, that all the ports are the kings, is not generally true; for subjects may also be owners of ports, as may appeare by the patent roll of 3. E. 1. M. 1. parl. where you shall finde, that king Ed. 1. granted to the lords of port townes the forfeitures granted to him by parliament, for not duly paying the new custome of the demy-marke within every severall port of theirs, where the merchandizes should happen to be imported or exported. But admitting the truth of the position, yet is the consequence as weake and dangerous, as of any of the rest of their arguments. For are not all the gates of cities and townes, and all the streets and highways in England the kings, and as much subject to be open or shut at his pleasure, as the ports are? Nay, whensoever we speak of the highway in any law businesse, we call it via regia, the kings highway; and the king in his commissions, speaking of London, or any other citie, calls it civitas nostra London, or civitas nostra Exon. Doth it follow therefore, that the king may lay impositions upon every man, or upon all commodities that shall passe through any of these places? Nay the gates of the kings owne house, for the purpose his pallace of Westminster, are his in a farre neerer degree then any of these. May he therefore by his proclamation impose upon every man that shall passe in or out at Westminster-hall doore a summe of money? Doubtlesse he may not; because the king is a person publike, and his subjects ought to have access to him, as to the fountaine of justice, and to the courts of justice sitting by his authoritie. I make little doubt, but his majestie may upon just occasion cause any of these passages to be shut, as he may also the passage at the havens. But when the passage may without danger to the state be open, and that the subjects may passe, his majestie may not then exact money for their passage; for the law hath given the king power over these things, for the good of the common-wealth, and not thereby to charge and burden the subject. If the king may not exact money for passage in and out of his court gates, because of the publike-nesse of his person; nor for passage through the gates of cities; much lesse may he for passage out at the ports, which are the great gates of the kingdom, and which the subject ought as freely to enjoy, as the ayre or the water.

The fourth argument, that the king is bound at his owne charge, to protect merchants; and the more it is necessary it should be in his power to lay moderate impositions upon merchandizes for raising of money to defray his charge, answered.

Another of their arguments is this. The king is bound to protect merchants from spoile by the enemy; he ought to fortifie the havens, that their ships may there abide in safety; he ought, if occasion be, to send ambassadors to forreign princes, to negotiate for them; and many the like charges is the king by the law to undergoe for the protection of his merchants. It is reason, therefore, that his expence be defraied out of the profit made by merchants; and consequently, that he may impose upon merchandize a moderate charge, thereby to repay himself.

The consequence of this argument is thus farre true. The law expects, that the king should protect merchants. Therefore it alloweth him out of merchandize a revenue for the maintenance of his charge, which is the old custome due, as at first I said, by the common-law. But it is no good consequence, that therefore he may take what he list, no more then he may at his pleasure increase that old revenue, which the law giveth him for protecting of subjects in their suits, or for protecting wards, &c.

Another argument of theirs is this. All other princes of the world may impose upon merchandize at their pleasure; and so may make our merchandizes lesse vendible with them, by laying an imposition upon them, to be paid by us, when they are brought into their territories, whereby their owne commodities of the same nature may be sold more to the gaine of their merchants, and our merchant impoverished, or driven from his trade. They may also lay impositions upon our merchants fetching commodities from thence, and leave their owne merchants free from any imposition in the same case; by which their merchants shall reape all the profit by that commodity, in affording it better cheape to us here, then we can fetch it, and consequently our merchants shall be undone. Many the like cases have been put to prove, that if the king of England may not impose, as other princes may, they shall be able at their pleasure to destroy our trading. This I conceive was the same as now it is, during all that time from Ed. 3. till queen Mary; and doubtlesse it could not but sometimes, during that long space, so fall out, that forreine princes did put their power in practise to our prejudice, and yet we heare not of any imposition laid by any of our kings by their absolute power; which may give any man assurance, that they tooke some other course to meet with the inconvenience; and indeed the meanes are divers, which these our kings used to prevent it.

First, they were carefull in all their leagues and treaties with forrain princes, especially to provide for it; as may appeare by the records of the ancient leagues. Neither is there any league of late time, that hath not had an article for provision in this point; which leagues for the most part are upon oath on both parts. And yet, for further securitie, our kings have always had ambassadors resident in the courts of such forrain princes, to put them in minde of their leagues, if upon any occasion our merchants have in that case happened to be never so little wronged by them; and if upon complaint of the ambassador, our merchants have not found redresse, our kings have held the league as broken, and denounced warre, or seised all the goods of the same princes subjects within England; and I dare say there have been more warres undertaken by our princes against forrain nations onely for this cause, then for any one other cause whatsoever.

Besides, our kings have in this case sometimes made use of that their prerogative of restraint, either by prohibiting our merchants from carrying our commodities into those parts, where they are charged with impositions, that so by the want of our commodities, foraine princes might be enforced to abate their impositions laid upon them; or by restraining the merchants of foraine princes to import or export commodities from hence; by which meanes foraine princes have been compelled to deale favourably with our merchants for the good of their owne subjects. All these are lawfull and ordinary means to prevent or redresse the inconvenience which may grow by the impositions of other princes. If all these ordinary means should happen to faile, which can hardly so fall out, and that the laying of impositions be indeed the only means that is left to redresse the inconvenience, why should not that be done by act of parliament as well in these times, as it was in 7 Hen. 7. c. 7. to take downe the imposition of foure ducates upon a but of malmsey, imposed by the Venetians, and as it was done by queen Eliz. the 19 yeere of her reigne, to prevent the laying of impositions by foraine princes upon salt-fish, as may appeare by the printed statutes of 19 Eliz. cap. 10? But, as I have said, the providence of the prince and ordinary power of restraint may very well meet with the inconvenience.

These are the chiefe reasons made in maintenance of impositions. The weaknesse of them, and their dangerous consequence, you cannot but perceive; for, by the same reasons, taxes within the land may be as well proved to be lawfull. On the contrary part, you have heard the reasons against impositions fortified by many records and statutes in the point. So as I conclude, that impositions, neither in the time of warre, or other the greatest necessitie or occasion that may be, much lesse in the time of peace, neither upon foraine nor inland commodities of whatsoever nature, be they never so superfluous or unnecessary, neither upon merchants strangers nor denizens, may be laid by the kings absolute power, without assent of parliament, be it for never so short a time, much lesse to endure for ever, as ours. Though this be now my opinion, yet am not I so obstinate therein, but if yet I heare better reason, I will once againe change my minde. In the meane while, you see I had reason to alter my first opinion, as being grounded upon very weak reasons, as now they appeare unto me. And so I suppose they doe also unto you.

The fifth argument, that all foraine princes have power to impose, and if our king had not the like it might be very inconvenient to this state, answered.

Mr. Yelverton's argument against impositions by the crown. (a)

The question is, Whether the king, without assent of parliament, may set impositions upon the wares and goods of merchants exported, and imported, out of, and into this realme.

THREE things have been debated in this parliament, that have much concerned the right of our whole nation, of which every one of them hath exceeded the other by a gradation in weight and moment.

The first was the change of our name, which was a point of honour, wherein we shewed our selves not willing to leave that name, by which our ancestors made our nation famous; yet have we lost it, saving onely in those cases, where our ancient and faithfull protector; the common-law doth retaine it.

The second was the union, a question of greater moment; for that concerned the freehold of our whole nation; not in so high a point as having, or not having, but in point of division and participation, that is, whether we should enjoy the benefits and liberties of the kingdome our selves onely, as we and our ancestors have done, or admit our neighbour nation to have equall right in them, and so make our own part the less, by how much the greater number should be among whom the division was to be made. This was adjudged against us both legally and solemnly, and therefore in that we rest, hoping of that effect of this judgement which we read of in the poet, Tros Tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine habetur.

The third is the question now in hand, which exceedeth the other two in importance and consequence, concerning the whole kingdome; for it is a question of our very essence; not what we shall be called, nor how we shall divide that we have, but whether we shall have any thing or nothing: for if there be a right in the king to alter the property of that which is ours without our consent, we are but tenants at his will of that which we have. If it be in the king and parliament, then have we propertie, and are tenants at our own will: for that which is done in parliament, is done by all our wills and consents. And this is the very state of the question which is proposed, that is, whether the king may impose without consent of parliament.

Impositions are of two natures, forreine and intestine.

Intestine be those which are raised within our land in the commerce and dealing that is at home within our selves, and may aswell for that reason be so called, as for that vescuntur intestinis reipublicæ, they are fed and nourished by the consuming and waisting of the entrails of the common-wealth. Against these I need not to speake; for the kings learned councill have with great honour and conscience in full councill acknowledged them to be against the law.

Therefore I will apply my self to speak of impositions forreine, being the single question now in hand, and maintained on the kings behalfe with great art and eloquence.

The inconvenience of these impositions to the common-wealth, that is, how hurtfull they are to the merchants, in impoverishing them in their estates; to the king in the increasing of his revenues by decay of traffique; and to the whole people in making all commodities excessive deare, is confessed by all, and therefore need no debate. The point of right is now only in question, and of that I will speak with conscience and integrity, rather desirous that the truth may be knowne, and right be done, than that the opinion of my self or any other may prevaile.

The occasion of this question was given by the book of rates lately set out, affronted with the copy of letters patents, dated July 28. 6th Jac. In which book, besides the rates, is set down every kind of merchandise, exported and imported, for the true answering of subsidy to the king, according to the statute of tonnage and poundage.

In the first yeare of his reigne there is an addition of impositions upon all those kind of wares, which within the book are expressed, and the rate of the imposition as high and in some cases higher than the rate of the subsidy: and this declared to be by authority of those letters patents. Hereupon considering with my selfe, that heretofore the setting on of one only imposition without assent of parliament, upon some one kinde of merchandise, and that for a small time, and upon urgent necessity of actual war, did so affect our whole nation, and especially the great councill of the parliament, being the representative body of the whole common-wealth, that neither the sun did shine, nor the rivers run their courses until it was taken off by the publick judgment of the whole state: I thought it concerned me, and other members of that councill, that were no less trusted for our countrey than those in former times, and have their actions to guide and direct us, to have the same care they had in preserving the rights and liberties of the people, having now more cause then they had, for that the impositions now set on without assent of parliament, are not upon one or two speciall kinds of goods, but almost indefinite upon all, and do extend to the number of many hundreds, as appeareth by that printed book of rates, and are set in charge upon the whole kingdome as an inheritance to continue to the king, his heires and successors for ever; which limitation of estate in matter of impositions was never heard of, nor read of before, as I conceive.

The inducements expressed in these letters patents are much upon point of state, and with reference to the rights and practice of forraigne princes. For this I will not take upon me to enter into the consideration of such great mysteries of policie and government, but will only put you in minde of that I observe out of Tit. Livius the Roman historiographer. Omne divini humanique moris memoriam abolemus, cum nova peregrinque patriis & prisca preferimus. Tit. Liv. 1. 3.

To that which hath been spoken for the kings prerogative, I will give answer to so much of it as I may conveniently in my passage through this debate: wherein I will principally endeavour to give satisfaction to such new objections as were made by the worthie and learned counsellor of the king, that spake last in maintenance of his majesties prerogative.

The case in termes is this. The king by his letters patents before recited, hath ordained, willed, and commanded, that these new impositions, contained in that book of rates, shall be for ever hereafter payd unto him his heires and successors, upon paine of his displeasure. Hereupon the question ariseth, whether by this edict and ordinance so made by the king himselfe; by his letters patents of his own will and power absolute, without assent of parliament, he be so lawfully intituled to that he doth impose, as that thereby he doth alter the property of his subjects goods, and is enabled to recover these impositions by course of law.

I think he cannot; and I ground my opinion upon these foure reasons.

1. It is against the naturall frame and constitution of the policie of this

(a) By an order of the commons licencing the publication, this argument appears to have been first printed in 1641. But it is here extracted from an edition of 1638.—The title runs thus: 'The Rights of the People concerning Impositions, stated in a learned Argument; with a Remonstrance presented to the Kings most excellent Majesty, by the honourable House of Commons, in the Parliament, An. Dom. 1610. Armag. Regis Jac. 7. By a late eminent Judge of this Nation.'—The following address to the reader was prefixed. 'To the courteous reader. This excellent treatise of the no less worthy author, happily falling into my hands, I instantly thought it my duty to make that publick, which had given so much useful satisfaction to many learned, and judicious, in private; remembering that antient adage, bonum quod communius, et præstantius.

I hope it is needles to commend either the reverend author deceased, the treatise, its use, or stile; since the authority by which it is published, is a sufficient argument of their known worth.

If thou kindly accept of his good meaning, whose onely aim in the publishing hereof was the common good, it will be an encouragement to him (and others) to present to thy view, what may hereafter fall into his hands worthy thy further perusal.

The address to the reader was preceded with the following remonstrance, which was made to king James by the house of commons 24. May 1610.

A remonstrance delivered to his majesty in writing, after the inhibition given by him to the commons house of parliament, aswell by word of mouth, as by letters, not to proceed in the examining his right to impose without assent of parliament.

To the kings most excellent majesty.

Most gracious sovereign,

Whereas we your majesties most humble subjects, the commons assembled in parliament, have received first by message, and since by speech from your majesty, a command of restraint from debating in parliament your majesties right of imposing upon your subjects goods exported, or imported out of, or into this realm; yet allowing us to examine the grievance of these impositions in regard of quantity, time, and other circumstances of disproportion thereto incident: we your said humble subjects nothing doubting but that your majesty had no intent by that command to infringe the antient and fundamental right of the liberty of parliament in point of exact discussing of all matters concerning them, and their possessions, goods, and rights whatsoever, which yet we cannot but conceive to be done in effect by this command, do with all humble duty make this remonstrance unto your majesty.

First, we hold it an antient, general and undoubted right of parliament, to debate freely all matters which do properly concern the subject, and his right or estate; which freedom of debate being once fore-closed, the essence of the liberty of parliament is withal dissolved.

And whereas in this case the subjects right on the one side, and your majesties prerogatives on the other, cannot possibly be severed in debate of either: we alledge, that your majesties prerogatives of that kinde concerning directly the subjects right and interest, are daily handled and discussed in all courts at Westminster, and have been ever freely debated upon all fit occasions, both in this and all other former parliaments, without restraint; which being forbidden, it is impossible for the subject, either to know, or to maintain his right and propriety to his own lands and goods, though never so just and manifest.

It may further please your most excellent majesty to understand, that we have no minde to impugn, but a desire to inform our selves of your highness prerogative in that point, which (if ever) is now most necessary to be known; and though it were to no other purpose, yet to satisfy the generality of your majesties subjects, who, finding themselves much grieved by these new impositions, do languish in much sorrow and discomfort.

These reasons, dread sovereign, being the proper reasons of parliament, do plead for the upholding of this our antient right and liberty. Howbeit seeing it hath pleased your majesty to insist upon that judgment in the Exchequer, as being direction sufficient for us without further examination: upon great desire of leaving your majesty unsatisfied in no one point of one of our intents and proceedings, we profess touching that judgement, that we neither do nor will take upon us to reverse it; but our desire is to know the reasons whereupon the same was grounded; and the rather, for that a general conceit is had, that the reasons of that judgement may be extended much further, even to the utter ruine of the antient liberty of this kingdom, and of your subjects right of propriety to their goods and lands.

Then for the judgement it self, being the first and last that ever was given in that kind (for ought appearing unto us), and being onely in one case, and against one man, it can binde in law no other but that person; and is also reverible by writ of error granted heretofore by act of parliament; and neither he nor any other subject is debarred by it from trying his right in the same or like case, in any of your majesties courts of record at Westminster.

Lastly, we nothing doubt, but our intended proceeding in a full examination of the right, nature, and measure of these new impositions (if this restraint had not come between) should not have been so orderly and so moderately carried and employed to the manifold necessities of these times, and given your majesty so true a view of the state and right of your subjects, that it would have been much to your majesties content and satisfaction, (which we most desire,) and removed all causes of fears and jealousies from the loyal hearts of your subjects, which is (as it ought to be) our careful endeavour: whereas contrariwise in that other way directed by your majesty, we cannot safely proceed without concluding for ever the right of the subject, which without due examination thereof we may not do.

We therefore your loyal and dutiful commons, not swerving from the approved steps of our ancestors, most humbly and instantly beseech your gracious majesty, that, without offence to the same, we may, according to the undoubted right and liberty of parliament, proceed in our intended course of a full examination of these impositions; that so we may cheerfully pass on to your majesties business, from which this stop hath by diversion so long withheld us. And we your majesties most humble, faithful, and loyal subjects shall ever (according to our bounden duty) pray for your majesties long and happy reign over us.

kingdome, which is jus publicum regni, and so subverteth the fundamentall law of the realme, and induceth a new forme of state and government.

2. It is against the municipall law of the land, which is jus privatum, the law of property and of private right.

3. It is against divers statutes made to restraine our king in this point.

4. It is against the practice and action of our common-wealth, contra morem majorem; and this is the modestest rule to limit both kings prerogatives, and subjects liberties.

Upon the first and fourth of these foure principal grounds I will more insist then upon the second and third, both for that in their own nature they are a more proper matter for a council of state, to the judgement of which I apply my discourse, and they have not been enforced by others; as also for that the other two, as more fit for a barre, and the courts of ordinary justice, have by some professors of the law been already most learnedly and exquisitely discussed.

For the first, it will be admitted for a rule, and ground of state, that in every common-wealth and government there be some rights of sovereignty, jura majestatis, which regularly and of common right doe belong to the sovereign power of that state; unless custome, or the provisional ordinance of that state doe otherwise dispose of them: which sovereign power is poteslas suprema, a power that can controule all other powers, and cannot be controuled but by it self.

It will not be denied, that the power of imposing hath so great a trust in it, by reason of the mischiefs may grow to the common-wealth by the abuses of it, that it hath ever been ranked among those rights of sovereign power.

Then is there no further question to be made, but to examine where the sovereign power is in this kingdome; for there is the right of imposition.

The sovereign power is agreed to be in the king: but in the king is a two-fold power; the one in parliament, as he is assisted with the consent of the whole state; the other out of parliament, as he is sole, and singular, guided merely by his own will. And if of these two powers in the king, one is greater than the other, and can direct and controule the other; that is suprema potestas, the sovereign power, and the other is subordinata.

It will then be easily proved, that the power of the king in parliament is greater than his power out of parliament; and doth rule and controule it; for if the king make a grant by his letters patents out of parliament, it bindeth him and his successors; he cannot revoke it, nor any of his successors; but by his power in parliament he may defeate and avoyd it; and therefore that is the greater power.

If a judgement be given in the Kings Bench, by the king himselfe, as may be, and by the law is intended, a writ of error, to reverse this judgement, may be sued before the king in parliament; which writ must be granted by the chancellor, upon bill indorsed by the king himselfe, as the book is 1 H. 7. 19. 6. And the forme of the writ of error is, that it being directed to the chiefe justice of the Kings Bench; quia in recordo & processu, ac etiam in redditione judicii loquela, quæ fuit in curia nostra coram nobis, error intervenit manifestus ad grave damnum, &c. nos errorem (si quis fuerit) modo debito corrigi, & partibus prædictis plenam & celerem justitiam fieri volentes, in hac parte vobis mandamus, quod recordum & processum loquela illius cum omnibus ea tangentibus, in præsens parlamentum nostrum sub sigillo tuo distingas & operis mistas & hoc breve, ut inspectis, &c. nos de consilio & advisamento dominorum spiritualium & temporalium, ac communitalis in parlamento nostro prædicto existentis, ulterius pro errore illo corrigendo fieri faciamus, quod de jure & secundum legem & consuetudinem regni nostri Angliæ fuerit faciendum. So you see the appeal is from the king out of the parliament, to the king in parliament; the writ is in his name; the rectifying and correcting the errors is by him, but with the assent of the lords and commons, than which there can be no stronger evidence to prove, that his power out of parliament is subordinate to his power in parliament; for in acts of parliament, be they lawes, grounds, or whatsoever else, the act and power is the kings; but with the assent of the lords and commons, which maketh it the most sovereign and supreme power above all, and controulable by none. Besides this right of imposing, there be others in the kingdome of the same nature. As the power to make lawes; the power of naturalization; the power of erection of arbitrary government; the power to judge without appeal; the power to legitimize; all which do belong to the king only in parliament. Others there be of the same nature, that the king may exercise out of parliament, which right is grown unto him in them, more in those others by the use and practice of the common-wealth, as denization, coynage, making warre; which power the king hath time out of minde practised, without the gain-saying and murmuring of his subjects. But these other powers before-mentioned have ever been executed by him in parliament, and not otherwise, but with the reluctance of the whole kingdome.

Can any man give me a reason, why the king can only in parliament make lawes? No man ever read any law whereby it was so ordained; and yet no man ever read that any king practised the contrary. Therefore it is the originall right of the kingdome, and the very natural constitution of our state and policy, being one of the highest rights of sovereign power. So it is in naturalization, legitimation, and the rest of that sort before recited.

It hath been alledged, that those, which in this cause have enforced their reasons from this maxime of ours, that the king cannot alter the law, have diverted from the question.

I say under favor they have not; for that in effect is the very question now in hand; for if he alone out of parliament may impose, he altereth the law of England in one of these two maine fundamental points. He must either take his subjects goods from them, without assent of the party, which is against the law; or else he must give his own letters pattents the force of a law, to alter the property of his subjects goods, which is also against the law.

That the king of England cannot take his subjects goods, without their consent, it need not be proved more than a principle. It is jus indigenæ, an old homeborne right, declared to be law by divers statutes of the realme. As in 34. E. 3. cap. 2. that no officer of the kings, or of his heires, shall take any goods of any manner of person without the assent and good will of the party to whom the goods belonged. The same is declared in many other statutes made against prisages and purveyances. Neither have ever any kings attempted to go plainly and directly against that right, but have devised certaine legal colours and shadowes for their wrongfull doing in that kind, which I doe find were of three sorts: by way of commission; by way of loan; by way of benevolence. Commissions of all other were the most insolent; for they went out (as it were by authority) to levy ayd of the people upon great necessity of the common-wealth. These were condemned in parliament, 21 E. 3. numb. 16. upon a grievous complaint made of the use of them by the commons, unto the king in parliament: wherein the people doe pray the king, that he would be pleased to remember, how at the parliament held the 17 year of his reign, and at the last parliament, it was then accorded, and granted by their said lord the king and his counsell, that there should goe out no commissions out of Chaucery for hobbeleries, archers, and other charges to be levied upon the people, if they were not granted in parliament; which ordinances were not observed, by reason whereof the people were impoverished and decayed, for which they prayed the king, that he would be pleased to take pity of his people, and the ordinances and grants made to his people in parliament to affirme and hold; and that if such commissions goe out without assent of parliament, that the commons, which are grieved thereby, may have writs of superfedeas, according to the said ordinance, and that the people be not bound to obey them.

To this the kings answer is,

Si ul tiel imposition fuit fait per grand necessite, & ceo del assent des prelates, countes, barons, & autres grandes & autres homes des commons adonq; presents, neant moins nostre seignior le roy ne v et, que tiel imposition non duement fait soit treit in consequence, eins voit qu les ordinances dont cest petition fait mention soit bienment gardes.

The last time that ever king attempted that course of execution was 17 H. 8. upon the taking of the French king at Pavia, by the forces of Charles the fifth. Cardinal Wolsey, having a purpose to put the king into a warre about that quarrel, and finding his coffers empty, advised this way, to send out commissions, and by them to levie ayd of the people, according to the value of their estate. But this gave such discontent to the whole realme, that it caused in many places an actual rebellion; and the cardinal, being called to give an account of this bad advice, did justify this fact by the example of Joseph, who advised Pharaoh to take the fifth part of his subjects goods. But when he saw that would not serve the turne, he falsely laid it upon the judges, informing the king, he did it by their advice, being resolved by them of the lawfulness of the fact. So you see, that great churchmen found more safety in matter of government of our common-wealth, in making a false report of a point of the common-law, then in a true text of the scripture. And if any churchmen will endeavor by application of the text of scripture, to overthrow the antient laws and liberties of the kingdome, I would advise them to be admonished by the ill success of the cardinal in this particular action, and by the miserable catastrophe of his whole life and fortunes.

Loans and apprests were those which we call privy seals, which though they were more moderate in shew, yet being made against the good-will of the parties, were as injurious indeed as the other. The commons in parliament, 25 E. 3. numb. 16. made a grievous complaint to the king against the use of them, and prayed, that none from henceforth should be compelled to make loans against their will; and they gave this reason, in their petition, for that it is against reason, and the franchise of the land, and prayed that restitution might be made to those that have made such loans.

To this the kings rescript was; it pleaseth our lord the king it be so. Lastly, came in those kinde of exactions, which were termed by the fair name of benevolences; but they became so odious, as they gave the occasion of a good law to be made against themselves, and against all other shifts and devices, by what new terms soever imposed upon the subjects. The law is, 1 R. 3. cap. 2. and is thus. The king, remembreing how the commons of this his realm, by new and unlawful inventions and inordinate covetise, against the law of this realm, have been put to great servitude and important charges and exactions, and especially by a new imposition called a benevolence, enacted by the advice, &c. that the subjects and commons of this land from henceforth shall in no wise be charged by any such charges or impositions called the benevolences, nor by such like things.

But if you will deny, that the king doth in this case take the goods of his subject without his assent, then you must fall upon mine alternative proposition, that the kings patent hath in this case the power of a law, to alter property; for how can he recover the imposed by a legal course of proceeding, and by judgment in his court, but upon a title precedent him, before the action brought, which title must be a property in the same imposed; and how cometh he by that property, but by his own letters patents, by which he declareth he will have that same as an imposition? For the judgment giveth not the right, but onely doth manifest and declare it, and giveth execution of it. So in this point the question is, whether the kings patent hath the force and power of the law, or not; for if it be not maintained that it hath, it can never be concluded, that he can transfer the property of his subjects goods to himself, without the assent of them; for quod meum est, sine facto meo alterius fieri non potest.

And if you give this power to the kings patent, you subject the law, and take away all rules and bounds of settled government, and leave in the subject no property of his own, neither do you by this advance the kings power and prerogative, but you make him no king; for, as Bracton saith, rex est, ubi dominatur lex, non voluntas.

So we see, that the power of imposing and power of making laws are convertible & coincidentia; and whosoever can do the one, can do the other. And this was the opinion of sir John Fortescue, that reverend and honorable judge, a very learned professor of the common-law, and chief justice of the Kings Bench, in the time of Henry 6. His words are these, in his book de laudibus legum Angliæ, cap. 9. Non potest rex Angliæ ad libitum leges mutare regni sui; principatu namque nedom regali, sed & politico, ipse dominatur. Si regali tantum præfesset iis, leges mutare posset; tallagia quoque, & cætera onera imponere, ipse inconsultis, quale dominium leges civiles indicant, cum dicunt quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem. Sed longe aliter potest rex politicis imperans; quia nec leges ipse sine subditorum assensu mutare poterit, nec subjectum populum renitentem onerare peregrinis impositionibus. In which place I must interpret unto you, that peregrinæ impositiones be not strange and unheard of impositions, as was urged by the worthy gentleman that spake last; but impositions upon traffick into and out of forrain countries, which is the very thing in question. Further, in the thirty-sixth chapter, he saith of the king of England, neque rex ibidem per se aut ministros suos tallagia, subsidia, aut alia quævis onera imponit ligeis suis, aut leges eorum mutat, vel novas condit, sine concessione vel assensu totius regni sui in parlamento. So he maketh these two powers of making law and imposing to be concomitant in the same hand, and that the one of them is not without the other. He giveth the same reason for this, as we do now, but in other words; because (as he saith) in England it is principatus mixtus & politicus, the king hath his sovereign power in parliament, assisted and strengthened with the consent of the whole kingdom, and therefore these powers are to be exercised by him only in parliament. In other countries they admit the ground of the civil law, quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem. Because they have an absolute power to make law, they have also a power to impose, which hath the force of a law in transferring property. Philip Comines, that lived at that time, in his fourth book, the first chapter, the fifth book, the eighth chapter, taketh notice of this policy of England, and commends it above all other states, as settled in most security; and further to our purpose laith this ground, that a king cannot take one penny from his subjects without their consent, but it is violence. And you may there note the mischiefs that grew to the kingdom of France, by the voluntary impositions first brought in by Charles the seventh, and ever since continued, and encreased, to the utter impoverishment of the common people, and the loss of their free council of three estates. And if this power of imposing were quietly settled in our kings, considering what is the greatest use they make of assembling of parliaments, which is the supply of money, I do not see any likelihood to hope for often meetings in that kind, because they would provide themselves by that other means. And thus much for my first reason, grounded upon the natural constitution of the policy of our kingdom, and the publique right of our nation.

2. For the point of common-law, which is my second reason, it hath been well debated, and nothing left unspeaken that can be said in it; and therefore I will decline to speak of that, which other men have well discussed; and the rather, for that there is nothing in our law-book directly, and in point of this matter; neither is the word (imposition) found in them, until the case in my lord Dier, 1 Eliz. 165. for we shall finde this business of an higher strain, and alwaies handled elsewhere, as afterwards shall appear. Yet I will offer some answers to such objections as have been made on the contrary in point of common-law, and have not been much stood upon by others to be answered.

The objections that have been made are these; that from the first book of the law to the last, no man ever read any thing against the kings power of imposing. No judgement was ever given against it, in any of the kings courts at Westminster. Other points of prerogative as high as this, disputed and debated, his excess in them limited; as in the book of 42. Aff. pl. 5. where the judges took away a commission from one, that had power given by it to him under the great seal to take ones person, and to seise his goods before he was indicted. So master Scrogs case 1, and 2. El. Dier. 175. the power of the king in making a commission to determine a question of right depending between two parties, notably debated, and ruled against the king, that he could not grant it.

To this I answer, that cases of this nature, of which the question now handled is, have ever been taken to be of that extraordinary consequence, in point of the common right of the whole kingdom, that the states would never trust any of the courts of ordinary justice with the deciding of them; but assumed the cognisance of them unto the high court of parliament, as the fittest place to decide matters so much concerning the whole body of the kingdom. As 2. Ed. 3. 7. it appears that Ed. 1. had granted a charter to the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ships of merchants, coming to the port of Yarmouth, should land their goods at their haven, and not at any other haven at that port, as at Garneston, and Little Yarmouth, which were members of that port. This was very inconvenient for the merchants, and a great hurt to traffick, and therefore the charter was questioned in the time of Ed. 2. and adjudged good by the council. But the parties not contented with this judgment, in the second year of king E. 3. by an order in parliament made upon a petition there exhibited against this grant, brought a scire facias out of the Chancery returnable in the Kings Bench, to question again the lawfulness of the patent. And in that suit the cause was notably debated, and those reasons much insisted upon that have been enforced in this case; as that of the kings power in the custody of the ports. But the matter so depending in the ordinary court of justice, a writ came out of the parliament, and did adjourn it thither again, where it gave occasion of a good law to be made to prevent the like grants, and to make them void notwithstanding any judgment given upon them, and to make such judgments also void.

The statute is, 9. E. 3. c. 1. And in the parliament rolls, 2. H. 4. num. 109. we finde a notable record, which gives warrant for the proceeding in parliament in this manner as hath been in this case, notwithstanding the judgment in the Exchequer, and declares to the kingdom, that, notwithstanding the great wonder made by some men; nothing hath been done in this business by those that serve in the parliament, but in imitation of their worthy predecessors in the like case. In the second year of H. 4. the commons shew that in the time of R. 2. by the means of John Walibam, bishop of Salisbury, treasurer of England, wrongfully, without authority of parliament, and by reason of a judgment given in the Exchequer, 16. and 17. R. 2. by the barons there, against certain merchants of Bristol, and other places, passage had been taken for wines otherwise then in ancient times had been, and therefore they prayed, they might pay their prise wines in the manner they had used to pay, notwithstanding any judgment given in the Exchequer, or other ordinance made by the said treasurer, contrary to the antient usage; which petition the king granted, and the judgment thereupon became void, and the prise wine hath been paid contrary to the judgment ever since.

In 1. El. Dier. 165. upon the complaint, made by the merchants, of the impositions set upon cloth by queen Mary, by her absolute power, without assent of parliament; the cause was thought too weighty to be decided in any one court; but, as it appeareth in the book, it was referred to all the judges of England, who divers times had conference about it. So it may well be, there is nothing against it in our year books, for there is nothing of it.

Another objection was this, which was made in the last argument, viz. that custom is originally due by the common-law of England; it can then have no other ground or cause, but meerly by the kings royal prerogative, as a right and duty originally belonging to his crown: which if it be, it must necessarily follow he may impose, for that is but the exercising of that right. To prove this was alleadged the case 39. E. 3. 13. by which case it appeareth, that king John had a custom of eight-pence on a tun of wine in the port of Southampton, but the book doth not tell you that the king had it by prerogative, and he might have it as well otherwise; as by prescription, or convention, which shall rather be intended, by reason of the certainty of the sum paid; for if it were by prerogative, he might take sometimes more, sometimes less at his will, the right being indefinite, and the quantity limited only by his own discretion. A common person may have such a custom certain, as 18. El. Dier. 352. The mayor of London hath the twentieth part of salt brought into the city by aliens, which is a great imposition, but is good by prescription originally, and hath received greater strength since, by acts of parliament made for the confirmation of the liberties and customs of the city of London. So it appeareth that John of Britain had custom of the ships that arrived at his port of Little Yarmouth, worth twenty pounds per annum. And these instances do infer, that a custom may be otherwise then by prerogative, and therefore it is no good argument to conclude, 'the king had such a custom, therefore he had it by prerogative.'

The book in 30 H. 8. Dier. 43. was much pressed on this point, which saith that custom belonged to the king at common-law, and doth instance in wooll woollfells and leather, begun at the common-law, but abridged by the statute of 14 E. 3. cap. 21. stat. 1. But this appeareth to be a great error, and mistaking in the book; for we do finde, that that custom of woolls woollfells and leather was begun by a grant in parliament, as appeareth in statute 15 E. 1. cap. 7. The words be, 'granted to us by the commonalty aforesaid;' and the last mention before was that the king had granted to the bishops, earls, barons, and all the commonalty of the land, &c. Novemb. 3. Ed. 1. The king recited in his letters patents, that prelati, magnates, ac tota communitas mercatorum regni, granted this new custom. And so the ground and motive of that opinion being false, all grounded upon that must needs be erroneous.

It was objected, that the king holdeth at this day the encrease of four-pence in the pound, over due custom, paid by merchants aliens according to the purport of the charta mercatoria 31 E. 1. by meer right of prerogative at the common-law; for by that grant of the merchants he cannot hold it, they being no body political at the time of the grant; and therefore the grant is meerly void to binde in succession; and yet the merchants aliens do pay it at this day.

It is agreed, that by the common-law a contract with a number not incorporate bindeth not succession. But we must take notice, that they, by whom that grant was made, of the augmentation of custom, by three-pence in the pound, and other encreases, 31. E. 1. were merchants aliens, who by the law of merchants and nations may contract to bind their successors in matters of traffick. For their contracts are not ruled by the common-law of the land, but by the law of nations, & per legem mercatoriam, as the book case is, 3 Ed. 4. 10. and there was a good consideration given them by the king for this encrease of custome, as discharge of prise wines for two shillings the tun, and other immunities, which all merchants aliens hold and enjoy at this day, by force of that contract made, 31 E. 1. for a stranger paieth now but two shillings the tun for prise, whereas it standeth an Englishman in much more. The rule of commutative justice maketh the contract available to the king against the merchants, because he parteth with part of his prise to the merchant; and maketh it available to the merchant against the king, because he giveth him encrease of custom above that is due by law.

law. But the statute of 27 E. 3. cap. 26. heretofore cited, doth make this point clear without scruple, which confirmeth the charter of 31. E. 1. entirely; and by that the encrease of custom by three pence in the pound, which is by name mentioned in the statute, is now due by act of parliament.

If you will have the king hold this encrease of custom by prerogative, you go directly against his meaning; for it appeareth by that which presently followed this grant, that the king took this encrease of custom by way of contract onely, and not by way of prerogative; for the same year following he directeth his writs to the officers of his ports, reciting the contract made with the aliens by charta mercatoria; adding further, that some denizens were willing to pay the like custom, upon the same immunities to them to be granted, and doth assign his officers to gather it, but with this clause, si grante et absque coactione solvere voluerint, ita quod aliquem mercatorem de regno & potestate nostra ad prestationes & custumas hujusmodi invite solvendas nullatenus distringatis. Nothing can more plainly expresse, that the kings intention was not to demand this by way of prerogative, but by force of the contract. If there were such a prerogative in the crown, as of right to have custom, how cometh it to pass this prerogative never yet had fruit or effect? For this I can maintain, that the king of England hath not one penny custom or imposition upon merchandizes, elder then the fourth year of queen Mary, that he holdeth not by act of parliament, and by the peoples grant. The eldest, that he hath, is that of woolls wooll-fells and leather, and that is by act of parliament, as appeareth in the statute 25 E. 1. cap. 7. the tonnage and poundage by parliament in the first year of every kings reign, and the aliens encrease of custom by parliament 27 E. 3. cap. 26. Then this prerogative hath been much neglected, that it was never called on to be put in execution, untill now of late years.

Concerning the statutes made for restraining our kings from the exercise of this pretended prerogative, which is the third matter I stand upon; those that have maintained the kings prerogative in this point, have endeavored to interpret those statutes to extend onely to restrain him from imposing upon wooll wooll-fells and leather, which are staple commodities. And the reason they give for this restraint, more then for other goods, is, because the king by statute is restrained to a custom certain for those commodities, as the half mark a sack of wooll, and half a mark three hundred wooll-fells, and thirteen shillings four pence a last of leather; and therefore great reason he should not exceed this custom in these commodities.

This objection receiveth many answers. First, it appeareth both by the expresse letter of divers of the laws made in this point, by the occasion that induced the making of the laws, and by the execution of them, that all other wares and merchandises, as well as those of the staple, were within the purpose and intent of those laws. Secondly, the reason alleadged, why there should be restraint for the staple commodities, rather then for the other, is mistaken; for the lords and commons did grant to E. 1. by act of parliament the custom of the half mark for wooll wooll-fells and leather, which was matter of meer grace and liberality, and includeth no restraint in it, but rather a favourable extention, quite contrary to the sence of the objection, according to that rule of interpretation, gratiosa ampliari decet, odiosa restringi. And admit some laws be made expressly to restrain impositions upon wooll wooll-fells and leather, by reason that the occasion of making such laws was the actual imposing upon those goods at that time, shall we not by good construction, secundum mentem extensivam legis, extend this law to other wares and merchandizes that are within the same mischief? If we look to the reason of the law, we shall make no doubt of it: for that is, because the impositions were without assent of parliament, not because they were upon such and such commodities. Besides, those laws so made are declarativæ juris antiqui, non introductivæ novi.

In the enumeration of those statutes which I conceive make directly to this purpose, I will endeavour rather to answer the objections made against them, then to enforce the sence and meaning of them, which is very plain and open, and needs no interpretation. The first statute enforced is mag. charta, cap. 30. made in the ninth year of H. 3. by which it is enacted, that all merchants shall have free egress and regress out of and into this realm, with their goods and merchandizes, to buy and sell, sine omnibus malis tolneis per antiquas & rectas consuetudines. In which words we may infer, that both the use and right of imposing are absolutely excluded, and debarred; for consuetudo, which in this case is to be taken for usage, which is mos, (not improperly for portorium, a duty paid in money, as our English word custom in one sence doth signifie) implieth a beginning and continuance by consent and will of the parties, not by power and enforcement, which cannot be a custom; and therefore it cannot be an imposition; for that ariseth meerly out of the will and power of the imposer, and is against the will of him upon whose goods it is set. But take consuetudo either for mos or portorium, the epithites with which it is qualified, antiquum and rectum, do describe it to be of that nature that it cannot be an imposition. For antiquum, in legal construction, is that which is time out of mind, that is not an imposition; for then by continuance of time it should grow a right by prescription, and were justifiable. Rectum implieth a limited right, which inferreth there may be a wrong, and exceeding of that right, which is not in impositions; for if there be a right in the king to impose, the quantity, time, and other circumstances are in his discretion; the right is illimited. And if he set on never so great an imposition, there is as much right in it, as if it be never so small. The excess maketh it a burthen, but not a wrong.

We may further observe, that, in the statute, malum tolneum, which is evil toll, is set down by way of antithesis to antiqua, and recta consuetudo; by which is inferred, that exactions upon wares and merchandizes not qualified with these two properties of antiquum and rectum, are evil and unjust. This is made more evident by a record in the Twelfth year of H. 3. which was a mandat sent by the king to the customers of his ports for the execution of this law made in 9. H. 3. whereby it is commanded, quod omnibus mercatoribus in portum suum venientibus cum vinis, & aliis merchandiziis, scire faciant, quod salvo & secure in terram Angliæ veniant cum vinis & merchandiziis suis, faciendo inde rectas & dubitas consuetudines, nec sibi timeant de malis tolneis, quæ iis faciat rex, vel in terrâ suâ fieri permittat. By this record the word consuetudo is interpreted to be mos, not portorium; otherwise it should have been solvendo consuetudines, not faciendo. Also these words antiquum & rectum in the statute in this writ are rectum & debitum, which doth more enforce a certainty of right and duty, which by no means can be intended in impositions.

Objections against this law were made in the last argument. First, that it was made for aliens. This is true; the words of the law do plainly shew it was made for aliens. But if the state was so careful to provide for them, shall we not judge, that with denizens it was so already? And that this statute was made to extend that liberty by act of parliament to aliens, which denizens had by the common law, succeeding times did so conceive of it, as appeareth by the statute 2 E. 3. cap. 9. The words are, that all merchants strangers and princes may go and come with their merchandizes in England after the tenor of the great charter, and that writs be thereupon sent to all the sheriffs in England, and to mayors and bayliffs of good towns, where need shall require.

A second objection was made in the last argument, out of these words of the statute of magna charta, that merchants might freely traffique, nisi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint: by which was enforced, that the king had power to restrain and prohibit traffique; therefore to impose. It is agreed there may be a publick restraint of traffique, upon respects of the common good of the kingdom; but whether that which is called publica prohibitio in the statute, be intended by the king alone, or by act of parliament, is a question: for such restraints have still been by parliament. But admit the king may make a restraint of traffique in part for some publick respect of the commonwealth, he doth this in point of protection, as trusted by the commonwealth to do that which is for the publick good of the kingdom; but if he use this trust to make a gain and benefit by imposing, that is a breach of the trust, and a sale of government and protection. But more of this shall be hereafter spoken in the answering of the main objections.

The next law is that notable statute of E. 1. in the 25 year of his reign, made upon the very point in question. The words are these. 'And forasmuch as the most part of the commonalty of this realm find themselves sore grieved with the male toll of woolls, that is, to wit, a toll of forty shillings for every sack of wooll, and have petitioned to us for to release the same; we at their request have clearly released it, and have granted for us and our heirs, that we shall not take such things without their common consent and good will, saving to us and our heirs the customs of woolls skins and leather, granted before by the commonalty aforesaid.'

Against the application of this law to the question now in hand, many objections were made; some out of matter precedent to the law, some out of the law it self, some out of matter subsequent and following after the law.

For matter precedent, it was objected out of Thomas Walsingham, an historiographer of good credit, that writ of that time when the statute was made, that in the petition of grievances given to king E. 1. by the people in the 25 year of his reign, upon which petition the statute was made, that they found themselves not grieved in point of right, but in point of excess. The words are, communitas sentit se gravatam de vectigali lanarum, quod nimis est onerosum, viz. de quolibet sacco 40s. & de lana fractâ septem marcas. So they expresse the cause of their grief, that it was too heavy; which is to be applied to the point of excess, not of right.

To this I answer, that if the words had been, quia est nimis onerosum, this construction might have been made out of them; because the word quia had induced a declaration of the cause of that which was formerly affirmed: but the words are, quod nimis onerosum, which doth only positively affirm, that the imposition de facto was intolerable for the greatness of it, which doth not therefore admit, that it is tolerable in respect of the right the king had to impose. But this is made clear by the general word precedent in the preamble of the petition, which doth evidently infer, they grounded their complaint upon point of right, not upon point of excess. The words are these, tota terræ communitas sentit se valde gravatam, quia non tractantur secundum leges & consuetudines terræ, secundum quas tractari antecessores sui solebant habere, sed voluntarie excluduntur. After which preamble, among the particulars, this of forty shillings upon a sack of wooll is ranked, but with a dependency of that expresse in the preamble for the point of right. But seeing we light upon history, which, though it be of small authority in a law argument, yet being the history of our own realm, hath fit and proper use in the common counsel of the realm, I will pursue it a little further, out of Matth. Westm. a writer that lived much nearer the time of the law made, then Thomas Walsingham. He saith, that the commons by their petitions required, ne rex de cætero tallagia usurparet, & voluntarias super his inducias exactiones de cætero quasi in irritum revocaret; by which it appeareth, that the point of the complaint was that the exactions laid on them were voluntary, that is, at the kings will without assent of parliament.

Out of the law it self it hath much been pressed, as first the commons made petition to the king; whereupon they infer out of the nature of the word petition, that their proceeding was by way of grievance, for the excess and inconvenience, as a matter of grace, not in course of justice for the wrong.

To this I answer, that considering the quality of the parties to this action, it being between the king and the subject, duty and good manners doth induce gentleness and humility of terms, without blemish or diminution of the force of right. It is according to the demeanor of Job, chap. 9. v. 15. though I were just, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge. But in our forms of law, be the right of the subject never so clear, manifest, and acknowledged ledged by all; yet if his own be detained from him by the king, he hath no other writ or action to recover, but a meer petition supplicat celsitudini, &c. So as if the word petition to the king infer defect of right in the petitioner, there can be no case where the king can do the subject wrong.

A second objection out of the body of the law is, that the king doth release that imposition of forty shillings, which implieth a right settled in him.

But to this I answer, that it is no necessary inference, wheresoever a release of right is; for it is used for claim onely, or where possession was, though wrongful, and that in majorum securitatem, quia abundans cautela non nocet. But in this case, a release was very expedient, and for some respect necessary, to extinguish a right the king had in this imposition against the merchants themselves. For this imposition, though it were not set on by assent of parliament, yet was it not set on by the kings absolute power; but was granted to him by the merchants themselves, who were to be charged with it. So the grievance was the violation of the right of the people, in setting it on without their assent in parliament, not the damage that grew by it; for that did onely touch the merchants, who could not justly complain thereof, because it was their own act and grant. This appeareth by two notable records, the one

22. E. 1. a writ to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer in Ireland, to discharge the merchants there of impositions on woolls; in which the king reciteth, licet in subsidium guerra regis pro recuperanda terra Valconia mercatores gratanter concesserunt per biennium vel triennium, si tantum duravit guerra, de sacco lanae, &c. The other record is the writ of publication, that in 26. E. 1. went out after the statute of 25. in which writ the king reciteth thus, cum nos ad instantiam communitatis regni nostri remiserimus custodiam 40s. nobis nuper in subsidium guerra nostra contra regem Francie concessum, &c.

A third objection made out of the body of the statute, by those which have argued on the contrary part, was upon these words, that the king would take no such things without common consent; by which words they conceived the intention of the law was limited precisely to impositions set upon wooll, and not on other commodities, which are not such things, but other; and for this they alledge this reason, that it was not probable, when the complaint was only for an imposition on wooll, that the king would give a remedy for other things not spoken of, for which there was no cause of complaint.

To this a full answer is given many ways. First, out of the saving in the act, which extends to other things then to wooll, as to wooll-fells and leather; therefore the purview of the act by these words, such things, extendeth to more then the wooll; for there needs no saving, but for that which is contained in the purview. Secondly, the reason alledged, that no more by likelihood should be remedied but for wooll, because onely that was complained of, is false; for the complaint of the commons was not onely for this imposition on wooll, but divers other burthens and grievances of the like nature. And this will appear if we compare all the parts of the law, the one with the other; for this law is in the form of a charter written in French, and beginneth, Edward by the grace of God, &c. and is an entire grant, and instrument without fractions, sections, and chapters, as it is now printed, and containeth in it, next before this last clause concerning the impositions on woolls, which in the printed book is cap. 6. that the king, for no business from thenceforth, will take no manner of aids, mises, nor prises, but by common assent. This word mises, in French signifieth properly impositions, derived of the word mettre in Latine to put. So the word such things, is a conclusion to all the premises, and hath relation not onely to that which is made cap. 7. by the printer, and concerneth the male toll of woolls, but to that precedent, which is all other aids impositions and takings.

The writ of publication of this statute sent out to all parts in 26. E. 1. maketh plain this construction. The words of it are, concedentes quod custodiam illam vel aliam, sine voluntate vel communi assensu non capiamus. These words, vel aliam, are indefinite, and extend to any other whatsoever, besides that of woolls. The writ doth further discharge merchants for the commodities of wooll-fells and leather, which are not complained of by name in the statute; and therefore the law was intended to other impositions as well as to those upon woolls.

The objection made out of matter subsequent to the statute was this, that notwithstanding this law of 25. E. 1. impositions, that before the statute had been set on other merchandize then woolls, were still answered after the statute; and for instance of this, was alledged, that whereas 16. E. 1. an imposition of 40s. the tun was set upon wines brought into the kingdom, an accompt was made of this in the Exchequer in 26. E. 1. as by the records there appeareth; by which it seemeth that the law of 25. E. 1. was not taken to extend to wines, and such other commodities, other then woolls named in the statute. It is true, such an imposition was set on by E. 1. in the sixteenth year of his reign, and an accompt made for it 25. E. 1. and 26. But it appeareth by the record of the accompt, that it was made for the time ended before the statute made: as from the eighteenth of May, 16. E. 1. to 23. Jul. 22. E. 1. But there is no record, that ever any accompt was made for any money received for that imposition for the time after the statute made; neither was it very willingly answered before; for it appeareth by the record, that it was ten years after the setting of it.

The third statute alledged on the behalf of the subject is that 34. E. 1. c. 1. the words are these, 'No tallage or aid shall be taken or levied by us, or our heirs in our realm, without the good will and assent of our arch-bishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land.' Against this was objected, that this statute was intended onely upon the taxes and impositions of things. The word auxilium makes it clear, that it is to be intended further then of things within the realm; for tallagium is commonly intended of domestic taxes, but auxilium is the most usual term for impositions upon goods imported and exported; as by the acts of parliament by which such impositions are given to the king, in which they are called most commonly by the name of aids, as proceeding of good will and benevolence.

The fourth statute alledged on this part is that of 5. E. 2. c. 14. just in point of the matter in question; and therefore I will set it down as I finde it verbatim in the record in the Tower. Ensamant nouvelles customes sont levies, & antients enbaunces, come sur levies drapes, wine aver du pois, & autre choses, purquoy les marchantes weynont plus volement, & meynes de bien, menynent en la terre, & les marchantes estrangiers demurront plus longment que ils seleyent faier, pur le quel demoure le choses sont le plus enbaunces que ils ne seleyent estre, al damage de roy, & de son peple. Nous ordonons que tout maners de male tolls, levies puiens de coronement de roy Ed. fils de roy Henry, soient entirement oustes, & de tout esfreints pur tout jours, nient contristiant le chartre que le diēt roy Ed. fist a marchantes aliens, pur ceo que il fuit fait contre le grand chartre & encoultre le franchise de la city de Londres, & sans assent de baronage, &c. Savant neque dent al roy le custome de leynes, poulx, & de quirs, &c. si aver les doct.

By this law is recited, that by the levying of new customes, and by the raising of old, traffique was destroyed, and all things made dear; and therefore all new impositions and customs were discharged charta mercatoria, by which, custom, that was encreased on aliens, was taken away; and the reason alledged; because it was sans assent de baronage, and against the great charter. And this is further with this clause, saving to the king his custom of wooll wooll-fells and leather, si aver les doct.

Great wars have been raised against the credit of this law in the parliament house, and three things have been especially objected against it.

First, that it is no law; for it was enforced upon the king by some of the nobility that were too strong for him, the realm being then in tumult and mutiny about the quarrel of Peirce of Gaveston, so never had the kings free consent; but he gave way unto it for fear of greater mischief.

Secondly, that in itself it is unjust, as in taking away the custom granted to the king by charta mercatoria, 31. E. 1. and in making doubt, whether the king should have the custom of woolls, &c. by those words, saving it to him, si aver les doct.

The third objection is, that if it were a law, it is repealed.

To these I give particular answers.

To the first, that this statute was made both at the instance of the king and people, with a purpose and intention on all parts to settle things in a stay and order, both in the kings house and commonwealth; the king and his nobles standing in good terms, when this business was taken in hand. And it was begun and ended with great solemnity and ceremony. For the king in the third year of his reign gave commission under his great seal to 32 lords spiritual and temporal; of which there were eleven bishops, eight earls, and thirteen barons; they being as committees of the higher house to devise ordinances for the good government of his house and his realm. In which commission he doth for the honor of God, the good of him and of his realm, of his freewill, grant to the prelates earls and barons, and others elected by the whole kingdom, full power to ordain the state of his house and realm by such ordinances as by them should be made, to the honor of God, the honor and profit of holy church, the honor of himself, the profit of him and his people, according to right and reason, and the oath he made at his coronation. These joyning with others of discreet commons in parliament, and taking every of them a solemn oath for their sincere demeanor in the business, did make this and other ordinances, which were so well liked of by the king, that, after they were made, he took an oath to observe them, and caused them to be published in Pauls church-yard by the bishop of Salisbury, by denouncing excommunication against all that should wilfully infringe them; and by his letters patents dated 5. Oct. 5. regni sui, did send them through the realm to be published, and from thenceforth to be observed, thereby signifying his great liking and approbation of them; after which they had the force and power of laws given unto them in the parliament, in the fifth year of his reign.

The second objection, which is the unjustness of the law, instanced in two points; the taking away of charta mercatoria, and the doubting of the kings right to the custom of wooll-fells and leather, &c.—To the first of these, I deny it to be unjust, but to be according to the law of England, and liberty of the kingdom: for that charter did contain in it divers grants of things which were not in the power of the king to grant without assent of parliament; the trial per medietatem lingua, and other things tending to the alteration of the law, and burdening of the people; and therefore that charter never had his undoubted and settled force, until it was confirmed by act of parliament, but lay asleep almost twenty years together, without being put in execution, between 5. E. 2. and 27. E. 3. when it was confirmed. For the doubt that is supposed to be made in the statute of the kings right to the custom of wooll wooll-fells and leather, I take it, there is no such doubt made: for the words, saving the kings right to the custom of woolls, si aver les doct. have this construction, that is, at such times as he ought to have it: so the word si hath the signification of quando; for it had been a folly to have made a saving of that, of the right whereof they had doubted; neither is it likely but that they would have taken it away, if it had not been lawful. But there was no colour to doubt of the right of it; for it was given by act of parliament, and ever continued in force without challenge or exceptions to the lawfulness of it.

The third objection is, that this statute is repealed. To this I plead, nullum vult reatum. If it be repealed, it must be by act of parliament; for unum quodque dissolvitur iisdem modis quibus est colligatum. I and others have searched the records of the realm, and endeavoured by all means to inform our selves of the truth herein, and we can find no act of parliament of repeal. The truth is, some kings, finding these laws not to suit to their wills and humors, have endeavoured to suppress them; but they did never yet obtain a repeal of them by act of parliament.

But

But it is further urged, that although there were no formal repeal of the law, yet it was never put in execution as a law, but even presently upon the making was rejected, and use and practice went quite against it: and for instance hereof, a record was vouched, that E. 2. held himself so little bound by it, as that in the 11. year of his reign he set an imposition without assent of parliament upon wooll, wooll-fells, leather, wines cloth, aver de pois, and divers other kind of merchandizes. To this I answer, that if it were true, that a weak and impotent king, as he was, did contrary to the law, doth this make the law void, and no law? But if we look into the whole record, and scan this action of E. 2. from the beginning of it unto the end, we shall finde it a very good instance to prove the practice and execution both of this law of 5. E. 2. and of that in 25. E. 1. For it is true, that E. 2. in the eleventh year of his reign did borrow of the merchants a certain sum of money, above the due custom of woolls, wooll-fells, wine, aver de pois, leather, and such other goods imported and exported. But it appeareth by the record, he took it but for one year; he took it by the advice and counsel of the merchants; and he took it per viam mutui, as a loan. The direction of the writ is, collectoribus mutui nobis per mercatores alienigenas & indigenas de certis rebus & merchandis usque ad certum tempus faciendi. This was done in good terms, he did not claim it as his right, but did borrow it, which I do think is a good evidence against his right. But what became of this? The state would not abide it, for all these fair shews. And therefore afterwards the king sendeth out other writs, by which he dischargeth all merchandizes of this loan, saving only wooll wooll-fells and leather; and for the loan taken upon those commodities, it was limited to continue but until Michaelmas after, and good security was given to the merchants by the customers to pay themselves, by way of defalcation, out of the customs which should be due after Michaelmas, those sums which were so borrowed of them. The words of the record are worth the observing, *cum pro expeditione guerræ Scotiæ, & aliis arduis & urgentibus necessitatibus nobis multipliciter incumbentibus, pro quarum exoneratione quasi infinitam pecuniam refundere oportebit, pecunia plurimum indigeamus in presenti, & nuper pro eo quod exitus regni & terrarum nostrarum, simul cum pecunia nobis in subventi ne præmissorum tam per clerum quam communis regni nostri concessa, ad sumptus prædictos cum festinatione qua expediret faciendos, non sufficientes, exquirentes vias & modos, quibus possemus pecuniam habere commodius & decentius pro præmissis, de consilio & advisamento quorundam mercatorum tam alienigenarum quam indigenarum viam invenimus infra script. viz. and so setteth down the manner of the loan, and the security for the payment of it. This, I take it, was neither an imposition, nor a wrong in any respect. Also by the first record it appeareth, that the loan set on wines, aver de pois, and such other commodities, besides wooll wooll-fells and leather, were presently discharged by E. 2. which sheweth they were taken to be within the intent of the statute of 25. E. 1.*

The fifth statute alledged on the behalf of the subject is that of 14. E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 21. by which the commons pray the king to take no more then the old custom of the half mark. The king prayeth aid of the commons for a time above the custom upon his necessity of wars. And the conclusion is, that by that act the king doth grant, that after the feast of Pentecost, twelve moneths following, he will take no more of woolls wooll-fells and leather but the old custom, and doth promise to charge, set, or assess upon the custom but in manner as aforesaid.

The sixth statute is 14. E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 1. The king doth grant by way of charter to the prelates, earls barons commons citizens burgesses and merchants, that they be not from henceforth charged nor grieved to make any aid or sustain charge, if it be not by the common consent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and commons of the realm, and that in parliament.

These two statutes grew upon an occasion of an imposition set on wooll by the king without assent of parliament. Little hath been objected against them, but only to the first, that it was obtained of grace, and not upon instance of right, which they gather out of the words of the law, which are, "the commons pray the king that he would stablish, that from henceforth no more then the old custom be taken". The like reason may be made against the king out of the same words in the same law; for the king in the same act prayeth the commons to give him an imposition upon woolls for a time above the old custom. But the record of the petitions exhibited in parliament, on which these two laws are made, cleareth the objection.

The first was delivered by the lords in this form, les grands volunt, that the male toll, set on woolls newly, be altogether abated, and that the old custom be held, and that they may have this in point of charter, and by inrolment in parliament. This word, volunt, had been too high for a suit of grace, and therefore must be intended of right. The commons petition in form is somewhat humble, but in effect and purpose is rough and stern. The words are these: the commons pray, that the male toll of woolls be taken as it was used in ancient time, which is now enhanced without the assent of the commons, and grandes, as we conceive; and that if it be otherwise demanded, that every one of the commons may arrest them without being challenged. According to these petitions, the first of these two laws is by inrolment in parliament; the second is in form of a charter: the first doth express some special commodities; the second doth reach generally at all.

The seventh law directly touching this point is that 14. E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. the king doth grant according to the great charter, that all merchants denizens and foreigners may without let safely come into the realm of England with their goods and merchandizes, and safely tarry, and safely return, paying the subsidies, customs and other profits reasonably due. Upon the words of this law, was great advantage taken in this, that besides custom and subsidy, which comprehend all the certain and ordinary duties the king hath upon the wares and goods of merchants, there are other profits spoken of to be due. These they affirm cannot be understood but of impositions by the king without assent of parliament.

To this I answer, if they were not duties due to the king besides custom and subsidy, which might satisfy the intention of these words, this objection might have had some colour in it; but it is plain, that besides these two, there are other profits due to the king upon merchants goods, as scavage, tonnage, and the like. And you shall finde a petition in parliament, 50. E. 3. against the raising of these above the old rate.

The eighth law is 15. E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 5. whereby it is enacted, that every merchant may freely buy and sell, and pass the sea with their merchandizes of wooll and all other things, paying the custom of old time used, according to the statute made in the last parliament in Mid-Lent, which was the stat. 14. E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. This law doth expressly exclude the novelty of impositions.

The ninth law is that 18. E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 3. whereby it is enacted, that the sea be open to all manner of merchants to pass with their merchandizes where it shall please them.

The tenth is, 27. E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. for the assurance of merchants-strangers and other, the king doth will and grant for him and his heirs, that nothing shall be taken over the due customs, not taken of them to his use by colour of suit, or in other manner against their wills.

The eleventh is 38 E. 3. cap. 2. that all manner of merchants aliens and denizens may buy and sell all manner of merchandizes, and freely carry them out of the realm, paying the customs and subsidies thereof due.

The last is 22 H. 8. cap. 8. by which it was enacted, that tables should be set up in ports, by which the certainty and very duty of every custom, toll, and duty, or sum of money, to be demanded and required of wares and merchandizes, shall and may plainly appear and be declared, to the intent that nothing be exacted otherwise then in old time hath been used and accustomed.

By this late law it appeareth, that the judgment of the whole parliament was at that time, that nothing was due upon wares and merchandizes but that which was certain, and had been antiently due; by which impositions are excluded, whose qualities are novelty and uncertainty, as being set on as present occasion moveth, and proportioned for quantity and other circumstances as the will of the king directeth.

These are the laws, which I conceive most directly tend to the restraining the kings of England from the exercise of that irregular power of imposing, at the first offered by them to be put in execution, yet not pressed as their right, and never practised but upon opposition of the whole state, and at last deferred and given over until of late; as by that which followeth in the fourth place will appear.

My fourth and last assertion is, that this practice of imposing without assent of parliament is contra morem majorum. In this I will make an historical perustration of the times past, whereby I will discover and make known, what passages have been in this business in this kingdom, and especially in the high court of parliament for the space of 300 years and more last past, since the beginning of the reign of E. 1. thence which time, and not before, this kingdom hath grown into the glory and reputation of foreign traffique. And as a worthy gentleman of the kings learned counsel made certain considerations upon this question, framed and strengthened out of the greatness of his wit and reason; so I grounding my self upon the practice of former times, which is the safest rule whereby to square the right both of king and people in this commonwealth, where their right is jus consuetudinarium, a right that groweth by use and practice, I will propose unto you certaine observations out of the action and experience of former times until the reigns of the two late queens; by which you may the better ground and frame your judgements in the determination of the right in this question.

1. My first observation is in point of circumstance, that there never was any imposition set, but in time of actual war, and duplatis vexillis; they were set on very rarely and sparingly, but for a short time, and that certaine and definite, and upon some few commodities, and that by the assent of the merchants that were to beare the burthen. In our time the occasion not so sensible, the continuance to be perpetual, the number many hundreds, almost no kinde of commodity spared. I will give you some few instances of these circumstances out of the records themselves.

The maletole of wooll, set on by king E. 1. which gave the occasion of the stat. 25 years of his raigne, was given by merchants. The record saith, mercatores gratanter concesserunt in subsidium guerræ regis. It further sheweth, it was for his necessity of warre, which then was great also.

For the time of E. 3. there need not many instances; for his whole raigne was almost an actual warfare. As in the sixth year of his raigne for his war in Scotland and Ireland, in the thirteenth year of his raigne for his war in France, severall impositions were set on.

In the seventeenth year of E. 3. the record in the Tower mentioneth, that forty shillings imposition was upon a sacke of wooll by the grant of merchants, and it was in the time of war.

In the twentieth yeare of king E. 3. it appeareth in the record, that the imposition then put upon woolls was by the assent of merchants for two years, for the necessity the king had in his passage over the sea, to recover his right, and to defend the realme.

2. My second observation is, never any imposition was set on by the king out of parliament, but complaint was made of it in parliament; and not one that ever stood after such complaint made, but remedy was afforded for it; et quod rex inconsulto facit, consulto revocavit, his soveraigne power controlled his subordinate. In which it is a thing very notable, that the king in no one case ever claimed, or so much as ever named his right or prerogative, which no doubt would have been done, if it had been thought due, but gave satisfaction to the complaint by one of these three waies;

Either by discharging them quite, and making some good law against them.

Secondly, by intreating the people to hold them some short time by their favor.

Thirdly, by waving his present possession, and taking that of their gift by act of parliament, as an aide which he had set on by his absolute power as an imposition.

Instances of the first. 25 E. 1. the impositions of wools taken off, and a law made against it, and the king undertook for him and his successors to doe so no more. 38 E. 3. 26. the imposition of three shillings foure-pence on a sacke of wooll put off upon complaint; and a law made against it, 38 E. 3. ca. 2. The like statute 45 E. 3. ca. 4. upon a complaint of an imposition on wools made in parliament, 45 E. 3. n. 42. Rot. Parl.

Instances of the second. 21 E. 3. nu. 11. a petition upon an imposition of 2s. upon a sacke of wool, 2s. upon a tunne of wine, and six-pence upon aver de pois, all discharged presently, saving the 2s. upon a sacke of wool, and for that intreated that it might stay till Easter following, and so it did, and was then taken away.

Instance of the third. 25 E. 3. nu. 22. the commons made petition against an imposition of fourty shillings upon a sack of wool granted to the king by the merchants, shewing that they ought not to be bound by their act. The king did not claime right or justice; but because his warres were great, upon his request had it granted unto him for two yeeres by act of parliament, and pretended no title of prerogative, neither was it ever spoken of.

3. My third observation is, that our kings have acknowledged that it is not their right. E. 1. in his writs he sent to the officers of his ports to levie three-pence on the pound over the old custome of the denizens as well as of the aliens, and to suffer the denizens to enjoy those privileges the aliens did enjoy by the payment of the encrease of custome, doth give this direction expressly; that they should not take it of denizens against their will. The words of the record expresse it very fully: cum mercatores extranei & alienigenae, pro quibusdam libertatibus eis per nos concessis & prius nostris quibuscunque remissis, nobis de bonis & merchandis suis quibuscunque infra regnum & potestatem nostram adducend. ultra antiquas custumas dare concesserint praestaciones & custumas subscriptas, viz. and so setteth down the increases, and amongst the rest this three-pence upon the pound, and so proceedeth, ac quidam mercatores de regno nostro & potestate nostra, ut ipsis dictis libertatibus & immunitatibus uti & gaudere, & quod de prius nostris quieti esse possint, praestaciones & custumas hujusmodi de bonis & merchandis suis nobis solvere velint, ut accepimus, assignavimus vos, &c. ad custumas & praestaciones praedictas de mercatoribus de regno & potestate nostra colligend. qui eas gratanter & sine coactione solvere voluerint; ita tamen quod aliquem mercatorum de dicto regno & potestate nostra ad praestaciones & custumas hujusmodi nobis invito solvend. nullatenus distringatis. Surely if E. 1. had claimed the prerogative of imposing, he would never have given these cautions in the requiring of that which he had taken to be his due, as that they should not exact it of any of his subjects that were not willing to pay it, nor trouble nor distraine them for it.

In the twelfth yeere of E. 3. we finde the record of certaine letters written from the king, being then at Barwick in the Scottish warres, unto the archbishop of Canterbury, in which letters the king seemeth to have a great confidence in the devotion of the archbishop, and therefore earnestly intreateth him to further his enterprises with his prayers to God, and then addeth further:

Ad hoc pater, cum populus regni nostri variis oneribus, tallagiis, & impositionibus, baillenus praeponderat (quod dolentes referimus) sed inevitabili necessitate compulsi de eisdem oneribus ipsum adhuc relevare non volumus dictum populum, ut tantam necessitatem nostram humiliter & benigne patiat & caritative sustineat, & priorem, quam penes nos concepit de cetero instant in orationibus & elemosinis suis, (oneribus praedictis, quae non ex malitia vel presumptione voluntaria ipsum gravant, non obstantibus) exhibeant caritatem, indulgentiam muneribus & aliis modis, quibus secundum Deum videbitis piis exhortationibus inducat, & nos penes eundem excusetis; speramus namque per Dei gratiam, cujus manus cunctis indigentibus sola sufficiens, & largissima compendatur, beneficiis compensativis dictum populum visitare & consolari pro loco & tempore opportunis.

The principall thing I note out of this record, upon the very point of this my third observation, is, that the king intending to excuse himself of the burthens by him laid on the people, and to avoid the blemish of wrong and injustice in laying thereon, saith they were not onera ex presumptione voluntaria, that is, burthens that he presumed to lay on at his owne will, whereby he condemneth impositions without assent of parliament, which are (onera ex voluntate regis) to proceed of presumption, which doth clearly exclude claime of right, and disproveth the lawfulness of the act. But there are divers other notable passages in the record worthy our marking. As out of the word (praeponderant) used by the king, wee may gather he did accompt these impositions a grievous burden to his people, which sheweth his owne pity of them. He saith further, dolentes referimus, shewing his griefe and remorse at it; & inevitabili necessitate compulsi, he did it constrained by unavoidable necessity, shewing he was forced to it against his will, by that which violateth and breaketh all law; which inferreth, he would not maintaine his action by law. Ad hoc relevare non volumus; this insinuates, he would ease them in good time. Caritatem exhibeant, they should afford him charity in the bearing of them, as if so be in point of justice or right they need not. Penes eundem excusetis, the bishop should excuse him to the people. By this he did clearly leave the point of justification, and so of right. Lastly, he promiseth he would visit and comfort them beneficiis compensativis, would give them recompence for those summes he had so raised of them; which sheweth that he claimed them not as due, for then he needed not give recompence for them.

In the one and twentieth yeere of E. 3. a petition was exhibited in parliament, that levies be not made by commission (so they be in this case) nor other things laid upon the people unless they be granted in parliament. The kings answer is, if any such impositions were made, it was by great necessity, and with assent of the prelates barons and some of the commons present; yet he will not that such impositions not duly made be drawne in consequence. Here the king acknowledgeth an imposition not to be duly made, though with the content of the higher house and some of the commons, because it was not in full parliament: much rather he would have thought so, if it had been by the king alone.

King E. 4. (that was a rough and warlike prince, and was more beholding to his sword in the recovery of his right to the crowne then to the affection of the people) at a parliament held the seventh yeere of his raigne made a speech to the commons, sir John Say being then speaker, in which speech is contained very notable matter, and very pertinent to our purpose; and because the record is not in print, I will set downe the kings speech verbatim as it is entred upon the parliament roll, and then I will make a paraphrase upon it. 'John Say, and ye firs come to this my court of parliament for the commons of this my realme. The cause why I have cald and summoned this my present parliament, is, that I purpose to live upon mine own, and not to charge my subjects but in great and urgent causes, concerning more the weale of themselves, and also the defence of them and of this my realme, rather than mine owne pleasure, as heretofore by commons of this land hath bene done, and borne unto my progenitors in time of need; wherein I trust, that yee firs, and all the commons of this my land, will be as tender and kinde unto me in such cases as heretofore any commons have been to any of my progenitors. And for the goodwill, kindness, and true hearts that yee have borne, continued, and shewed to me at all times heretofore, I thanke you as heartily as I can. Also I trust yee will continue in time coming; for which by the grace of God I shall be to you as good and gracious a king, and reigne as righteously upon you, as ever did any of my progenitors upon commons of this my realme in dayes past, and shall also in time of need apply my person for the weale and defence of you, and of this my realme, not sparing my body nor life for any jeopardy that might happen to the same.'

Out of this, we may observe first the kings protestation to live of his owne, and not to charge his subjects; by which I gather he did acknowledge a certain and distinct property of that which was his subjects from that which was his own, which excludeth the right to impose at his will; for if that be admitted, the subjects property is proprietas precaria, not certaine how much of his is his owne; for that is his which the king will leave him; for there is no limit or restraint of the quantity, the right being admitted, but only the kings will.--The second thing I observe is this, that in charging of his subjects he would confine himselfe between these two bounds. The one, it should bee in great and urgent causes concerning more the weale of them, and the defence of them and his realme, than his owne pleasure; wherein he condemneth those occasions that grew upon excess of private expence by over great bounty, or otherwise, and admitteth onely such as grow by reason of warres, or other such like publique causes concerning the whole state. The other bound or limit is, that those burdens should be secundum morem majorum, as heretofore had been done and borne by the commons to his ancestours in time of need.--The third thing I observe is, that he acknowledged these burdens did proceed out of their good-will and kindness, and not out of his right and prerogative; out of these words, that he trusted they would bee as tender and kinde to him in such cases, as heretofore any commons had been to his progenitors.--And lastly, wee may note the recompence promised by the king to his subjects, for their good wills and kindness, his goodness and grace, his just and righteous government, the jeopardy of his body and life for their weale and defence. Did this king assume to himselfe a right to lay burdens on his subjects at his own will without their assents, that offered to buy them at his need with the price of his blood, the most sacred relique in the kingdome?

4. My fourth observation is, that in all petitions exhibited by the commons in parliament against impositions, the very knot of their griefe, and the principall cause of their complaint, hath been expressed in those petitions, that the impositions have been without assent of parliament; by which is necessarily inferred, that their griefe was in point of right, not of burden.

In 21 E. 3. nu. 11. the complaint of the imposition of two shillings upon a sacke of wooll, two shillings upon a tonne of wine, six-pence upon aver de pois, the cause of grievance expressed, because it was done sans assent de commons.

25 E. 3. nu. 22. In a petition the commons complained, that an imposition upon wools was set by the consent of the merchants; they pray that commissions bee not made upon such singular grants, if they be not in full parliament; and if any such grants be made, they may be held as void.

17 E. 3. nu. 28. The commons in their petition informe the king, it is against reason they should be charged with impositions set on by assent of merchants, and not in parliament.

5. My fifth observation is, that, whensoever any petition was exhibited against impositions, there was never any respect had of the quantity, but they were ever intirely abated, as well where they were small, as where they were great; no request ever made to make them less when they were great, nor excuse made of their ease when they were exceeding small; which sheweth, that it was not the point of burden or excess was respected in their complaint, but the point of meere right.

25 E. 3. nu. 22. Fourty shillings set an imposition upon a sacke of wooll, upon complaint, all taken off, and no suit to be eased of part because it was too great.

36 E. 3. nu. 26. Three shillings and four-pence upon a sack of wool all taken off, and no excuse made for the smallness; for 21 E. 3. nu. 11 two shillings a sack, two shillings tonnage, and six-pence poundage.

50 E. 3. nu. 163. A great complaint was made in parliament by the commons, that an imposition of a penny was set upon wools for tonnage over and above the ancient due, which was but a penny, and so the subject was charged with two-pence; also that a penny was exacted for melfonage, which was but an half-penny; which impositions the record doth expresse did amount to an hundred pounds a yeere.

This petty imposition was as much stood upon in point of right, as the other great one of forty shillings, and was taken off upon complaint in parliament, without either justification or excuse for the smallness of it.

6. My sixth observation is, that those which have advised the setting on of impositions without assent of parliament, have been accused in parliament for giving that advice, as of a great offence in the state, and have suffered sharpe censure and great disgrace by it.

Neither doe I finde that the quality of the person hath extenuated the blame; as 50 E. 3. William lord Latimer chamberlaine to the king, and one of his private counsell, was accused by the commons in parliament of divers deceits and extortions and misdeeds, and among other things, that he had procured to be set upon wooll woollfells and other merchandizes, new impositions, to wit, upon a sack of wooll eleven shillings, which the lord Latimer sought to excuse, because he had the consent and good liking of the merchants first. But judgment was given against him, that he should be committed to prison, be fined and ransomed at the kings will, and be put from being of the council; and this procuring of impositions to be set on without assent of parliament is expressly set down in the entry of the judgment for one of the causes of his censure.

Richard Lyons, a farmer of the customs in London, the same year was accused in parliament for the same offence. He pleaded, he did it by the kings command, and had answered the money to the kings chamber: yet was condemned and adjudged in parliament to be committed to prison, and all his lands and goods were seised into the kings hand. And at the last the hate against these authors of impositions grew so, that 50 E. 3. in the same parliament, a petition was exhibited in parliament to make this a capital offence. The record is very short, and therefore I will set it down verbatim. Item prie le dit common, que soit ordaine per statute en cest present parliament de tous ceux, queux cy en avant mittont ou font par leur singular profit novels impositions per leur autorite demesne, accrocheants al eux eny ul power de riens que soit establi en parliament, sans assent de parliament, que ils ayent judgement de vie & member, & de forisfacture. To this rough petition the king gave a milde and temperate answer, courre la common ley come estoit al avant us.

7. My seventh observation is, the cessation between 50 E. 3. after this censure in parliament and 4 Mariae, almost two hundred years, during which time no king did attempt to impose without assent of parliament. And yet we finde in the parliament rolls, that there was not one of those kings that reigned in that time, but had impositions granted him upon fit occasion by act of parliament upon all goods and merchandizes, and at divers times during their reigns, sometimes more, sometimes less upon the ton and pound, but ever for a time certain, and indefinite. So the use of them was not given over, but the power of imposing was so clearly and undoubtedly held to be in the parliament, as no king went about to practise the contrary.

But to this cessation, that was of great weight and credit in our evidence, a colour was given by the other side, to avert the inference made upon it against the kings right, that is, that during that time there was so great a revenue grew to the crown by double custom paid for all merchandizes both in England and at Callais, by reason of an act of parliament made 8 H. 4. which was, that no goods should be carried out of the realm but to Callais, and by reason that the merchants paid custom both there and here for the same goods, that in the seven and twentieth year of Henry the sixth, the custom of Callais was 68000 l. the year; a great sum, if you consider the weight of money then, what price it bare; and by reason hereof princes not delighting to charge their murmuring subjects but when need is, being so amply supplied otherwise, did not put that prerogative in practice.

To this I answer, that if that were true that was urged, it might be some probable colour of the forbearance of imposing. But I finde it quite contrary, and that by record: for there was no such restraint of all commodities not to be transported to any place but Callais, but onely woolls woollfells leather tinn and lead, that were staple wares, which by the statute 37 E. 3. were to be transported thither, and not to any other place, and the staple continued at that place for the most part from that time untill long after, 27 H. 6. but there was no double custom paid both here and there by the same owner: but the yearly profits of the customs of Callais at those times were so far short of that which hath been alledged in 27 H. 6.

that it appeareth in an act of parliament, 27 H. 6. cap. 2. printed in the book at large, that the commons do complain, that, whereas in the time of E. 3. the custom of Callais was 68000 l. per annum, at that time, which was 27 H. 6. by reason of the ill usage of merchants, it was fallen to be but 12000 pounds the year. So then there was great cause in that respect to have set on impositions by reason of that great abatement of customs, and yet it was not then offered to be done without assent of parliament. But if you look a little further into the extreme necessities of those times, you shall finde there never was greater cause to have strained prerogatives; for it appeareth in an act of parliament, 28 H. 6. that it was then declared in parliament by the chancellor and treasurer, who demanded relief of the people for the king, both for payment of his debts and for his yearly livelihood, that the king was then indebted 372000 l. which now by the weight of money amounteth to above 1100000 l. and that his ordinary expences were more then his yearly revenue by 19000 l. yearly. So if ever there was cause to put a king to his shifts, it was then; yet we see they did not venture to put in practice this supposed prerogative. It further appeareth in that statute, that the people, among those reasons they alleadged, why they were not able to retain the king, gave this for one, that they had so often granted him tonnage and poundage upon merchandizes, by which it appeareth he took nothing of merchants by imposition without grant; for if he had, no doubt they would not have stuck to have put him in mind of it. But I pray consider, what became of this motion of the chancellor and treasurer. The proposition had depended in parliament many years. The effect was, the people entreated the king to resume all grants he had made from the beginning of his reign untill that time, being the twenty-eighth year of his reign, excepting such as were made upon consideration valuable, that he might so enable himself by that mean by which he had impoverished himself and the whole kingdom. This took effect, and the statute of resumption was thereupon made the same year; which record, because it is not in print, and declareth these things with great gravity and authority, I will set down the very text of it, so much as is material to our purpose.

Prayen your commons in this your present parliament assembled to consider, that where your chancellor of your realm of England, your treasurer of England, and many other lords of your council, by your high commandment to your said commons, at your parliament holden last at Westminster, shewed and declared the state of this your realm, which was that ye were indebted 372000 l. which is grievous, and that your livelihood in yearly value was but 5000 l. And forasmuch as this 5000 l. to your high and notable state to be kept, and to pay your said debts, will not suffice: therefore that your high estate may be relieved. And furthermore it was declared, that your expences necessary to your household without all other ordinary charge came to 24000 l. yearly, which exceedeth every year in expence necessary over your livelihood 19000 l. Also pleaseth it your highness to consider, that the commons of your said realm be as well willing to their power, for the relieving of your highness, as ever was people to any king of your progenitors that reigned in your said realm of England: but your said commons been so impoverished, what by taking victual to your household, and other things in your said realm, and nought paid for it, and the quinzime by your said commons so often granted, and by the grant of tunnage and poundage, and by the grant of subsidy upon woolls, and other grants to your highness, and for lack of execution of justice, that your said poor commons be full nigh destroyed; and if it should continue longer in such great charge, it would not in any wife he had, ne born. Wherefore pleaseth it your highness, the premisses graciously to consider, and that ye by the advice and assent of your lords spiritual and temporal, and by the authority of this your present parliament, for the consideration of your high estate, and in comfort and ease of your poor commons, would take, resume, seise and retain in your hands and possession all honors, &c.

This was very plain dealing by the people with their king, and this is the success of the demand of supply and support had in those days, being required in point of gratification, without any recompence or retribution for it. Thus then we have cleared this point, that between 50 E. 3. and 4 Mariae, there was not one imposition set without assent of parliament.

Queen Mary in the fourth year of her reign, upon the wars with France, set an imposition upon clothes for this consideration, that the custom of woolls was decayed, by reason for the most part they were made into clothes, which afforded little custom; for that which in wooll paid for custom and subsidy 40 s. made into cloth paid but 4 s. 4 d. To recompence this by an indifferent equality, there was set upon a cloth 5 s. 6 d. which imposition did not make up the loss sustained in the custom of wooll, by 13 s. 4 d. in 40 s. This was justum, but not justi. This religious prince, invironed with infinite troubles in the church and commonwealth, and much impoverished by her devotion, in renouncing the profits of the church-lands that were in the crown by the suppression, was the first that made digression from the steps of her worthy progenitors, in putting on that imposition without assent of parliament; for that very consideration of the loss of custom, by turning of wooll to clothing, came into treaty in the 24 year of E. 3. when the art of clothing began first to be much practised in this kingdom; and then in the recompence of the loss so sustained in the decay of custom of woolls, there was set upon a cloth by act of parliament above the olde custom, 14 d. for a denizen, and for an alien 21 d. This is recited in a record in the Exchequer, 48 E. 3. Rot. 2. R. Thef. in origin. But I pray you examine, how this imposition of queen Mary was digested by the people. We see in the case of my lord Dier, 1 El. fol. 165. that the merchant found great grief at it, and made exclamation and suit to queen Elizabeth to be unburdened of it. The very reason of their grief expressed in that case is, because it was not set on by parliament, but by the queens absolute power; so that was the ground of that complaint, the very point of right.

This cause was referred to all the judges, to report whether the queen might set on this imposition without assent of parliament. They divers times had conference about it, but have not yet made report for the king; which is an infallible presumption, that their opinions were not for him. For it is a certain rule among us, that if a question, concerning the kings prerogative or his profit, be referred to the judges, if their opinions be for the king, it will be speedily published, and it were indiscretion to conceal it; but if there be no publication, then we make no doubt, but that their opinions are either against the king, or at least they stick, and give none for him.

The same queen Mary, upon restraint of bringing in of French commodities occasioned by the then wars with France, set an imposition upon Gascoyn wines, which continueth yet. So the kingdom of England by the injustice of that prince was clogged with these two heavy impositions.

28 H. 6. Stat. de Resump. in Turri Lond. not printed.

Orig. in Stat. 48 E. 3. Rot. 2. R. Thef. 1 El. Dier. fol. 165.

impositions, contrary to the right of the kingdom and the acts of her progenitors.

Queen Elizabeth set on that upon sweet wines, which grew also upon the occasion of the troubles with Spain. That upon allome was none. It was rather a monopoly to master Smith the customer of London, for the ingrossing of all allomes into his own hands, for which priviledge he gave a voluntary imposition upon that commodity. It was like the priviledge granted to John Pechey of the sweet wines by E. 3. for which the patentee was called into the parliament house, 50. E. 3. and was there punished, and his patent taken away and cancelled.

What impositions have been set on in the kings time, I need not express. They are set down particularly in the book of rates that is in print. They are not easily numbered. The time for which they are raised is not short. The patent prefixed to that book, bearing date 28 Julii, 6 Jacobi, will instruct you sufficiently in that point. They be limited to the king, his heirs and successors; which I suppose is the first estate of fee simple of impositions that ever man read of.

8. My eighth and last observation is upon tunnage and poundage given to the king of this realm, upon wares and merchandizes exported and imported, which is an imposition by act of parliament, and, as it will appear, was given out of the peoples good-will, as a very gratification to the king, to enjoy him thereby from the desire of voluntary impositions, and to conclude him by that gift in parliament from attempting to take any other without assent of parliament. For after the ceasing of voluntary impositions, these parliamentary ones were frequent in the times of the king that succeeded. But they were never given but for years, with expresse caution how the money should be bestowed; as towards the defence of the seas, protection of traffick, or some such other publick causes. Sometimes special sequestrators made by act of parliament, by whose hands the money should be delivered, as 5 R. 2. cap.

3. in a printed statute. The rates that were given were very variable, sometimes 2 s. tunnage, and 6 d. poundage, as 7 R. 2. 3 s. tunnage, and 12 d. poundage, 10 R. 2. which grants were not to endure, the longest of them, above a year; 18 d. tunnage, 6 d. poundage, in 17 R. 2. 3 s. tunnage and 12 d. poundage granted to H. 4. in the thirteenth year of his reign for a certain time, in which statute there is this clause, that this aide in time to come should not be taken for an example to charge the lords and commons in manner of subsidy, unless it be by the wills of the lords and commons, and that by a new grant to be made in full parliament in time to come. This clause in good and proper construction may be taken to be a very convention between the king and his people in parliament, that he should not from thenceforth, nor any of his successors, set on impositions without assent of parliament. The like imposition was granted to H. 5. in the first year of his reign for a short time towards the defence of the realm, and safeguard of the sea, upon condition expressed in the act, that the merchants denizens and strangers coming into the realm with their merchandizes, should be well and honestly used and handled, paying the said subsidy as in the time of his father, and his noble progenitors kings of England, without oppression or extortion. In the end of which act the commons protested being bound by any grant in time to come, for the purposes aforesaid.

H. 6. in the one and thirtieth year of his reign, had tunnage and poundage given him for his life. E. 4. had it given him the third year of his reign, as it appeareth in a statute 12 E. 4. cap. 3. H. 8. in the sixth year of his reign, and all since in the first year of their reigns have had it given them for term of their life; and being now so certainly settled, do reach further at that, from which they are in conscience and honor excluded by this voluntary gratification. For can any man give me a reason, why the people should give this imposition of tunnage and poundage above the due custom upon all commodities, if the king by his prerogative might set on impositions without assent of parliament? And were not that a weak action in a king, to take that of his people as a benevolence from them, with limitation of the same, and in what it should be employed, and how they will be used for it, and for what time he shall have it, which he might justly take without their consents, unclogged of these displeasing incumbrances?

The statutes of tunnage and poundage made in our times, that are altogether inclined to flattery, do yet retain in them certain shews and rumors of those ancient liberties, although indeed the substance be lost. As in the statute 1 Jac. cap. 33. we declare, that we trust, and have sure confidence of his majesties good-will towards us, in and for the keeping and sure defending of the seas; and that it will please his highness, that all merchants, as well denizens as strangers, coming into this realm, be well and honestly entreated and demeaned for such things whereof subsidy is granted, as they were in the time of the kings progenitors and predecessors, without oppression to them to be done. By this clause, as it now continueth, the true intent of this statute appeareth to be, that there ought no other imposition to be laid upon merchants besides these given by this statute; and this intention hath been well interpreted by use and practice from the time of E. 3. to the time of queen Mary, as before is declared.

Thus much of this last reason, made from observation, and the action of our nation.

I will answer now such main objections as have been made against the peoples right, and have not been touched by me either in my passage through this discourse.

That which hath been most insisted upon is this, that the king by his prerogative royal hath the custody of the havens and ports of this island, being the very-gates of this kingdom; that he in his royal function and office is onely trusted with the keys of these gates; that he alone hath power to shut them, and to open them when, and to whom he in his princely wisdom shall see good; that by the law of England he may restrain the persons of any from going out of the land, or from coming into it;

that he may of his own power and discretion prohibit exportation and importation of goods and merchandizes; and out of his prerogative and pre-eminence, the power of imposing, as being derivative, doth arise and result; for cui quod majus est licet, & ei quod est minus licitum est. So their reason briefly is this; the king may restrain the passage of the person, and of the goods; therefore he may suffer them not to pass, but sub modo, paying such an imposition for his sufferance, as he shall set upon them.

For the grounds and propositions laid in this objection, I shall not be much against any one of them. Others of them must be qualified, ere they be confessed. But the inference and argument made upon them, I utterly deny; for in it there is mutatio hypothesis, and a transition from a thing of one nature to a thing of another. As the premises are of a power in the king onely fiduciary, and in point of trust and government, the conclusion infers a right of interest and gain.—Admit the king had custodiam portuum; yet he hath but the custody, which is trust, and not dominium utile. He hath power to open and shut upon consideration of publike good to the people and state, but not to make gain and benefit by it. The one is protection, the other is expropriation. The ports in their own nature are publike, free for all to go in and out; yet for the common good this liberty is restrainable by the wisdom and policy of the prince, who is put in trust to discern the times when this natural liberty shall be restrained. In 1 H. 7. fol. 10. in the case of the Florentines for their allome, the lord chief justice Hussy doth write a case, that in the time of E. 4. a legate from the pope being at Calais to come into England, it was resolved in full council, as the book saith, before the lords and judges, that he should not have licence to come into England unless he would take an oath at Calais, that he would bring nothing with him that should be prejudicial to the king and his crown.—The king by the common-law may send his writ, ne exeas regnum, to any subject of the realm; but the furmise of the writ is, quia datum est nobis intelligi, quod tu versus partes externas absque licentia nostra clam definas te divertere, et quamplurima nobis et coronæ nostræ prejudicia prosequi. Fitzh. N. B. 85. b. So in point of government, and common good of the realm, he may restrain the person. But to conclude therefore he may take money not to restrain, is to sell government, trust and common justice, and most unworthy the divine office of a king.

But let us compare this power of the king in foreign affairs, with the like power he hath in domestick government. There is no question but that the king hath the custody of the gates of all the towns and cities in England, as well as all the ports and havens, and upon consideration of the weal publike may open and shut them at his pleasure. As if the infection of the sickness be dangerous in places vicine to the city of London, the king may command that none from those places shall come into the city. May he therefore set an imposition upon those that he suffereth to come into the city? So, if by reason of infection he forbid the bringing of wares and merchandizes from some cities or towns in this kingdom to any great fair or mart, shall he therefore restrain the bringing of goods thither, unless money be given him by way of imposition? The king in his discretion, in point of equity, and for qualifying the rigor of the law, may enjoyn any of his subjects by his chancellor from suing in his court of common-law. May he therefore make a benefit by restraining all from suit in his courts, unless they pay him an imposition upon their suits? In 2 E. 3. in the case of the earl of Richmond before-cited, the king had granted unto the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ships that arrived at the port of Yarmouth, which consisted of three several ports, Great Yarmouth, Little Yarmouth, and Gerneston, should arrive all at Great Yarmouth, and at no other place within that port. The lawfulness of this patent being in question in the kings court, it was reasoned in the kings behalf for the upholding of the grant, as it is now, that the king had the custody of the port; he might restrain merchants from landing at all in his kingdom; therefore out of the same power might appoint where, and in what haven they should land, and no other. This patent was demurred on in the Kings Bench, as being granted against the law; but the case depending was adjourned into parliament for the weight and consequence of it, and there the patent was condemned, and a law made against such and the like grants. 9 E. 3. cap. 1.

The presidents, that were vouched for maintenance of this power of restraint in the king, were four produced almost in so many hundred years, whereof two were in the second year of E. 1. one in the tenth year of E. 3. another in the seventeenth year of H. 6. since which time we hear of none but by act of parliament, as they had been usually and regularly before. To these I will give answer out of themselves, out of the common-law, out of divers statutes, and out of the practice of the common-wealth. The restraints in the time of E. 1. one of them was to forbid the carrying of wooll out of the realm, the other was to forbid all traffick with the Flemings. That of 10 E. 3. was to restrain the exportation of ship-timber out of the realm. That of 17 H. 6. to prohibit traffique with the subjects of the duke of Burgundy. These presidents are rare, yet they have in them inducements out of publike respects to the common-wealth. For the rule of common-law in this case, I take it to be as the reverend judge sir Anthony Fitzherbert holds in his writ of ne exeas regnum in Nat. Br. that by the common-law any man may go out of the kingdom, but the king may upon causes touching the good of the commonwealth restrain any man from going by his writ or proclamation, and if he then go, it is a contempt. This opinion of his is confirmed by the book, 1. Eliz. fol. 165. Dier. 1. El. 12. and 13. Eliz. Dier. 296. In like manner if a subject of England be beyond sea, and the king send to him to repair home, if he do it not, his lands and goods shall be seised for the contempt; and this was the case of William de Britain earl of Richmond, 19 E. 2. He was sent by the king into Gascoyne on a message, and refused to return, for which contempt his goods chattels lands lands and tenements were seized into the kings hands. The record is cited 2 and 3. Phil. and Mar. in my lord Dier. fol. 128. b. and the law there held to be so at that time upon a question moved in the queens behalf against divers, that being beyond the seas refused to return upon commandment sent unto them to that purpose. The same is again for law confirmed in the dutchefs of Suffolke's case, 2 Eliz. Dier. 176. But the common-law was altered in this point by the statute of 5 R. 2. cap. 2. by which the passage of all people is defended, that they may not go without licence, except the lords and other great men of the realm, merchants, and souldiers. So for the merchants, which are the people dealt withal, in the business in hand, the common-law remaineth as it was before the statute; and so it was held, 12 El. Dier. 196. where the case was, an English merchant, being a papist, went over-sea, and, being there, did settle himself to remain there for the enjoying the freedom of his conscience. It was moved here in England, that his going without licence should be a contempt; because he went not to traffique as a merchant, but for the cause of religion. It was resolved, no such averment would be taken in this case; for that the very calling and vocation of being a merchant did give him liberty to go out of the kingdom when he would, and therefore the secret intent of his going was not to be enquired after. Sed lex inspicit quod verisimilius. Therefore it was in this case held no contempt. But at this day the law is as it was before, 5 R. 2. cap. 2. for that statute is repealed, 4 Jac. c. 1. 4 Jac. cap. 1. And all men whatsoever are now at liberty by the common-law to pass out of the realm. There is only against this inconvenient liberty a proclamation dated at Westminster, 9. Jul. 5 Jac. to the very same effect in point of restraint of passage with the statute of R. 2. So the subject is in this much the more at ease and liberty then he was before, that his going over-sea without licence doth not induce any forfeiture, but onely incurreth the censure of a contempt; and therefore it were to be wished that some firm law might be made in the case, both for the execution of so good a point of policy, and for the more quiet of the state, in knowing the certainty of the punishment for the offence.

This liberty and freedom of merchants hath been strengthened and confirmed by many notable laws before recited, as 14 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. 15 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 5. 18 E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 3. and divers other. And therefore though it be admitted that the king may restrain persons and goods, yet it may well be denied, that he hath power of himself alone without assent of parliament simply and indefinitely to restrain all traffique in general, or to shut up all the havens and ports, and to bar the vent and issuing of wares and merchandizes of the whole kingdom; as it appeareth plainly, that this hath been done this three hundred years, or near thereabouts, by act of parliament onely, and that the kingdom of England made this matter of traffique so tender a case to deal in, as that it hath ever held it a matter fit for the consultation of the great council of the kingdom, and for no other.

In 11 E. 3. the exportation of woolls was prohibited by act of parliament, in which statute there was this clause, untill that by the king and his council it be thereof otherwise provided: which power so given to the king, to be used for the good of the commonwealth, gave occasion to him to abuse it to his profit and commodity, by giving licences of transportation to all, that would give forty shillings upon a sack of wooll above the due custom. This appeareth in the records in the Exchequer, 13 E. 3. Rot. 2. Rem. Thes. I will describe the record, that you may perceive the ground of it the better. Rex collectoribus custumæ in portu magnæ Jermouth salutem. Quia concessimus dilecto & fideli nostro Hugoni de Wriothsley, quod ipse viginti & septem saccos lane & dimid. de lanis suis propriis in portu prædicto carriare, & eas usque Antwerpe ad stapulam nostram ibidem ducere possit, solvendo ibidem dilecto clerico nostro Willielmo de Northwel custodi guarderobæ nostræ 40 s. pro quolibet sacco pro custumæ & subsidio inde nobis debitis, &c. vobis mandamus, quod prædicti Hugon. dictos viginti septem saccos lane & dimid. in portu prædicto carriare permittatis, &c. And another the same year. Rex collectoribus custumæ, &c. Cum nuper ordinaverimus, quod passagium lanarum, &c. apertum existeret, & quod sigillum nostrum, quod dicitur coket, quod prius claudis & sub ferra custodiri mandavimus, aperiretur, & apertum teneretur; ideo vobis mandavimus, quod sigillum prædictum in portu prædicto aperiri, & apertum teneri faciatis, & omnes illos, qui hujusmodi lanas carriare et ducere velint, permittatis, receptis prius ab iisdem, viz. de mercatoribus & aliis indigenis 40 s. de quolibet sacco lane. Divers other such sales of traffick occasioned by this parliamentary restraint were made between 11 E. 3. that the restraint was made, and 14 E. 3. that this inconvenience being espied, the sea was opened by statute, and the restraint removed, 14 E. 3. stat. 2. c. 2. 15 E. 3. cap. 5. stat. 2. And this forty shillings so exacted was complained of as an imposition in parliament, and the occasion and the effect were both taken away together by act of parliament, 14 E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 21. and stat. 2. cap. 1.

It followed in all kings times sithence the death of E. 3. that this opening and shutting of the havens, restraining and enlarging of traffick, was done by act of parliament.

I will give one instance in the reign of every king. 5 R. 2. cap. 2. stat. 2. for the passage of wooll wooll-fells and leather. 6 H. 4. cap. 4. for the traffique and commerce with merchants aliens. 2 H. 5. cap. 6. stat. 2. for the restraint of staple commodities to places certain, and for the traffique of the merchants of the west. 27 H. 6. cap. 1. that is enacted in parliament, which is contained in the proclamation 17 H. 6. cited for a president, that is, because the duke of Burgundy made an ordinance whereby the traffick of the English nation was restrained, that therefore the Englishmen should not traffick with the subjects of the duke of Burgundy. The same thing enacted upon the like occasion, 4 E. 4. c. 1. 19 H. 7. c. 21. the importation of divers commodities forbidden, as being prejudicial to the manufactures within the realm. 6 H. 8. cap. 12. the exportation of Norfolk woolls out of the realm forbidden. 26 H. 8. cap. 10. power is given to the king to order and dispose of the traffick of merchants at his pleasure; and the reason is given, because otherwise the leagues and amities with foreign princes might be impeached by reason of restraint made by divers statutes then standing on foot; whereby it appeareth that it was not then taken to be law, that the king had an absolute power in himself to order and dispose of the course of traffick without help of a statute. 2 E. 6. cap. 9. exportation of leather restrained. 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. the exportation of herring, butter, cheese, and other victuals forbidden. 18 Eliz. cap. 8. the exportation of tallow, raw hides, leather. So in all times no use of proclamations in matters of this nature, but acts of parliament still procured. Wherefore in mine opinion it behoveth them that do so earnestly urge this argument, the king may restrain traffick, therefore may impose, to prove better then they have done, that the king may restrain traffick of his own absolute power: for as the natural policy and constitution of our commonwealth is, we may better say, that is law which is de more gentis, then that which floweth from the reason of any man guided by his general notion and apprehension of power regal, in genere, not in individuo.

The last assault made against the right of the kingdom, was an objection grounded upon policy, and matter of state; as, that it may so fall out that an imposition may be set by a foreign prince that may wring our people, in which case the counterpoise is, to set on the like here upon the subjects of that prince; which policy, if it be not speedily executed, but stayed until a parliament, may in the mean time prove vain and idle, and much damage may be sustained that cannot afterwards be remedied.

This strain of policy maketh nothing to the point of right. Our rule is in this plain commonwealth of ours, oportet neminem esse sapienterem legibus. If there be an inconvenience, it is fitter to have it removed by a lawful means, then by an unlawful. But this is rather a mischief then an inconvenience; that is, a prejudice in present of some few, but not hurtful to the commonwealth. And it is more tolerable to suffer an hurt to some few for a short time, then to give way to the breach and violation of the right of the whole nation; for that is the true inconvenience. Neither need it be so difficult or tedious to have the consent of the parliament, if they were held as they ought, or might be. But our surest guide in this will be the example of our ancestors in this very case, and that in the time of one of the most politick princes that ever reigned in this kingdom. 7 H. 7. cap. 7. you shall finde an act of parliament, in which it was recited that the Venetians had set upon the English merchants that laded malmseys at Candy four duckets of gold upon a butt, which in sterling is eighteen shillings the butt. It was therefore enacted, that every merchant stranger, that brought malmsey into this kingdom, should pay eighteen shillings the butt over and above the due custom used; this imposition to endure, until they of Venice had set aside that of four duckets the butt upon the Englishmen.

Much hath been learnedly uttered upon this argument in the maintenance of the peoples right, and in answering that which hath been pressed on the contrary. But my meaning is not to express in this discourse all that hath or may be said on either side, but onely to make a remembrance somewhat larger of that which I myself offered as my symbol towards the making up of this great reckoning of the commonwealth, which if it be not well audited, may in time cost the subjects of England very dear. My hope is of others, that labored very worthily in this business, that they will not suffer their pains to die, and therefore I have fore-born to enter into their province. I will end with that saying of that true and honest counsellor Philip Comines in his fifth book, the 18 chapter, that it is more honorable for a king to say, 'I have so faithful and obedient subjects, that they deny me nothing I demand,' then to say, 'I levy what me list, and I have priviledges so to do.'

[At the end of the foregoing argument by Yelverton, an extract from a petition of grievances addressed by the commons to king James in 1610 is added, one subject of which is impositions by prerogative. But the whole petition is in Mr. Petyt's Jus Parliamentarium; and as we are not aware, that it is to be found either in the Parliamentary History, the Journals of the Commons, or any other printed book, except the two before mentioned, it is here inserted as a fragment of some curiosity. To this petition, we shall add lord Bacon's speech on presenting it to the king. The king's answer to so much of the petition as regarded impositions, is in the Parliamentary History, vol. 5. p. 239. Mr. Petyt, in his book before cited, gives some remarks of his own on the subject, with an extract from the Journal of the Lords for 23d May and 6th June 1612, when it was unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the opinion of the judges on the question of impositions.]

To the king's most excellent majesty.

Most gracious sovereign,

Grievances complained

YOUR majesty's most humble commons assembled in parliament, being moved as well out of their duty and zeal to your majesty, as out of the sense of just grief, wherewith your loving subjects are generally through the whole realm at this time possessed, because they perceive their common and ancient right and liberty to be much declined and infringed in these late years, do with all duty and humility present these our just complaints thereof to your gracious view, most instantly craving justice therein, and due redress.

And although it be true, that many of the particulars, whereof we now complain, were of some use in the late queen's time, and then not much impugned, because the usage of them being then more moderate, gave not so great occasion of offence, and consequently not so much cause to enquire into the right and validity of them; yet the right being now more thoroughly scanned, by reason of the great mischiefs and inconveniencies which the subjects have thereby sustained: we are very confident that your majesty will be so far from thinking it a point of honour or greatness to continue any grievance upon your people, because you found them begun in your predecessor's times, as you will rather hold it a work of great glory to reform them; since your majesty knoweth well, that neither continuance of time, nor errors of men, can or ought to prejudice truth or justice; and that nothing can be more worthy of so worthy a king, nor more answerable to the great wisdom and goodness which abound in you, than to understand the griefs, and redress the wrongs of so loyal and well deserving people.

In this confidence, dread sovereign, we offer these grievances (the particulars whereof are hereunder set down) to your gracious consideration.

And we offer them out of the greatest loyalty and duty, that subjects can bear to their prince; most humbly and instantly beseeching your majesty, as well for justice sake (more than which, as we conceive, in these petitions we do not seek) as also for the better assurance of the state, and general repose of your faithful and loving subjects, and for testimony of your gracious acceptance of their full affections; declared as well by their joyful receiving of your majesty at your happy entrance into these kingdoms, which you have been often pleased with favour to remember, as also by their extraordinary contributions granted since unto you, such as have been never yielded to any former prince, upon the like terms and occasions, that we may receive to these our complaints your most gracious answer.

Which we cannot doubt but will be such as may be worthy of your princely self, and will give satisfaction and great comfort to all your loyal and most dutiful loving subjects, who do and will pray for the happy preservation of your most royal majesty.

The policy and constitution of this your kingdom appropriates unto the kings of this realm, with the assent of the parliament, as well the sovereign power of making laws, as that of taxing, or imposing upon the subjects goods or merchandizes, wherein they have justly such a propriety, as may not without their consent be altered or changed.

This is the cause that the people of this kingdom, as they ever shewed themselves faithful and loving to their kings, and ready to aid them in all their just occasions with voluntary contributions; so have they been ever careful to preserve their own liberties and rights, when any thing hath been done to prejudice or impeach the same.

And therefore, when their princes, occasioned either by their wars, or their over great bounty, or by any other necessity, have without consent of parliament set impositions either within the land, or upon commodities either exported or imported by the merchants; they have in open parliament complained of it, in that it was done without their consents; and thereupon never failed to obtain a speedy and full redress, without any claim made by the kings of any power or prerogative in that point.

And though the law of propriety be originally and carefully preserved by the common laws of this realm, which are as ancient as the kingdom itself; yet these famous kings, for the better contentment and assurance of their loving subjects, agreed, that this old fundamental right should be farther declared and established by act of parliament: wherein it is provided, that no such charges should ever be laid upon the people, without their common consent; as may appear by sundry records of former times.

We therefore, your majesty's most humble commons assembled in parliament, following the example of this worthy care of our ancestors, and out of a duty to those for whom we serve, finding that your majesty, without advice or consent of parliament, hath lately in time of peace set both greater impositions, and far more in number, than any your noble ancestors did ever in time of war, have with all humility presumed to present this most just and necessary petition unto your majesty, that all impositions set without the assent of parliament may be quite abolished and taken away; and that your majesty, in imitation likewise of your noble progenitors, will be pleased, that a law may be made during this session of parliament, to declare, that all impositions set or to be set upon your people, their goods or merchandises, save only by common assent in parliament, are and shall be void: wherein your majesty shall not only give your subjects good satisfaction in point of their right, but also bring exceeding joy and comfort to them which now suffer; partly through the abating the price of native commodities, and partly through the raising of all foreign; to the overthrow of merchants and shipping; the causing of a general dearth and decay of wealth among your people, who will be hereby no less discouraged than disabled to supply your majesty, when occasion shall require it.

Whereas by the statute 1 Eliz. cap. 1. intituled, an act restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical, &c. power was given to the queen and her successors, to constitute and make a commission in causes ecclesiastical; Commissions ecclesiastical.

The said act is found to be inconvenient and of dangerous extent in divers respects:

First, For that it enableth the making of such a commission, as well to any one subject born as to more.

Secondly, For that, whereas by the intention and words of the statute, ecclesiastical jurisdiction is restored to the crown, and your highness by that statute enabled to give only such power ecclesiastical to the said commissioners; yet under colour of some words in that statute, where the commissioners are authorized to execute their commission, according to the tenor and effect of your highness's letters patents, and by letters patents grounded thereupon; the said commissioners do fine and imprison, and exercise other authority not belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction restored by that statute; which we conceive to be a great wrong to the subject; and that those commissioners might as well, by colour of those words, if they were so authorized by your highness's letters patents, fine without stint, and imprison without limitation of time; as also, according to will and discretion, without any rules of law, spiritual or temporal, adjudge and impose utter confiscation of goods, forfeiture of lands; yea and the taking away of a limb, and of life itself; and this for any matter whatsoever pertaining to spiritual jurisdiction. Which never was nor could be meant by the makers of that law.

Thirdly, For that by the statute, the king and his successors (however your majesty hath been pleased out of your gracious disposition otherwise to order) may make and direct such commission into all the counties and dioceses, yea into every parish of England; and thereby all causes may be taken from jurisdiction of bishops, chancellors and archdeacons, and laymen solely to be enabled to excommunicate and exercise all other censures spiritual.

Fourthly, That every petty offence, pertaining to spiritual jurisdiction, is by colour of the said words and letters patents, grounded thereupon, made subject to excommunication and punishment by that strange and exorbitant power and commission; whereby the least offenders, not committing any thing of any enormous or high nature, may be drawn from the most remote places of the kingdom to London or York; which is very grievous and inconvenient.

Fifthly, For that limit touching causes subject to this commission, being only with these words; viz. such as pertain to spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction; it is very hard to know what matters or offences are included in that number: and the rather because it is unknown, what ancient canons or laws spiritual are in force, and what not. From hence ariseth great inconveniency, and occasion of contention.

And whereas upon the same statute a commission ecclesiastical is made, therein is grievance apprehended thus:

First, For that thereby the same men have both spiritual and temporal jurisdiction, and may both force the party by oath to accuse himself of any offence, and also enquire thereof by a jury: and lastly, may inflict for the same offence at the same time, and by one and the same sentence, both a spiritual and a temporal jurisdiction.

Secondly, Whereas upon sentences of deprivation or other spiritual censures given by force of ordinary jurisdiction, an appeal lyeth for the party aggrieved, that is here excluded by express words of the commission. Also here is to be a trial by jury, yet no remedy by traverse nor attain; neither can a man have any writ of error, though a judgment or sentence be given against him, amounting to the taking away of all his goods, and imprisoning of him during life, yea, to the adjudging him in case of præmunire, whereby his lands are forfeited, and he out of the protection of the law.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, That whereas penal laws and offences against the same cannot be determined in other courts, or by other persons than by those trusted by parliament with the execution thereof; yet the execution of many such statutes (divers whereof were made since the first of Eliz.) are commended and committed to these commissioners ecclesiastical, who are either to inflict the punishment contained in the statute being præmunire, and of other high nature, and so enforce a man upon his own oath to accuse and expose himself to those punishments, or else to inflict other temporal punishments at their pleasure. And yet besides and after that done, the party shall be subject, in the courts mentioned in the acts, to punishment by the same acts appointed and inflicted. Which we think very unreasonable.

Fourthly, That the commission giveth authority to enforce men called into question, to enter into recognizance, not only for appearance from time to time, but also for performance of whatsoever shall be by the commissioners ordered.

And also that it giveth power to enjoin parties defendant or accused to pay such fees to the ministers of the court, as by the commissioners shall be thought fit.

And touching the execution of the commission, it is found grievous these ways among other:

First, For that laymen are by the commissioners punished for speaking (otherwise than in judicial places and courses) of the simony and other misdemeanors of the spiritual men, though the thing spoken be true, and the speech tending to the inducing of some condign punishment.

Secondly, in that these commissioners usually appoint and allot to women discontented at and unwilling to live with their husbands, such portion and allowance for present maintenance, as to them shall seem meet; to the great encouragement to wives to be disobedient and contemptuous against their husbands.

Thirdly, in that their pursuivants and other ministers employed in the apprehension of suspected offenders in any thing spiritual, and in the searching for any supposed scandalous books, use to break open men's houses, closets, and desks, rifling all corners and secret custodies, as in cases of high treason or suspicion thereof.

All which premises, amongst other things considered, your majesty's most loyal and dutiful commons in all humbleness beseech you, that, for the easing of them, as well from the present grievance, as from the fear and possibility of greater in times future, your highness would vouchsafe your royal assent and allowance to and for the ratifying of the said statute, and the reducing thereof, and consequently of the said commission, to reasonable and convenient limits, by some act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

Amongst many other points of happiness and freedom, which your majesty's subjects of this kingdom have enjoyed under your royal progenitors, kings and queens of this realm, there is none which they have accounted more dear and precious than this, to be guided and governed by certain rule of law, which giveth both to the head and members that which of right belongeth to them; and not by any uncertain or arbitrary form of government.

Which, as it hath proceeded from the original and constitution and temperature of this estate, so hath it been the principal means of upholding the same in such sort, as that their kings have been just, beloved, happy and glorious; and the kingdom itself peaceable, flourishing and durable, so many ages.

And the effect, as well of the contentment that the subjects of this kingdom have taken in this form of government, as also of the love, respect and duty, which they have, by reason of the same, rendered unto their princes, may appear in this, that they have, as occasion hath required, yielded more extraordinary and voluntary contributions to assist their kings, than the subjects of any other known kingdom whatsoever.

Out of this root hath grown the indubitable right of the people of this kingdom, not to be made subject to any punishment that shall extend to their lives, lands, bodies or goods, other than such as are ordained by the common laws of this land, or the statutes made by their common consent in parliament.

Nevertheless, it is apparent, both that proclamations have been of late years much more frequent than heretofore, and that they are extended, not only to the liberty, but also to the goods, inheritances, and livelihood of men; some of them tending to alter some points of the law, and make them new:

Other some made shortly after a session of parliament, for matter directly rejected in the same session:

Others appointing punishments to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction;

Some containing penalties in form of penal statutes;

Some referring the punishment of offenders to the courts of arbitrary discretion, which have laid heavy and grievous censures upon the delinquents:

Some, as the proclamation for starch, accompanied with letters commanding enquiry to be made against the transgressors at the quarter sessions:

And some vouching former proclamations, to countenance and warrant the latter; as by a catalogue hereunder written more particularly appeareth.

By reason whereof there is a general fear conceived and spread amongst your majesty's people, that proclamations will by degrees grow up and increase to the strength and nature of laws.

Whereby not only that ancient happiness [freedom] will be as much blemished (if not quite taken away) which their ancestors have so long enjoyed;

But the same may also (in process of time) bring a new form of arbitrary government upon the realm.

And this our fear is the more increased, by occasion as well of certain books lately published, which ascribe a greater power to proclamations than heretofore hath been conceived to belong unto them; as also of the care taken to reduce all the proclamations made since your majesty's reign into one volume, and to print them in such form as acts of parliament formerly have been, and still are used to be; which seemeth to imply a purpose to give them more reputation and more establishment than heretofore they have had.

We therefore, your majesty's humble subjects, the commons in this parliament assembled, taking these matters into our consideration, and weighing how much it doth concern your majesty, both in honour and safety, that such impressions should not be enforced to settle in your subjects minds, have thought it to appertain to our duties, as well towards your majesty, as to those that have trusted and sent us to their service, to present unto your majesty's view these fears and griefs of your people; and to become humble suitors unto your majesty, that thenceforth no fine or forfeiture of goods, or other pecuniary or corporal punishment, may be inflicted upon your subjects (other than restraint of liberty, which we also humbly beseech may be but upon urgent necessity, and to continue but 'till other order may be taken by course of law) unless they shall offend against some law or statute of this realm in force at the time of their offence committed; and for the greater assurance and comfort of your people, that it will please your majesty, to declare your royal pleasure to that purpose, either by some law to be made in this session of parliament, or by some such other course (whereof your people may take knowledge) as to your princely wisdom shall seem most convenient.

A catalogue of some of the proclamations complained of.

I. Proclamations importing alterations of some points of the law, and making new:

11 January, 1 Jac. fol. 57. forbiddeth chusing of knights and burgesses bankrupt or outlawed; and commandeth choice of such as are not only taxed to subsidies, but also have ordinarily paid and satisfied the same, fol. 57.

If returns be made contrary to proclamation, they are to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, fol. 60.

25 August, 5 Jac. fol. 151. That the proclamation should be a warrant to any officer or subject to seize starch, and to dispose or destroy any stuff, &c. And restraineth all men not licensed to make starch, fol. 154.

II. A proclamation made shortly after parliament, for matter directly rejected the precedent session:

1 March, 2 Jac. fol. 112. A proclamation for building with brick, after a bill to that end rejected.

III. Proclamations touching the freehold livelihood of men:

16 September, 1 Jac. fol. 41. Raising and pulling down houses authorized, and prohibition to build them again at any time.

12 October, 5 Jac. fol. 160. Forbidding building and taking away the materials; and appointing the owners land to be lett by other men at what price they please, fol. 101.

IV. Proclamations, referring punishments to be done by justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, constables, and other officers; or seizure by persons who have no authority to enquire, hear and determine of those offences; so it is to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction.

8 January, 2 Jac. fol. 72. A proclamation for folding wools, &c.

23 August, 5 Jac. fol. 151. A seizure of starch, &c.

V. Proclamations penned with penalties, in form of penal statutes:

4 November, 1 Jac. fol. ... Pain of confiscation of goods.

18 January, 2 Jac. fol. 72. Ten days imprisonment, and standing in the pillory.

Justices of peace to forfeit twenty pounds if they see not the proclamation of folding wools executed.

23 August, 5 Jac. fol. 151. Forfeiture of one moiety of starch, &c. seized, &c.

VI. Punishment of offenders in courts of arbitrary discretion, as Star-Chamber:

1 March, 2 Jac. fol. 102. Proclamation for building.

12 October, 5 Jac. fol. 159. A proclamation for building.

July, 6 Jac. fol. 177. Proclamation for starch.

25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180. Proclamation for building.

VII. Former proclamations become precedents, and vouched in latter proclamations:

18 June, 2 Jac. fol. 75. avoucheth 5 Ed. VI. and 4 Eliz. fol. 73.

25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180. mentioneth former proclamations against buildings, and explaineth and qualifieth them.

Your majesty's commons, in this session of parliament assembled, do cheerfully acknowledge the spring and fountain of public justice of this state to be originally in your majesty,

For the benefit thereof is conveyed and derived into every member of this politick body by your highness's writs.

Amongst which none are more honourable for the support of the common justice of the realm, than the writs of prohibition, habeas corpus, & de homine replegiando: which writs have been ever held and found to be a chief means of relief unto the poor, distressed and oppressed subjects of this kingdom, and can be no inconvenience at all: seeing they are no way conclusive against any man, and do draw no benefit to the procurers, but rather a fruitless charge, if they be obtained upon any unjust ground or pretence.

In the free granting of, and proceeding upon, some of which writs, especially that of prohibition, there hath of late been observed to be some obstruction, by reason that upon the complaints and the importunity of some, who desire the support of inferior courts against the principal courts of the common law, (wherein your majesty hath been greatly troubled) you have taken into your royal consideration the several extents of the jurisdiction of the said several courts.

Since which time the said writs have been more sparingly granted, and with stricter cautions than anciently hath been accustomed.

Writs of prohibition, &c.

It is therefore most humbly desired that it may please your majesty, (whose glory is never more conspicuous than when the poorest of the commonality are blessed with the influence of the ancient beams of justice) to require your judges in the courts of Westminster to grant the said writs, in cases wherein such writs do lye, and by law are grantable; and in such sort as that such persons whose bodies being either committed to prison, or their causes like to recover great prejudice by proceedings against them in times of vacation, may not be debarred nor deferred from having the speedy relief and benefit of those writs, more than in former times.

Four shires Forasmuch as the exercise of authority over the counties near Wales of Gloucester, Hereford, Wigorn, and Salep, by the president and council of Wales, by way of instructions upon a pretext of a statute made in the 34th year of the reign of king Henry VIII. is conceived not to be warranted by that, or any other law of this realm of England.

And for that in the second session of this present parliament, there did a bill pass the house of commons, whereby it was declared that the true intent and meaning of that before mentioned statute was not thereby to subject these counties to that kind of government by instructions; and yet notwithstanding the inhabitants of those counties are since utterly discouraged, and in effect debarred from the trial of the right of that kind of jurisdiction over those counties, by the ordinary course of the common laws of this land, by reason of prohibitions which were heretofore frequently granted (upon suggestion that those counties are not part of Wales, or of the marshes of the same, which is the very point in question) are now very hard to be obtained, except in cases where those of that council do exceed the instructions set down to them by your majesty:

As also for that, in cases where actions have been brought at the common law, whereby that question might have come to decision, the plaintiffs have been stopped, sometimes by injunctions out of your majesty's court of Chancery from their proceedings, sometimes before, sometimes after judgments, and also by imprisonment:

The precedents of which proceedings do concern all your majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects of this kingdom, as well in respect of the stopping of the free course of justice, as also by reason that if that kind of jurisdiction were at first extended over these four counties, and be now still continued without warrant of law; the consequence of this example may in future times give countenance to the erecting of like jurisdictions in other places of this realm:

And forasmuch as your majesty was pleased to command all the judges to consider of this question, and that they thereupon bestowed very many days in hearing the cause argued by learned counsel on both sides, and in viewing and considering great numbers of records, produced before them concerning that cause; whereby they have (no doubt) truly informed themselves of the right:

It is therefore the most humble petition of the commons in this present parliament assembled, that your most excellent majesty will also be pleased to command, that the judges may deliver their opinion upon that so exact and deliberate hearing, which was had before them, concerning the right of the aforesaid jurisdiction over those four counties, by force of that statute; and that the opinion which they shall deliver therein, may be in such sort published, as that all your majesty's subjects whom it may concern, may have means to take knowledge thereof; and that your majesty will vouchsafe to declare it, by your most princely pleasure, that any of your majesty's subjects, who may have occasion thereof, may try his or their right in that point, by the due and ordinary course of the common law, either by suing out of prohibitions, or any other your majesty's writs, without restraint; and that if the said jurisdiction over these four counties shall appear to your majesty by the opinion of the judges, or otherwise, not to be warranted by law, that then your majesty will be pleased, out of your most princely and gracious favour towards all your loyal dutiful subjects, to order the ceasing of the said jurisdiction over those counties, to the great comfort of the inhabitants of those counties, and of the rest of your subjects of all the kingdom.

New drapery. Complaint was made in all humble manner, the second session of this present parliament, of many disorders, outrages, and oppressions, committed upon occasion of letters patents granted to the duke of Lenox, for searching and sealing of stuffs and manufactures, called by the name of new draperies.

Which patent we held in all, or the most part of it, to be questionable, and in many apparently unlawful, and the execution thereof we found stretched by the farmers and deputies beyond the extent of the said letters patents, as appears in the particulars set down in the said grievance.

To which it pleased your majesty to give this gracious answer; that the validity of the said patent should be left to be judged by the law, and whensoever any abuse arising in the execution thereof should appear, it should severely be punished.

Which was for that time to our good satisfaction.

Yet finding by divers complaints made now in parliament, that not only the said letters patents are still in force, and the validity of them undecided by judgment, but disorders in the execution of them are so far from being reformed, that they multiply every day, to the grievance of your majesty's subjects; and those of the poorer sort, who exercising these manufactures, are subject to much oppression, to the great hindrance of some, and utter undoing of many, as hath appeared in the particularities of the complaints presented to us:

Our humble desire is, that your majesty will be pleased, according to your former resolution, to give order that this cause, which hath thus long hung in suspense, be speedily brought to judgment; and that before all the judges, because it concerneth all the subjects of the land; and in the mean time that the execution of the said letters patents, so far forth as they concern the said new drapery, may be suspended till judgment be given: whereby your subjects, who do in all humility present this grievance unto your majesty, may be relieved, and have no occasion to reiterate their complaints.

Whereas by ancient and late statutes it hath been enacted, Licence of that wines should be retailed at such low rates and prices, as wines. for this fifty years past they could not be afforded,

And for redress thereof, it was ordained by a statute in the 5th year of the late queen Elizabeth, that (those former laws notwithstanding) wines might be sold at such prices, as by proclamation from time to time to be made by consent of many great officers, should be published and set down:

Which proclamation, nevertheless, the late queen and your most excellent majesty have been drawn to forbear, upon the earnest suit of certain persons, who therein only intended their private game:

By reason whereof, both great sums of money in fines, rents, and annual payments, have been gotten and raised unto the said persons, and their assignees, and great damage and prejudice hath likewise fallen and light upon your people; not only by enhancing the prices of wines, licencing over many taverns, and appointing of unmeet persons, in unfit places, to keep the same; but also by reason that corrupt, mingled, evil, and unwholesome wines have been uttered and sold, to the great hurt of the health of your highness's people; one man sometimes engrossing all the licences designed for that place.

Whereupon complaint being made to your majesty, amongst other grievances of your people, in the second session of this present parliament, your highness was pleased to answer, that your grants in that behalf were no other than such as were warrantable by the law.

Whereas the grievance was the greater, for that all laws concerning the sale of wines being intended and conceived to stand and be repealed, there were nevertheless, by the oversight of them which were trusted in that business, casually omitted, and left unrepealed, certain obsolete laws impossible to be observed:

As namely, one, in the time of king Edward I. commanding wines to be sold at one shilling the sextern:

And one other made in the 28th year of king Henry VIII. prohibiting all persons, under penalty, to sell any French wines above eight-pence the gallon; and other wines, as sacks and sweet wines, above one shilling the gallon:

And one branch of a statute made in the 7th year of king Edward VI. prohibiting men to sell any wines by retail in their houses.

Whereupon your majesty hath been induced and drawn to ground new patents of dispensation, and to grant the benefit thereof unto the lord admiral:

Whereby the like discommodities and inconveniencies have since ensued unto the common-wealth, as formerly did arise and grow upon the other repealed laws, whereof in the former petitions of your subjects, exhibited unto your majesty in the said second session, your highness never had any direct and clear information:

May it therefore please your most excellent majesty, at the humble request of your commons, (who have taken into consideration the greatest charges and expences which the said lord admiral hath been at in your majesty's service, and have considered likewise the present licences and grants, for valuable considerations unto many hundreds of your highness's subjects, which, without great loss to the said grantees, cannot be so suddenly made void) out of your princely wisdom and goodness, wherein you have professed not to extend and strain your prerogative royal, against the publick good of your people, for the particular gain of any private persons, to vouchsafe: that from thenceforth there may no more grants of that nature be made unto any of your subjects whomsoever; but that the said statute of the 5th of Elizabeth for the appraising of wines, to be published by proclamation, as time and occasion shall require, may be put in execution: and that your majesty will likewise vouchsafe to grant your royal assent to a bill of repeal of the said obsolete statutes, and all other whereupon any such non obstantes and dispensations might be grounded.

In which statute of repeal, provision shall be made for the indemnity of all such, as under your majesty's great seal have already procured licence for such sale of wines.

Whereas by the laws of this your majesty's realm of Eng- Ale-houses. land, no taxes, aids, or impositions of any kind whatsoever, ought or can be laid or imposed upon your people, or upon any of their goods or commodities, but only by authority and consent of parliament:

Which being undoubtedly the ancient and fundamental law of the land, is yet for more abundant clearness expressly declared in sundry acts of parliament, made and enacted in the time of sundry your majesty's progenitors, the noblest and most prudent kings of this realm:

Your commons with just grief do complain unto your majesty of the late tax and imposition laid and imposed yearly upon such as are allowed to keep victualling houses, or sell ale and beer by retail:

Which imposition not being taxed by assent of parliament, but commanded and directed only by letters and instructions, your commons are persuaded that the same proceeded rather from misinformation, than by the direction and judgment of your most noble and royal heart.

Wherefore your said commons, knowing the grief of your people in this behalf, do (according to their duties) in all humility inform and signify unto your majesty,

First, that the said taxation being singular and without example, and it is in itself a precedent of dangerous consequence, and (as your people fear) may easily (in time) be extended farther, as to badgers of corn, makers of malt, drovers of cattle, and such like, who in such sort are to be licenced by justices of the peace, as those persons are, upon whom, at this time, this present tax is charged and laid.

Secondly,

Secondly, such houses being often times (at the best) harbours of idleness, drunkenness, whoredom, and all manner of villanies, the licences are now (the honest sort in most places refusing to undergo the new charge) rented and taken by the looser and baser sort of people, who have no conscience how they gain. By reason whereof all manner of vice and evil behaviour is likely every day to increase. Neither can the justices of the peace conveniently prevent the same: for that the persons licenced under the late contribution, affirm with clamour, that they have a toleration for a year, and that such persons are not friends unto the crown that seek to suppress them, and thereby to diminish your majesty's revenues.

Thirdly, many justices of the peace, (being sworn to execute their office) which for this particular conceive to be, that ale-house keepers formerly licenced, are not to be suppressed without just and reasonable cause, cannot be satisfied touching their said oath, but are much distracted and perplexed what to do (the late instructions notwithstanding) against such persons, as otherwise being not known to be of evil behaviour, only to refuse to pay this late taxed and imposed sum of money.

In consideration whereof, your humble commons most instantly beseech your most excellent majesty, that the former letters and instructions may be countermanded or stayed, and all further directions and proceedings in that kind forborn.

Among many resemblances which are observed to be between natural and politick bodies, there is none more apt and natural than this, that the diseases of both do not at one instance commonly seize upon all parts; but beginning in some one part, do by tract of time, and by degrees, get possession of the whole, unless by applying of wholesome and proper remedies in due time they may be prevented, which, as it is in many things very visible, so it is in nothing more apparent than in this matter of impositions: which beginning at the first, either with foreign commodities brought in, or such of your own as were transported, is now extended to those commodities, which growing in this kingdom are not transported, but uttered to the subjects of the same:

For proof whereof, we do in all humility present unto your majesty's view the late imposition of one shilling the chaldron of sea-coals, rising in Blyth and Sunderland, not by virtue of any contract or grant (as in the coals of Newcastle) but under a mere pretext of your majesty's most royal prerogative:

Which imposition is not only grievous for the present (especially to those of the poorer sort, the price of whose only and most necessary fuel is thereby to their great grief enhanced) but dangerous also for the future, considering that the reason of this precedent may be extended to all the commodities of this kingdom.

May it therefore please your most excellent majesty, which is the great and sovereign physician of the estate, to apply such a remedy as this disease may be presently cured, and all diseases for time to come of like nature prevented.

Speech of sir Francis Bacon to the king, the 7th of July 1610, on presenting the petition to his majesty, who was attended on the occasion by sir Francis and eleven other members; taken from Bacon's works, last 4to ed. vol. 2. page 212.

Most gracious sovereign,

THE knights, citizens, and burgeses assembled in parliament, in the house of your commons, in all humbleness do exhibit and present unto your most sacred majesty, in their own words though by my hand, their petitions and grievances. They are here conceived and set down in writing, according to ancient custom of parliament: they are also prefaced according to the manner and taste of these later times. Therefore for me to make any additional preface, were neither warranted nor convenient; especially speaking before a king, the exactness of whose judgment ought to scatter and chase away all unnecessary speech as the sun doth a vapour. This only I must say. Since this session of parliament we have seen your glory in the solemnity of the creation of this most noble prince; we have heard your wisdom in sundry excellent speeches which you have delivered amongst us. Now we hope to find and feel the effects of your goodness, in your gracious answer to these our petitions. For this we are persuaded, that the attribute, which was given by one of the wisest writers to two of the best emperors, divus Nerva et divus Trajanus, so saith Tacitus, res olim infociabiles miscuerunt, imperium et libertatem, may be truly applied to your majesty. For never was there such a conservator of regality in a crown, nor ever such a protector of lawful freedom in a subject.

Only this, excellent sovereign, let not the sound of grievances, though it be sad, seem harsh to your princely ears. It is but gemitus columbar, the mourning of a dove, with that patience and humility of heart which appertaineth to loving and loyal subjects. And far be it from us, but that in the midst of the sense of our grievances we should remember and acknowledge the infinite benefits, which by your majesty, next under God, we do enjoy; which bind us to wish unto your life fulness of days, and unto your line royal a succession and continuance even unto the world's end.

It resteth that unto these petitions here included I do add one more that goeth to them all: which is, that if in the words and frame of them there be any thing offensive; or that we have expressed ourselves otherwise than we should or would; that your majesty would cover it and cast the veil of your grace upon it; and accept of our good intentions, and help them by your benign interpretation.

Lastly, I am most humbly to crave a particular pardon for myself that have used these few words; and scarcely should have been able to have used any at all, in respect of the reverence which I bear to your person and judgment, had I not been somewhat relieved and comforted by the experience, which in my service and access I have had of your continual grace and favour.

XIV. The Case of Mixed Money in Ireland, Trin. 2. Jan. 1605.

[As the following case relates to the king's prerogative of regulating the coinage and value of money, in which the whole state is so immediately and essentially interested, it properly falls within the scope of this collection. It is taken from the English edition of sir John Davies's Reports. None of the marginal notes and references are in the French original. They were all added by the editor of the translated edition. This case, being earlier than Bates's, would have been placed before it, if the former had not occurred to the editor too late.]

QUEEN Elizabeth in order to pay the royal army which was maintained in this kingdom for several years, to suppress the rebellion of Tyrone, caused a great quantity of mixed money, with the usual stamp of the arms of the crown, and inscription of her royal stile, to be coined in the Tower of London, and transmitted this money into this kingdom, with a proclamation, bearing date 24 May, in the 43d. year of her reign, by which her majesty declared and established this mixed money, immediately after the said proclamation, to be the lawful and current money of this kingdom of Ireland, and expressly commanded that this money should be so used, accepted and reputed by all her subjects and others, using any traffick or commerce within this kingdom; and that if any person or persons should refuse to receive this mixed money according to the denomination or valuation thereof, viz. shillings, sixpenny pieces for sixpenny pieces, &c. being tendered for payment of any wages, fees, stipends, debts, &c. they should be punished as contemners of her royal prerogative and commandment. And to the intent that this mixed money should have the better course and circulation, it was further declared by the same proclamation, that after the 10th. day of June immediately following, all other money which had been current within this kingdom, before the said proclamation, should be cried down and annulled and esteemed as bullion, and not as lawful and current money of this kingdom.

VOL. XI.

In April, before this proclamation was published, when the pure coin of England was current within this kingdom, one Brett of Drogheda, merchant, having bought certain wares of one Gilbert in London, became bound to the said Gilbert in an obligation of 200l. on condition that he should pay to the said Gilbert, his executors or assigns, 100l. sterling, current and lawful money of England, at the tomb of earl Strongbow in Christ Church, Dublin, at a certain day to come; at which day and place, Brett made a tender of the 100l. in the mixed money of the new standard, in performance of the condition of the obligation; and whether this tender was sufficient to save the forfeiture of the obligation, or whether the said Brett should now, upon the change or alteration of money within this kingdom, be compelled to pay the said one hundred pound in other or better coin than in the mixed money, according to the rate and valuation of it, at the time of the tender, was the question at the council table, where the said Gilbert, who was a merchant of London, exhibited his petition against the said Brett, for the speedy recovery of his debt aforesaid.

And, inasmuch as this case related to the kingdom in general, and was also of great importance in consideration and reason of state, sir George Carew, then lord deputy and also treasurer, required the chief judges, (being of the privy council) to confer on and consider this case, and to return to him their resolution touching it; who upon conference and consideration on all the points of the said proclamation, resolved that the tender of the one hundred pounds in the mixed money, at the day and place aforesaid, was good and sufficient in the law, to save the forfeiture of the said obligation, and that Brist should not be obliged at any time after, to pay other money in discharge of the debt, than this mixed money, according to the rate and valuation that it had, at the time of the tender; and this resolution was certified by them to the lord-deputy, and the certificate entered in the council book. And in this case divers points were considered and resolved.

First, it was considered, that in every commonwealth, it is necessary to have a certain standard of money. For no commonwealth can subsist without contracts, and no contracts without equality, and no equality in contracts without money. For although in the first societies of the world, permutation of one thing for another was used, yet that was soon found cumbersome, and the transportation and division of things was found difficult and impossible; and therefore money was invented, as well for the facility of commerce, as to reduce contracts to an equality. Cum non facile concurrebat, ut cum tu haberes quod ego desiderarem, ego invicem haberem quod tu accipere velles, electa materia est, cujus publica & perpetua estimatio difficultatibus permutationem subveniret. Paul. lib. 1. ff. de contrabendis empt. and therefore money is said by Bodin to be mensura publica; and Budelius lib. 1. de re nummariâ, ca. 3. saith, moneta est justum medium & mensura rerum commutabilium, nam per medium monetâ fit omnium rerum, quæ in mundo sunt, conveniens & justa estimatio. And to this purpose Keble saith, 12 H. 7. 23. b. that every thing ought to be valued per argent; by which word argent, he meaneth money coined. And the great utility of a certain standard of money and of measures is well expressed by Budelius in this verse,

*Una fides, pondus, mensura, moneta sit una,
Et status illæsus totius orbis erit.*

Secondly, it was resolved, that it appertaineth only to the king of England, to make or coin money within his dominions; so that no other person can do it without special license or commandment of the king; and if any person presume to do it of his own head, it is treason against the person of the king by the common law; and this appears by the stat. of 25 Ed. 3. c. 2. (which is only a declaration of the common law,) and by Glanvil, Britton and Bracton, before that statute, Stamford fol. 2. and 3. And in the case of Mines, Plowd. 316. a. this point is expressed more clearly, where it is said, that the king shall have mines of gold and silver; for if a subject had them, he by law could not coin such metals, nor stamp a print or value upon them, for it appertaineth to the king only to put a value upon coin, and make the price of the quantity, and so put a print to it; which being done the coin is current; and if a subject doth this it is high treason at common law, as appears, 23 Aff. p. 2. and it is high treason to the king, because he hath the sole power of making money, &c.

And in this book three things are expressed, which are requisite to the making of lawful money, viz. the authority of the prince, the stamp, and the value. But upon the consideration of the case in question, it was observed, that six things or circumstances ought to concur, to make lawful and current money, viz. 1. Weight. 2. Fineness. 3. Impression. 4. Denomination. 5. Authority of the prince. 6. Proclamation. For every piece of money ought to have a certain proportion of weight or poise, and a certain proportion of purity or fineness, which is called alloy. Also every piece ought to have a certain form of impression, which may be knowable and distinguishable; for as wax is not a seal without a stamp, so metal is not money without an impression: & moneta dicitur a monendo, quia impressione nos moneat, cujus sit moneta. Cujus imago est hæc? Cæsar: date Cæsari quæ sunt Cæsaris. Also every piece of money ought to have a denomination or valuation for how much it shall be accepted or paid, as for a penny, a groat or a shilling. And all this ought to be by authority and commandment of the prince, for otherwise the money is not lawful; and it ought to be published by the proclamation of the prince, for before that, the money is not current.

These circumstances appear in the ancient ordinances made by the king for the coinage of money, as well in this kingdom as in England, which are to be found in the Tower of London there, and in the Castle of Dublin here. Also the indentures between the king and the masters of the mint prescribe the proportion of weight, fineness, and alloy, the impression or inscription, the name and the value. See the stat. 2 Hen. 6. c. 12. where mention is made of these indentures; see also Wade's case, 5 Co. 114. b. that the king by his proclamation may make any coin lawful money of England; a fortiori, he may, by his proclamation only, establish the standard of money coined by his authority within his own dominions.

And that the king by his prerogative may also put a price or valuation on all coins, appears by a remarkable case, 21 Ed. 3. 60. b. In the time of Will. the Conqueror, the abbot of St. Edmundsbury complained to the king in parliament, that whereas he was exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary by divers ancient charters, the bishop of Norwich had visited his house, contrary to those charters of exemption; upon which it was granted and ordained in parliament, that if from thenceforward the bishop of Norwich or any of his successors should go against the aforesaid exemption, they should pay to the king or his heirs thirty talents or besants. Afterwards in the time of Ed. 3. the bishop of Norwich visited the house again, against the ordinance aforesaid; and this contempt being found in the King's Bench, a scire facias issued against the bishop to shew why he should not pay to the king the thirty talents or besants; and upon an insufficient plea pleaded by the bishop, the court awarded that they should recover the talents or besants, and that it should be interpreted by the king himself of what value they should be, more or less; by which it is manifest that where talents or besants, or such other pieces or quantities of gold or silver are of uncertain value (for Budelius saith that talenta sunt varia, & pondera sunt, potius quam numismata) the king hath a power to put a certain value upon them, according to the rule well known to the civilians, monetæ estimationem dat, qui cudendi potestatem habet. And in this point the common law of England agrees well with the rules of the civil law, jus cudendæ monetæ ad solum principem, hoc est, imperatorem, de jure pertinet. Monetandi jus principum offibus inhaeret. Jus monetæ comprehenditur in regalibus, quæ nunquam a regio sceptro abdicantur.

Yet by ancient charters, this privilege or prerogative hath been communicated to some subjects in England; as, to the archbishop of Canterbury by charter of king Atelstan, Lamb. peramb. Kant. fol. 291. The archbishop of York and bishop of Durham had mines and power of coining money, as appears by the statute of 14 Hen. 8. c. 12. and the dean of St. Martin's-le-grand had the same privilege, as is manifest from the stat. of 19 Ed. 4. c. 1. And this right of coining money hath been granted to several great personages in France heretofore, as Choppinus relates, lib. de Dominio Franc. fol. 217. a. And this prerogative at this day is imparted too generally to all the inferior princes and states of Germany by grant or permission of the emperor; for it is a law of the empire, jus cudendæ monetæ, nisi cui ab imperatore concessum fuerit, nemo usurpato.

Thirdly, it was resolved that as the king by his prerogative may make money of what matter and form he pleaseth, and establish the standard of it, so may he change his money in substance and impression, and enhance or debase the value of it, or entirely decay and annul it, so that it shall be but bullion at his pleasure. And note, that bullion, which in Latin is called bullio, est moneta defensa & prohibita, quæ videlicet usu caret.

And that the king hath used this prerogative in England, appears by several notorious changes of money, made in the time of several kings since the Norman Conquest. Anno 26 Hen. 2. Monetâ veteri reprobatâ, novâ successit. Matt. Paris hist. mag. fol. 35. a. Anno 7. Joh. a new money was coined, at which time the first sterling money was coined, according to the opinion of Cambden, where he speaketh of Sterling-Castle in Scotland, fol. 700. b. Anno 32 Hen. 3. the king was obliged to make new money, cum moneta Angliæ circumcidatur à circumcisis Judæis, as Matt. Paris saith, fol. 703. a. Anno 7 Ed. 1. the standard of money was renewed, when the sterling penny was established to contain vicefimam partem unciam, as appears by the old magna charta, in the ordinance called compositio mensurarum, where it is ordained, quod viginti denarii faciant unciam. Anno 29 Ed. 1. when the money called pollards was cried down, a new sterling money was also coined; see 6 Ed. 6. Dyer 82. b. & lib. rubr. Scacc. Dubi. part 2. fol. 1. b. After this new monies were made, 9 Ed. 3. and 13 Hen. 4. and 5 Ed. 4. and 19 Hen. 7. and 36 Hen. 8. and lastly 2 Eliz. when all mixed and base money was cried down, and the standard of pure silver established, which continues to this day, of which Bodin maketh honourable mention, libro 6 de republicâ, cap. 3.

And it seems these changes of money in England were made by the authority of the king without parliament; although several acts of parliament have been made for the ordering of exchange, and to prohibit the exportation of money made and ordained by the king, and the importation and utterance of foreign and false money, under certain pains and penalties, of which some were capital and some pecuniary. And several ordinances of the king made without the parliament are called statutes; as statutum de monetâ magnum, & statutum de monetâ parvum; which are called statutes, because the ordinance of the king with proclamation in such case hath the force of an act of parliament.

And as the king hath used to change the standard of his money, to wit, the form and the substance, so hath he used by his prerogative to enhance or debase the value of it, notwithstanding that the form and substance continueth as it was before. And this was done, 5 Ed. 4. as appears by the book of 9 Ed. 4. 49. where Danby saith, that a noble was better then, than it was anno 20 of that king, by 20 d. in each noble. And king Hen. 8. by special commission dated 24 July, anno 18. of his reign, authorised cardinal Wolsey, with the advice of other of the privy council, to put a value on all the monies of England, from time to time, according to the rates and values of the monies of foreign nations, which were then too much enhanced, especially by the emperor and the king of France, as is expressed in the said commission. See also 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82 and 83. several cases on the debasement of money.

And it is to be observed, that between the 36 of Hen. 8. when several sorts of debased money were coined in England, and 2 Eliz. when the pure standard of silver money was established, there were three notorious falls or cry-downs of base monies published by proclamation; the first, 9 July, 5 Ed. 6. the second, 17 August, the same year, as is mentioned, Dyer 83. a. the third, 28 Sep. 2 Eliz.

And as the king hath always used to make and change the money of England, he hath also used the same prerogative in Ireland ever since the 12th year of king John, when the first standard of English money was established in this kingdom, as is recorded by Matt. Paris, magn. hist. 220. b. where it is said, that this king being in Ireland, constituit ibidem leges & consuetudines Anglicanas, ponens ibidem vicecomites, aliosque ministros, qui populum regni illius juxta leges Anglicanas judicarent. Præfuit autem ibidem Johannem de Gray episcopum Norwicensem, justitiarium, qui denarium terræ illius ad pondus numismatis Angliæ fecerat publicari, & tam obelum quam quadrantem rotundum furi præcepit: jussu quoque rex, ut illius monetæ usus tam in Angliâ quam in Hibernia communis ab omnibus haberetur, & utriusque regni denarius in thesauri suis indifferenter poneretur.

By which it appeareth that the standard of money in England and in Ireland was equal at first, and that the English money was not a fourth part better in value than the Irish, as it hath been since the time of Ed. 4. for before that, as there was one and the same standard of money in both kingdoms, so always when the money was changed in England, it was also changed in Ireland. As in the year 1279, viz. 7 Ed. 1. when that that king established new money in England, as is shewn before, there was likewise a change of money in Ireland, as is observed in the annals of this kingdom, published by Camden in his Britannia, where it is said, that in the year 1279, dominus Robertus de Ufford justiciarius Hiberniæ intravit Angliam, & constituit loco fratrem Robertum de Fulbourne episcopum Waterford, cujus tempore mutata est moneta. So 29 Ed. 1. when by special ordinance of the king the pollards and crockards were decreed and annulled, the same ordinance was transmitted into this kingdom, and enrolled in the Exchequer here, as is found in lib. rubr. scacc. part 2. fol. 2. b. Also in the annals aforesaid it is observed in the same year, numisma pollardum prohibetur in Angliâ & Hiberniâ.

And as the standard of the monies was equal, so the mints and coinage in this kingdom were ordered and governed in the same manner as in England, as appears by the account of Donat and Andrew de Sperdsholst assay masters in Dublin, 9 and 10 Ed. 1. in archivis Castri Dublin, and in lib. rubr. scacc. hic part 2. fol. 1. and in rot. parl. in Castro Dublin, 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. See also several ordinances there touching the mint and monies, 7 Ed. 4. c. 9. 10 Ed. 4. c. 4. 16 Ed. 4. c. 2. 19 Ed. 4. c. 1. 1 R. 3. c. 7.

But the first difference and inequality between the standard of English and Irish monies, is found in 5 Ed. 4. for then it was declared in parliament here, that the noble made in the time of Ed. 3. Rich. 2. Hen. 4. Hen. 5. and Hen. 6. should be from that time forth current in this kingdom for 10 s. and so of the demy-noble, and all other coins according to the same rate. See rot. parl. 5 Ed. 4. c. 40. and 11 Ed. 4. c. 6. and 15 Ed. 4. c. 5. in the Roll's office in the Castle of Dublin. After which time the money made in Ireland or for Ireland was always less in value than the money of England, and the usual proportion of the difference was the fourth part only, viz. the Irish shilling was only 9 d. English. See the proclamation aforesaid, dated the 24 of May, 43 Eliz. enrolled in the Chancery here, where the queen makes mention of this difference made by her progenitors between the standard of money made for this kingdom, and the money of England. And note, that That which is called the standard of money in this case, is the same which is called by the French piéd de moncy, by Bodin pes monetarum; as if the prince there pedem figat, having established the weight and purity of money in a certain proportion, which should not be transgressed by the moneyers.

And so it is manifest, that the kings of England have always had and exercised this prerogative of coining and changing the form, and when they found it expedient of enhancing and abasing the value of money within their dominions: and this prerogative is allowed and approved not only by the common law, but also by the rules of the imperial law. Budellius de re nummaria, lib. 1. c. 5. Princeps ad arbitrium suum, irrequisito assensu subditorum, valorem monetæ constituere potest; quia populus, quantum ab hoc, omnem potestatem & jurisdictionem in principem seu imperatorem transulisse dicitur. And a little after in the same chapter, although some doctors are of opinion, principem sine assensu populi monetam mutare non posse, yet he concludes, si princeps consuevisset mutare monetam auctoritate propria, sine consensu populi, a tempore cujus initii memoria non existit, tunc libere imposterum eum hoc facere posse. L. hoc jure Paragr. ductus aqua. ff. de aqua quodlibet. &c. And Covarruvias, libro de collatione veterum numismatum, cap. de mutatione monetæ, saith, princeps potest mutare monetam ratione publicæ utilitatis, viz. tempore belli, vel si alias utile populo sit futurum, ita etiam, ut ex corio fieri possit. And it is observed by Molinæus, libro de mutatione monetæ, cap. 100. that the state of Rome in the first Punick war, when Hannibal had possession of a great part of Italy, and all their treasure was exhausted, enhanced base money to a great value, for the payment of their armies; and yet the justice of that state was then famous throughout the world. But nihil est magis justum, quam quod necessarium; by which it appears, that the mixed money was made by queen Eliz. on a just and honourable cause.

Fourthly, it was resolved, that the said mixed money having the impression and inscription of the queen of England, and being proclaimed for lawful and current money within this kingdom of Ireland, ought to be taken and accepted for sterling money; and on consideration of this point, the name and the nature of sterling money were enquired and discovered. As to the name of sterling, some doctors of the civil law, being deceived by the erroneous report of Polydore Virgil, have conceived, that this English money was called sterling, because the form of a stare, the diminutive of which is sterling, was imprinted or stamped upon it, and therefore Covarruvias, lib. de collatione veterum numismatum, c. 2. sterling (saith he) est argenteus nummus Anglicus ex vicefima sexta parte unciæ, nam viginti sex nummi argentei sterlingi pendeant unciam, autore Polydore Virgilio, in hist. Anglicâ, lib. 16. Disus autem est hic nummus, ut idem autor tradit, sterling, quod sturnus avis, Anglice a sterling, in altera parte nummi esset impressa. To the same purpose Choppinus de Domanio Franc. lib. 2. tit. 7. hath this note, ceterum Errico 3. Britannici rege, primum percussa est nunc usitatissima sterlingorum moneta, ab effigie sturni sic dicta, anno 1249. These doctors being strangers, were, it seems, misinformed by Polydore Virgil, who was also an alien and a stranger. But our Linwood also (who made his gloss on the provincial constitutions of England, in the time of Hen. 6.) tit. de testam. G. Item, quia, verbo, Centum solidos, saith, sterling nomen erat argenteæ monetæ, & habebat similitudinem denarii usualis, hoc salvo, quod in una quartâ habebat effigiem avis, quæ vocatur sturnus, Anglice, sterling.

Others have been of opinion, that this English money had the name of sterling, because the first money of this standard was coined in the Castle of Sterling in Scotland by king Ed. 1. But this is also an erroneous opinion, as is noted by Camden in Scotia, pag. 700. where speaking of Sterling-Castle, he saith, that quidam monetam probam Angliæ quæ sterling money dicitur, hinc denominatam volunt, frustra sunt; a Germanis enim, qui Angli Esterlingos ab orientali situ vocarunt, facta est appellatio, quos Johannes rex, ad argentum in suam puritatem redigendum, primus evocavit; & ejusmodi nummi, Esterlingi, in antiquis scripturis semper reperiuntur.

And this latter opinion, without doubt, is the better and more probable, by the judgment of all the most learned antiquarians of England. For in all the antient statutes which make mention of this money, it is called Esterling. As 9 Ed. 3. c. 2. &c. no false money counterfeit esterling shall be imported into our realm; and the same year c. 3. no esterling half-penny or farthing shall be molten to make vessel, &c. and 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. the money of gold and silver, which is now current, shall not be impaired in weight or alloy, but shall be put in the antient state as in the esterling. And Matt. Paris, magn. hist. fol. 403. where he expresses the form of the obligation made by the clergy of England to the pope's bankers resident in London, makes mention of this money by the name of esterling; Noveritis nos recipisse ab A. and B. &c. centum uncias bonorum & legalium esterlingorum, tresdecim solidis & quatuor sterlingis pro qualibet uncia computatis. And the same author fol. 710. saith, eodem tempore moneta Esterlingorum, propter sui materiam desiderabilem, detestabili circumfusione caput deteriorari & corrumpi. And fol. 575. Comitissa de Biarde venit ad regem cum 60 militibus, ducta cupidine Esterlingorum, quibus noverat regem Angliæ abundare, & accepit a rege qualibet die pro stipendio tresdecim libras Esterlingorum, &c. And Hoveden in Rich. 1. fol. 377. b. makes mention of this money in these words, *videns igitur Galfridus Eboracensis electus, quod nisi mediante pecuniâ amorem regis fratris nullatenus habere possit, promisit ei tria millia librarum Sterlingorum pro amore ejus habendo; and this was before the time of king John; from whence it seems, that the time when this money was first coined is uncertain; for some say that it was made by Osbright a king of the Saxon race 160 years before the Norman Conquest. And so as nummus is called from Numa, who was the first king who made money in Rome, so sterling is called from the Esterlings who first made the money of this standard in England, by a metonymia, substituting the name of the inventor for the thing invented, as Ceres pro frumento, Bacchus pro vino, &c.*

And it is to be observed, that the Esterlings were the first founders of the four principal cities of Ireland, viz. Dublin, Waterford, Cork and Limerick, and of the other maritime towns in this kingdom, and were the sole maintainers of traffick and commerce, which was utterly neglected by the Irish. These cities and towns were under the protection of king Edgar and Edward the Confessor before the Norman Conquest: and these Esterlings in the antient records of this kingdom are called Ostmanni. And therefore, when Hen. 2. upon the first conquest, thought it better to people these cities and towns with English colonies taken from Bristol, Chester, &c. he assigned to these Ostmen certain proportion of land next adjoining to each of these cities, which portion is called in the records of antient times, Cantreda Ostmannorum. And all this was observed on the name of Sterling.

For the nature or substance of this money, first it was observed, that the coin which was properly called the sterling was the denier or silver penny, as appears in the ordinance called compositio mensurarum made in the time of Ed. 1. where it is said, denarius Angliæ, qui nominatur sterlingus, rotundus, sine tonsura, ponderabit triginta & duo grana in medio spicæ, &c. and every other coin or piece of silver was measured by the sterling penny, as the groat contained the value of four sterlings, and the half groat the value of two sterlings, 25 Ed. 3. c. 6. and the shilling consisted of twelve sterlings, Linwood de testamentis, C. item quia, verb. Centum solidos; and the mark consisted of 13 s. and four sterlings, as before is shewn from Matt. Paris; and the maile (half-penny) was the half of a sterling; and the farthing the fourth part of a sterling. See an ordinance without date in the magna charta printed by Tottel, anno 1556. fol. 167. and in Rastall's old abridgment, money 52. quia multorum regum temporibus provium fuit, quod propter pauperes denarius argenti, viz. sterlingus, divideretur in obolum & quadrantem, ex parte domini regis precipitur, quod quicumque recusaverit obolum vel quadrantem debitam habentem formam, capiatur. See 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82. in the case of pollards, where it appears that a sterling and a denier were the same; for there it is said that two pollards passed for one sterling, and accordingly two sterlings were paid for one denier. And indeed in antient time, every sort of money, made of the several metals of which money was usually coined, was properly called a denarius; and therefore the French and Italians speak properly, when they call all money deniers and denarii, for coins (nummi) were either copper, silver or gold; each silver one was worth ten of copper, and so was called a denier; and each gold one was worth ten of silver, and in this respect these were likewise deniers. And the antient proportion of gold to silver was as ten to one; and this proportion, as it seems, David observed in the treasure of gold and silver which he prepared for the building of the temple; for the text says, Chron. chap. 22. ver. 14. that he provided for that purpose 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of silver. So the first and proper sterling coin was a denier.

And for the substance of this denier or sterling penny in weight and purity: as to the weight, it was at first the twentieth part of an ounce, viz. an ounce was cut into twenty sterling deniers and no more. See the compositio mensurarum made in the time of Ed. 1. in veteri libro de magnâ chartâ, fol. 113. b. and in Rastall's old abridgment, tit. weights and measures, 4. where it is said, that viginti denarii faciunt unciam, & duodecim unciæ faciunt libram; and so it was until 9 Ed. 3. at which time the ounce of silver was cut into 26 pence. Annal. de Rob. de Avesbury M. 8. See several ordinances touching the new sterling money, made 9 Ed. 3. Rastall, money 345. And such proportion was continued until 2 Hen. 6. when the ounce of silver made 32 pence; and this appears by the stat. of 2 Hen. 6. c. 13. and also by Linwood de testamentis, cap. item quia, verb. cent. solid. Hic solidus (saith he) sumitur pro duodecim denariis Anglicanis; eorum 26 ponderabant unciam, cum tamen jam 32 denarii vix faciunt unciam. And this gloss was wrote in the beginning of the reign of Hen. 6. as it is mentioned in the preface to his book. This standard was continued until the 5 Ed. 4. and then the ounce of silver made 40 pence; 9 Ed. 4. 49. a. and 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. in Rot. parl. Dublin. And this continued until 36 Hen. 8. when the king prepared for his journey to Bullonne; and then an ounce of silver was cut into 60 pence, and that standard remains to this day. And so the sterling sterling penny, which was at first the twentieth part of an ounce, is now the sixtieth part of an ounce; and by consequence, the ancient sterling penny contained as much silver as is contained in the three-penny piece that is now current.

H. H. P. And as to the purity of this sterling money, 18 s. 5 d. of the purest silver was contained in each pound, and each pound of sterling money had 1 s. 6 d. alloy of copper, and no more; and of this alloy of sterling money, the ordinances or statutes of 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. and 2 Hen. 6. c. 13. make mention. But this is well known to all moneyers, and is contained in all the indentures made between the king and the masters of the mint.

Whether the mixed money should be deemed sterling. Then the sterling money being of such weight and fineness, the doubt, primâ facie, was, how this mixed money should be said to be sterling. And for the clearing of this doubt, it was said, that in each common piece of money, there is bonitas intrinseca, & bonitas extrinseca: intrinseca consistit in præfiositate materiæ & pondere, viz. fineness and weight; extrinseca bonitas consistit in valuatione seu denominatione, & in formâ seu charactere. Budel. de re nummaria, lib. 11. cap. 7. And this bonitas extrinseca, which is called estimatione seu valor impostitius, est formalis & essentialis monetæ, and this form giveth name and being to money; for without such form, the most precious and pure metal that can be is not money; and therefore, Molinaus, lib. de mutat. Monetæ, saith, *non materia naturalis corporis monetæ, sed valor impostitius est forma & substantia monetæ, quæ non est corpus physicum sed artificiale, as Aristotle saith, Ethic. lib. 5. And so Polit. lib. 1. he saith to this effect, that money was first signed and imprinted with a certain character, to the intent, that the people might accept it on the credit of the prince or state who publishes it, without examination or trial of the weight or purity. And to this purpose Molinaus hath this rule, 2. 99. de jure non refert siue plus siue minus argenti insit, modo publica, proba, & legitima monetæ sit. Et Baldus l. singulari, saith, in pecunia potius attenditur usus & cursus quam materia. And Seneca, lib. 5. de beneficiis, Es alienum habere dicitur, & qui aureos debet, & qui corium formâ publicâ percussus. And it was said that the king hath the same prerogative to give value to base metal by his impression or character, as he hath to give estimation to a mean person by imparting the character of honour to him; *sic fiet viro quem rex bonos are desiderat.

And so it was concluded, that after the Esterlings, by command of the king of England, had made this pure English money, which from the name of the makers was called esterling or sterling money, the standard of which hath been always the most fixed and unchanged in all the world, (which hath been a great honour to our nation, for in all other kingdoms and states, the standards of their money are more unsteady and variable,) all money coined by the authority of the king of England, and having his character and impression, not only in England, but also in Scotland and Ireland, hath been sterling money, and so called, reputed and taken by all people, whether the matter of it were mixed or pure. And this appears by the ordinance which is called statutum de moneta magnum, by which all money is prohibited, only the money of England, of Ireland and of Scotland, which was properly the sterling money. And therefore Freherus, lib. de re nummaria, where he enumerates the different money of different nations; sterlingi, saith he, habentur in Anglia, Scotia & Hibernia. And Bodin, lib. 6. de republ. c. 3. speaking of the money of Scotland; in Scotland, saith he, are two pounds, (livres) very different; one of esterlings, the other customary. And certainly the usual Scottish pound (livre) is like the French livre, and the pound (livre) esterling current there is that of England. And that base or mixed money may be current for sterling, appears by the said case of pollards, Dyer 82. b. where it is said, quod curriebat quædam moneta in Anglia loco sterlingi quæ vocabatur pollards, viz. duo pollardi pro uno sterlingo.

1. 1. money lawful money of England. Rightly, it was resolved, that although this mixed money was made to be current within this kingdom of Ireland only, yet it may well be said, current and lawful money of England, for two causes.—1. Because this kingdom is only a member of the imperial crown of England; and this appears 3 Hen. 7. 10. a. where a question was propounded to the justices by Hobart, attorney-general, si quis sciens monetam ad similitudinem monetæ regis Angliæ contrafactam, solum monetam in Angliam extra Hiberniam deferat, si sit proditio neque: & dixerunt quod Hibernia est quasi membrum Angliæ, & ibidem legibus Angliæ utantur, & auctoritate regia faciunt monetam. And to this purpose it is recited in the statute of Faculties, enacted in this kingdom, 28 Hen. 8. c. 19. that this the king's land of Ireland is a member appendant, and rightfully belongeth to the imperial crown of the realm of England, and united unto the same. And in the act of 33 Hen. 8. c. 1. by which the title and title of king of Ireland was given to Hen. 8. his heirs and successors, it is moreover enacted, that the king shall enjoy that title and title, and all other royal pre-eminences, prerogatives and dignities, as united and annexed to the imperial crown of the realm of England.—2. It is called lawful money of England, in respect to the place of coinage; which was in England, viz. in the Tower of London. For although in ancient times the king had several mints in this kingdom, as he had in England, yet since the commencement of the reign of queen Elizabeth, all the mints have been reduced to one place, viz. the Tower of London; and this was done upon good reason of state, to prevent the falsification of money. And therefore, before the Norman Conquest, all money was coined in monasteries; for it was presumed, that in such places no falsity or corruption would be found. And this agrees with the prudence of the Roman state, which had but one mint for all Italy, and that was in the temple of Juno at Rome, who for this cause was called Juno moneta. And for this purpose, the emperor Charlemain made a law in these words; viz. de falsis monetis, quia in diversis locis contra justitiam sunt, volumus, ut in nullo alio loco moneta, nisi in palatio nostro, fiat. Choppinus de Demonia Franciæ, 217. a. Yet in 28 Ed. 1. this prudent king, for the facility of exchange, caused several mints to be established in several towns in England; one in the Tower of London with thirty furnaces, another at Canterbury with eight furnaces, another at Kingston upon Hull with four furnaces, another at Newcastle upon Tyne with two furnaces, another at Bristol with four furnaces, and another at Exeter with four furnaces. Traçat. de monetâ Angliæ, made in the time of Ed. 1. which I found in the library of sir Robert Cotton, which was the book of lord Burleigh, late lord high treasurer of England. See also the close rolls of 29 Ed. 1. in the Tower of London. And this appears also by the inscription of divers ancient coins, on which are expressed the names of the cities where they were coined, according to a verse made in the time of Ed. 1. and taken by Stow out of Robert le Brun, an ancient manuscript:

Edward did smite round penny, half-penny, farthing.

And then followed,

On the king's side, was his head and his name written,
On the cross side, the city where it was smitten.

And this same king having established a mint at Dublin with four furnaces, and having constituted Alexander Norman of Lusk master of the mint there, as appears in several records in the archives of the Castle of Dublin; afterwards, viz. 32 Ed. 1. when he had altered the form of the coin, he caused divers stamps consisting of two parts, of which the one contained the pile, and the other the cross, to be transmitted to the treasurer of this kingdom, as is recorded in the red book of the Exchequer here, in this manner. Magister Gulielmus de Wimundham, custos cambiorum domini regis in Anglia, de præcepto venerabilis patris Bathon. & Wellensis episcopi, thesaurarii ejusdem domini regis, misit domino Gulielmo de Esenden, thesaurario in Hibernia, viginti quatuor pecias cuneorum, pro moneta ibidem faciendâ, viz. tres pilas cum sex crucellis pro denariis, tres pilas cum sex crucellis pro obolis, & duas pilas cum quatuor crucellis pro sterlingis, per Johannem le Minor, Thomas Dowle, & Johannem de Shorditch, clericos, de societate operariorum & monetariorum London, per eosdem ad monetam prædictam operandam & monetandam. And there it is likewise mentioned, before what witnesses the said stamps were delivered; for cuneus monetæ tanquam sigillum regni custodiri debet, as it is said in the treatise de moneta Angliæ before mentioned; and the reason is, because to counterfeit the one or the other is high treason.

And at this time there was but one mint in Ireland, to wit, at Dublin. But long afterwards, viz. 3 Ed. 4. a mint was established at Waterford, another at Trim, and another at Galway; Rot. Parl. 3 Ed. 4. in Cassia Dublin. And 12 Ed. 4. Rot. Parl. ibid. it is ordained, that the masters of the mint in Ireland should make, in the castles of Dublin and Trim, and in the town of Drogheda, five sorts of coin, the groat, the half-groat, the penny, half-penny and farthing; by which it is manifest that in former times, there were five several mints in Ireland, in the several towns aforesaid. But all these were discontinued in the time of Ed. 6. so that since the reign of that king, all the money made in Ireland, hath been coined in England; and therefore this mixed money, coined in the Tower of London, may be properly called current and lawful money of England.

Sixthly and lastly, it was resolved, that although at the time of the contract and obligation made in the present case, pure money of gold and silver was current within this kingdom, where the place of payment was assigned; yet the mixed money, being established in this kingdom before the day of payment, may well be tendered in discharge of the said obligation, and the obligee is bound to accept it; and if he refuses it, and waits until the money be changed again, the obligor is not bound to pay other money of better substance, but it is sufficient if he be always ready to pay the mixed money according to the rate for which they were current at the time of the tender. And this point was resolved on consideration of two circumstances, viz. the time and the place of the payment; for the time is future, viz. that if the said Brett shall pay or cause to be paid 100 l. sterling, current money, &c. and therefore such money shall be paid as shall be current at such future time; so that the time of payment, and not the time of the contract, shall be regarded.

Also, the future time is intended by the words current money; for a thing which is passed is not in curfu; and therefore all the doctors, who write de re nummaria, agree in this rule, verba currentis monetæ tempus solutionis designant. And to this purpose are several cases ruled in our books. 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 81. b. After the fall and embasement of money, 5 Ed. 6. debt was brought against the executors of lessee for years, for rent in arrear for two years, ending Mich. 2 Ed. 6. at which time the shilling (which at the time of the action brought, was cried down to 6 d.) was current for 12 d. the defendants pleaded a tender of the rent on the days when it became due, in pecii monetæ Angliæ vocat. shillings, qualibet pecia vocat. shilling, ad tunc solubili pro 12 d. and that neither the plaintiff nor any other for him was ready to receive it, &c. and concluded that they are still ready to pay the arrears in dictis peciis vocat. shillings, secundum ratam, &c. On this plea, although the plaintiff demurred, yet he was content to take the money at the rate aforesaid, without costs or damages. To the same purpose is the case of pollards adjudged, 29 Ed. 1. and reported by Dyer 82. b. where in debt on an obligation for payment of 24 l. at two several days, the defendant pleads, that, at the days limited for payment of the debt in demand, curriebat quædam moneta quæ vocabatur pollards, loco sterlingi, &c. and that the defendant at the first day of payment tendered the moiety of the debt in the money called pollards, which the plaintiff refused, and that he is still ready, &c. and offered it in court, which is not denied by the plaintiff; ideo concessum est, that he recovered one moiety in pollards, and the other in pure sterling money. See 9 Ed. 4. 49. a. a remarkable case on the change of money, where it is said, that if a man in an action of debt demands 40 l. it shall be intended money, which is current at the time of the writ purchased. And there a case in the time of Ed. 1. is put, which is directly to this purpose. In debt brought upon a deed for thirty quarters of barley, price 20 s. it was found for the plaintiff, and the jury was charged to enquire of the price at the time of the payment; and it was said that at the time of the payment, a quarter was at 12 s. but at the time of the making of the deed, it was only at 3 s. and the plaintiff recovered 18 l. for the corn according to the price price of it at the time of the payment. To this purpose also, Linwood hath a notable gloss on the constitution of Simon Mepham, lib. 3. de testamentis cap. item quia. For where the constitution is such, pro publicatione testamenti pauperis, cujus inventarium bonorum non excedit centum solidos sterlingorum, nihil penitus exigatur; he maketh this gloss, hic solidus sumitur pro duodecim denariis Anglicanis, &c. Sed quæro, saith he, numquid circa hoc centum solidos debeat considerari valor in moneta jam currente, vel valor sterlingorum qui currebant tempore statuti; and there he resolveth, quod ubi dispositio surgit ex statuto, ut hic, licet moneta sit diminuta in valore, tamen debet considerari respectu monetae novæ currentis, & non respectu antiquæ. Nam mutata moneta, mutari videtur statutum, ut scilicet intelligatur de nova, & non de veteri. See Regist. 50. a. and 54. b. where the king issues his writ, to be certified of the value of a church. The words of the writ are secundum taxationem decimæ jam currentis. And 31 Ed. 3. Fitz. H. Annuity 28. an annuity was granted to I. S. until he was promoted by the grantor to a sufficient benefice; I. S. brings a writ of annuity against the grantor, who pleads that he had tendered to the plaintiff a sufficient benefice; and there issue was taken on the value of the benefice at the time of the tender.

But it was said that, although in contracts these words currentis monetae shall relate to the time of the payment; yet in wills, they shall relate to the time of making the will; for the bequest is in the present tense, I give and bequeath, &c. and therefore legacies shall be paid in such money as is current at the time of the making the testament, or according to the rate thereof. It was also said, that if a man hath 1000*l.* of pure silver in marriage with his wife, and afterwards they are divorced causa præcongratulus, by which the wife is to receive her portion: or if a man recovers by an erroneous judgment 100*l.* in debt, and hath execution in pure silver money, and afterwards the judgment is reversed, so that he is to be restored to all that he hath lost, although base money be established in the mean time, restitution shall be in such money as was current at the time of the marriage, and at the time of the recovery. But these latter cases were not resolved.

And as to the circumstance of place, it was resolved, that although the contract was made in London, yet, the place of payment being appointed in Dublin, of necessity the obligor must make his tender in the mixed money at the time of the payment; for all other money was cried down and made bullion by the proclamation aforesaid, and this money only established; so that if the obligee had refused this mixed money, he had committed a contempt, for which he might be punished. Also the judges are not bound to take notice of any money, that is not current by proclamation. And therefore Prisot saith, 34 Hen. 6. 12. a. we are not apprized of 61. Flemish, as we are of 100 nobles; and therefore in all contracts of merchants, consuetudo & statuta loci, in quem est destinata solutio, respicienda sunt. Budelius de re nummariâ, lib. 2. c. 21. And it was said, that if at this day the law should be taken, as it was taken in the time of Ed. 1. that upon judgment in debt given in England, on a testatum that the defendant hath nothing in England, but that he hath goods and lands in Ireland; a writ of execution shall be awarded to the chief-justice or deputy of Ireland, to levy the debt there, (which writ is found in Registra brev. jud. 43. b.) the sum in such case shall be levied according to the rate of Irish money, and not of English money, and in such coin as shall be current in this kingdom, at the time of the execution.

And according to this resolution, several other cases on the same point were afterwards ruled and adjudged in the several courts of record in Dublin.

XV. The Case of Præmunire in Ireland, or the Conviction and Attainder of ROBERT LALOR Priest, being indicted on the Statute of the 16 R. II. cap. 5. Hill. 4 Jam. 1607.

[This case is extracted from Sir John Davies's Reports. It was originally published in English, with marginal notes containing the heads of the case, in the same manner as it is here printed.]

Of what quality and credit Robert Lalor was. THIS Robert Lalor, being a native of this kingdom, received his orders of priesthood above 30 years since at the hands of one Richard Brady, to whom the pope had given the title of bishop of Kilmore in Ulster; and for the space of 20 years together his authority and credit was not mean within the province of Leinster. He had also made his name known in the court of Rome, and held intelligencé with the cardinal who was protector of this nation; by means whereof he obtained the title and jurisdiction of vicar-general of the see apostolick, within the archbishoprick of Dublin and the bishopricks of Kildare and Fernes. This pretended jurisdiction, extending well-nigh over all the province of Leinster, he exercised boldly and securely many years together, until the proclamation was published, whereby all Jesuits and priests ordained by foreign authority were commanded to depart out of this kingdom by a certain time prefixed. After which time he began to lurk and to change his name. Howbeit at last he was apprehended in Dublin, and committed to prison in the Castle there. Upon his first examination taken by the lord-deputy himself, he acknowledged that he was a priest, and ordained by a popish titular bishop; that he had accepted the title and office of the pope's vicar-general in the three dioceses before-named, and had exercised spiritual jurisdiction in foro conscientie; and in sundry other points he maintained and justified the pope's authority. Only he said, he was of opinion that the pope had no power to excommunicate or depose his majesty, because the king is not of the pope's religion.

His apprehension and first examination. The next term after he was indicted upon the statute of 2 Eliz. enacted in this realm against such as should wilfully and advisedly maintain and uphold the jurisdiction of any foreign prince or prelate in any causes ecclesiastical or civil within this realm. By which statute the first offence of that kind is punished with loss of goods, and one year's imprisonment; the second offence incurreth the penalty of the præmunire; and the third offence is made high treason. Upon this indictment he was arraigned, convicted and condemned, and so rested in prison during the next two terms without any farther question. He then made petition unto the lord-deputy to be set at liberty: whereupon his lordship caused him to be examined by sir Oliver St. John, sir James Fullerton, sir Jeffery Fenton, the attorney and solicitor general. At first he made some evasive and indirect answers; but at last voluntarily and freely he made this ensuing acknowledgment or confession, which being set down in writing word for word as he made it, was advisedly read by him, and subscribed with his own hand, and with the hands of those who took his examination; and afterwards he confirmed it by his oath before the lord-deputy and council.

His second examination. The confession or acknowledgment of Robert Lalor priest, made the 22d of December, 1606.

His confession or acknowledgment. FIRST, he doth acknowledge, that he is not a lawful vicar-general in the dioceses of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, and thinketh in his conscience that he cannot lawfully take upon him the said office.

Item, he doth acknowledge our sovereign lord king James, that now is, to be his lawful chief and supreme governor in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil, and that he is bound in conscience to obey him in all the said causes; and that neither the pope, nor any other foreign prelate, prince or potentate, hath any power to controul the king in any cause ecclesiastical or civil within this kingdom, or any of his majesty's dominions.

Item, he doth in his conscience believe, that all bishops ordained and made by the king's authority within any of his dominions are lawful bishops; and that no bishop made by the pope, or by any authority derived from the pope, within the king's dominions, hath any power or authority to impugn, disannul or controul any act done by any bishop made by his majesty's authority as aforesaid.

Item, he professeth himself willing and ready to obey the king, as a good and obedient subject ought to do, in all his lawful commandments, either concerning his function of priesthood, or any other duty belonging to a good subject.

After this confession made, the state here had no purpose to proceed against him severely, either for his contempt of the proclamation, or offence against the law: so as he had more liberty than before, and many of his friends had access unto him; who telling him what they heard of his confession, he protested unto them, that he had only acknowledged the king's civil and temporal power, without any confession or admittance of his authority in spiritual causes. This being reported unto the lord-deputy by sundry gentlemen, who gave faith unto what he said, his lordship thought fit, that since he had incurred the pain of præmunire, by exercising episcopal jurisdiction, as vicar-general to the pope, that he should be attainted of that offence; as well to make him an example to others of his profession, (for almost in every diocese of this kingdom there is a titular bishop ordained by the pope), as also that at the time of his trial a just occasion might be taken, to publish the confession and acknowledgment which he had voluntarily made, signed, and confirmed by oath before the lord-deputy and council, who have likewise subscribed their names as witnesses thereof.

Hereupon, in Hill. term, 4 Jacobi, an indictment was framed against him in the King's Bench upon the statute of 16 Rich. 2. cap. 5. containing these several points.

1. That he had received a bull or brief purchased or procured in the court of Rome, which bull or brief did touch or concern the king's crown and dignity royal, containing a commission of authority from the pope of Rome unto Richard Brady and David Magrath to constitute a vicar-general for the see of Rome, by the name of the See Apostolick, in the several dioceses of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, within this kingdom of Ireland.

2. That by pretext or colour of that bull or brief he was constituted vicar-general of the see of Rome, and took upon him the stile and title of vicar-general in the said several dioceses.

3. That he did exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction as vicar-general of the see of Rome, by instituting divers persons to benefices with cure of souls, by granting dispensations in causes matrimonial; by pronouncing sentences of divorce between divers married persons, and by doing all other acts and things pertaining to episcopal jurisdiction, within the said several dioceses, against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity royal, and in contempt of his majesty, and disherison of his crown; and contrary to the form and effect of the statute, &c.

To this indictment Lalor pleaded guilty; and when the issue was to be tried, the name and reputation of the man, and the nature of the cause, drew all the principal gentlemen both of the pale and provinces that were in town to the hearing of the matter. At which time a substantial

substantial jury of the city of Dublin being sworn for the trial, and the points of the indictment being opened and set forth by the king's serjeant; the attorney-general thought it not impertinent, but very necessary, before he descended to the particular evidence against the prisoner, to inform and satisfy the hearers in two points.

1. What reason moved us to ground this indictment upon the old statute of 16 Rich. 2. rather than upon some other later law made since the time of king Henry 8.

2. What were the true causes of the making of this law of 16 Rich. and other formal laws against provisors, and such as did appeal to the court of Rome in those times, when both the prince and people of England did for the most part acknowledge the pope to be the thirteenth apostle, and only oracle in matters of religion, and did follow his doctrine in most of those points wherein we now dissent from him.

1. For the first point, we did purposely forbear to proceed against him upon any latter law, to the end that such as were ignorant might be informed, that long before king Henry 8. was born divers laws were made against the usurpation of the bishop of Rome upon the rights of the crown of England, well-nigh as sharp and severe as any statutes which have been made in later times; and that therefore we made choice to proceed upon a law made more than 200 years past, when the king, the lords and commons, which made the laws, and the judges, which did interpret the laws, did for the most part follow the same opinions in religion which were taught and held in the court of Rome.

2. For the second point, the causes that moved and almost enforced the English nation to make this, and other statutes of the same nature, were of the greatest importance that could possibly arise in any state. For these laws were made to uphold and maintain the sovereignty of the king, the liberty of the people, the common law, and the commonweal, which otherwise had been undermined and utterly ruined by the usurpation of the bishop of Rome.

For albeit the kings of England were absolute emperors within their dominions, and had under them as learned a prelacy and clergy, as valiant and prudent a nobility, as free and wealthy a commonalty, as any was then in Christendom; yet if we look into the stories and records of these two imperial kingdoms, we shall find, that if these laws of provision and præmunire had not been made, they had lost the name of imperial, and of kingdoms too, and had been long since made tributary provinces to the bishop of Rome, or rather part of St. Peter's patrimony in demesne. Our kings had had their scepters wrested out of their hands, their crowns spurned off from their heads, their necks trod upon; they had been made laquies or footmen to the bishop of Rome, as some of the emperors and French kings were; our prelates had been made his chaplains and clerks, our nobility his vassals and servants, our commons his slaves and villains; if these acts of manumission had not freed them. In a word, before the making of these laws, the flourishing crown and commonwealth of England was in extreme danger to have been brought into most miserable servitude and slavery, under colour of religion and devotion to the see of Rome. And this was not only seen and felt by the king, and much repined at and protested against by the nobility, but the commons, the general multitude of the subjects, did exclaim and cry out upon it. For the commons of England may be an example unto all other subjects in the world in this, that they have ever been tender and sensible of the wrongs and dishonours offered unto their kings, and have ever contended to uphold and maintain their honour and sovereignty. And their faith and loyalty have been generally such, (though every age hath brought forth some particular monsters of disloyalty) as no pretence of zeal or religion could ever withdraw the greater part of the subjects to submit themselves to a foreign yoke, no not when popery was in her height and exaltation; whereof this act and divers others of the same kind are clear and manifest testimonies. For this act of 16 Rich. 2. was made at the prayer of the commons: which prayer they make not for themselves, neither shew they their own self-love therein, (as in other bills which contain their grievances) but their love and zeal to the king and his crown. When after the Norman Conquest they importuned their kings for the great charter, they sought their own liberties; and in other bills preferred commonly by the commons against sheriffs, escheators, purveyors, or the like, they seek their own profit and ease. But here their petition is to the king, to make a law for the defence and maintenance of his own honour. They complain, that by bulls and processes from Rome, the king is deprived of that jurisdiction which belongs of right to his imperial crown; that the king doth lose the service and council of his prelates and learned men by translations made by the bishop of Rome; that the king's laws are defeated at his will, the treasure of the realm is exhausted and exported to enrich his court; and that by those means the crown of England, which hath ever been free, and subject unto none, but immediately unto God, should be submitted unto the bishop of Rome, to the utter destruction of the king and the whole realm; which God defend, say they: and thereupon, out of their exceeding zeal and fervency, they offer to live and die with the king in defence of the liberties of the crown. And lastly, they pray and require the king by way of justice, to examine all the lords in parliament, what they thought of these manifest wrongs and usurpations, and whether they would stand with the king in defence of his royal liberties, or no. Which the king did according to their petition: and the lords spiritual and temporal did all answer, that these usurpations of the bishop of Rome were against the liberties of the crown, and that they were all bound by their allegiance to stand with the king, and to maintain his honour and prerogative. And thereupon it was enacted with a full consent of the three estates, that such as should purchase in the court of Rome, or elsewhere, any bulls or processes, or other things which might touch the king in his crown and dignity royal, and such as should bring them into the realm, and such as should receive them, publish them, or execute them, they, their notaries, proctors, maintainers and counsellors, should be all out of the king's protection, their lands and goods forfeited to the king, their bodies attached if they might be found, or else process of præmunire facias to be awarded against them. Upon these motives, and with this affection and zeal of the people, was the statute of 16 Rich. 2. made, whereupon we have framed our indictment.

Now let us look higher and see, whether the former laws made by king Edw. 1. and king Edw. 3. against the usurpation of the bishop of Rome were not grounded upon the like cause and reason.

The statute of 38 Edw. 3. cap. 1. expressing the mischiefs that did arise by breves of citation, which drew the bodies of the people, and by bulls of provision and reservation of ecclesiastical benefices, which drew the wealth of the realm, to the court of Rome, doth declare, that by these means the ancient laws, customs and franchises of the realm were confounded, the crown of our sovereign lord the king diminished, and his person falsely defamed, the treasure and riches of the land carried away, the subjects of the realm molested and impoverished, the benefices of holy church wasted and destroyed, divine service, hospitality, alms-deeds and other works of charity neglected.

Again, 27 Edw. 3. cap. 1. upon the grievous and clamorous complaint (for that phrase is there used) of the great men and commons touching citations and provisions, it is enacted, that the offenders shall forfeit their lands, goods and chattels, and their bodies be imprisoned and ransomed at the king's will.

But in the stat. of 25 Edw. 3. wherein the first law against provisors made 25 Edw. 1. is recited, there is a larger declaration of these inconveniences than in the two last acts before mentioned. For there all the commons of the realm do grievously complain, that whereas the holy church of England was first founded in estate of prelacy by the kings and nobility of that realm, and by them endowed with great possessions and revenues in lands, rents and advowsons, to the end the people might be informed in religion, hospitality might be kept, and other works of charity might be exercised within the realm; and whereas the king and other founders of the said prelacies were the rightful patrons and advowees thereof, and upon avoidance of such ecclesiastical promotions had power to advance thereunto their kinsmen, friends, and other learned men of the birth of that realm, which being so advanced became able and worthy persons to serve the king in counsel, and other places in the commonweal; the bishop of Rome, usurping the seignory of such possessions and benefices, did give and grant the same to aliens, which did never dwell in England, and to cardinals, which might not dwell there, as if he were rightful patron of those benefices; whereas by the law of England he never had right to the patronage thereof; whereby in short time all the spiritual promotions in the realm would be engrossed into the hands of strangers, canonical elections of prelates would be abolished, works of charity would cease, the founders and true patrons of churches would be disinherited, the king's council would be weakened, the whole kingdom impoverished, and the laws and rights of the realm destroyed. Upon this complaint it was resolved in parliament, that these oppressions and grievances should not be suffered in any manner: and therefore it was enacted, that the king and his subjects should thenceforth enjoy the rights of patronage; that free elections of archbishops, bishops, and other prelates elective, should be made according to the ancient grants of the king's progenitors and their founders; that no bulls of provision should be put in execution, but that the provisors should be attached, fined, and ransomed at the king's will, and withal imprisoned, till they had renounced the benefits of their bulls, satisfied the party grieved, and given sureties not to commit the like offence again.

Now, Mr. Lalor, what think you of these things? Did you believe that such laws as these had been made against the pope 200, 250, 300 years since? Was king Hen. 8. the first prince that opposed the pope's usurped authority? Were our protestants the first subjects that ever complained of the court of Rome? Of what religion, think you, were the propounders and enactors of these laws? Were they good catholics, or good subjects, or what were they? You will not say they were protestants, for you will not admit the reformed religion to be so ancient as those times: neither can you say they were undutiful, for they strove to uphold their liege lord's sovereignty. Doubtless the people in those days did generally embrace the vulgar errors and superstitions of the Romish church, and in that respect were papists as well as you. But they had not learned the new doctrine of the pope's supremacy, and transcendent authority over kings; they did not believe he had power to depose princes, and discharge subjects of their allegiance, to abrogate the fundamental laws of kingdoms, and to impose his canons as binding laws upon all nations, without their consents; they thought it a good point of religion to be good subjects, to honour their king, to love their country, and to maintain the laws and liberties thereof, howsoever in other points they did err and were misled with the church of Rome.

So as now (Mr. Lalor) you have no excuse, no evasion, but your conscience must condemn you as well as the law; since the law-makers in all ages, and all religious papists and protestants, do condemn you: unless you think yourself wiser than all the bishops that were then in England, or all the judges, who in those days were learned in the civil and canon laws as well as in the common laws of England.

But you, being an Irishman, will say, perhaps, these laws were made in England, and that the Irish nation gave no particular consent thereunto, only there was an implicit consent wrapt and folded up in general terms given in the statute of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 22. whereby all statutes made in England are established and made of force in Ireland. Assuredly, though the first parliament held in Ireland was after the first law against provisors made in England, yet have there been as many particular laws made in Ireland against provisions,

The statute of 27 Edw. 3. cap. 1.

The statute of 25 Edw. 3. reciting the statute of 25 Edw. 1.

The statute of præmunire made at the prayer of the commons.

The effect of the statute of 16 Rich. 2. cap. 5.

These laws made by such as did profess the Romish religion.

Laws against provisions made in Ireland.

sions, citations, bulls and breves of the court of Rome, as are to be found in all the parliament-rolls in England. What will you say if in the self-same parliament of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 5. a special law were made, enacting, authorizing and confirming in this realm all the statutes of England made against provisors; if before this the like law were made 32 Hen. 6. cap. 4. and again 28 Hen. 6. cap. 30. the like; and before that, the like law were made 40 Edw. 3. cap. 13. in the famous parliament of Kilkenny; if a statute of the same nature were made 7 Edw. 4. cap. 2. and a severer law than all these, 16 Edw. 4. cap. 4. that such as purchase any bulls of provision in the court of Rome, as soon as they have published or executed the same to the hurt of any incumbent, should be adjudged traitors; which act, if it be not repealed by the statute of queen Mary, may terrify Mr. Laler more than all the acts which are before remembered?

When the pope began first to usurp upon the liberties of the crown of England.

But let us ascend yet higher, to see when the pope's usurpation, which caused all these complaints, began in England, with what success it was continued, and by what degrees it rose to that height, that it well-nigh over-topped the crown; whereby it will appear whether he had gained a circle by prescription, by a long and quiet possession, before the making of these laws.

The first encroachment of the bishop of Rome upon the liberties of the crown of England, was made in the time of king William the Conqueror. For before that time the pope's writ did not run in England, his bulls of excommunication and provision came not thither; no citation, no appeals were made from thence to the court of Rome; our archbishops did not purchase their palls there, neither had the pope the investiture of any of our bishopricks. For it is to be observed, that as under the temporal monarchy of Rome, Britany was one of the last provinces that was won, and one of the first that was lost again: so under the spiritual monarchy of the pope of Rome, England was one of the last countries of Christendom that received his yoke, and was again one of the first that did reject and cast it off. And truly, as in this, so in divers other points, the course of this spiritual monarchy of the pope may be aptly compared with the course of the temporal monarchies of the world. For as the temporal monarchies were first raised by intrusion upon other princes and commonweals; so did this spiritual prince (as they now stile him) grow to his greatness by usurping upon other states and churches. As the temporal monarchies, following the course of the sun, did rise in the east, and settle in the west; so did the hierarchy or government of the church. Of the four temporal monarchies, the first two were in Asia, the latter two in Europe; but the Roman monarchy did surpass and suppress them all. So were there four great patriarchs, or ecclesiastical hierarchies, two in the east, and two in the west; but the Roman patriarch exalted himself, and usurped a supremacy above them all. And as the rising of the Roman empire was most opposed of Carthage in Africa, (æmula Romæ Carthago;) so the council of Carthage and the African bishops did first forbid appeals to Rome, and opposed the supremacy of the pope. And doth not Daniel's image, whose head was of gold, and legs and feet of iron and clay, represent this spiritual monarchy as well as the temporal; whereas the first bishops of Rome were golden priests, though they had but wooden chalices, and that the popes of later times have been for the most part worldly and earthly-minded? And as the northern nations first revolted from the Roman monarchy, and at last brake it in pieces; have not the north and north-west nations first fallen away from the papacy; and are they not like in the end to bring it to ruin?

The pope had no jurisdiction in England in the time of the Britains.

But to return to our purpose. The bishop of Rome before the first Norman Conquest had no jurisdiction in the realm of England, neither in the time of the Britains, nor in the time of the Saxons. Eleutherius, the pope, within less than 200 years after Christ writes to Lucius, the British king, and calls him God's vicar within his kingdom: which title he would not have given to that king, if himself, under pretence of being God's vicar-general on earth, had claimed jurisdiction over all Christian kingdoms.

Pelagius the monk of Bangor, about the year 400, being cited to Rome, refused to appear upon the pope's citation, affirming that Britain was neither within his diocese nor his province. After that, about the year 600, Augustine the monk was sent by Gregory the Great into England, to convert the Saxons to the Christian religion. The British bishops then remaining in Wales regarded not his commission nor his doctrine, as not owing any duty, nor having any dependency on the court of Rome; but still retained their ceremonies and traditions which they received from the east church, upon the first plantation of the faith in that island, being divers and contrary to those of the church of Rome, which Augustine did endeavour to impose upon them.

The like doth Beda write of the Irish priests and bishops. For in the year 660, he reporteth, that a convocation of the clergy being called by king Oswif, there rose a disputation between Colman, one of our Irish saints, then present in that synod, and Wilfrid a Saxon priest, touching the observation of Easter, wherein the British and Irish churches did then differ from the church of Rome. Colman, for the celebration of Easter used in Ireland, affirmed it was the same, quod beatus evangelista Johannes, discipulus specialiter à Domino dilectus, in omnibus quibus præerat ecclesie celebrasse legimus. On the other part Wilfrid alledged, that all the churches of Christendom did then celebrate Easter after the Roman manner, except the churches of the Britains and Picts, qui contra totum orbem (saith he) stulto labore pugnant. Whereunto Colman replied, miror quare stultum laborem appellas, in quo tanti apostoli, qui super petrus Domini recumbere dignus fuit, exemplum sectamur. Numquid reverendissimum patrem nostrum Columbam & ejus successores, viros à Deo dilectos, divinis paginis contraria sapuisse aut egisse credendum est? In this disputation or dialogue, two things may be observed: first, that at this time the authority of the bishop of Rome was of no estimation in these islands: next, that the primitive churches of Britany and Ireland were instituted according to the form and discipline of the east churches, and not of the west, and planted by the disciples of John, and not of Peter. Thus much for the time of the Britains. For the Saxons, though king Ina gave the Peter-pence to the pope, partly as alms, and partly in recompence of a house erected in Rome for entertainment of English pilgrims; yet it is certain, that Alfred and Athelstane, Edgar and Edmund, Canutus and Edward the Confessor, and divers other kings of the Saxon race, did give all the bishopricks in England per annulum & baculum, without any other ceremony, as the emperor and French king and other Christian princes were wont to do. They made also several laws for the government of the church. Among others, St. Edward begins his laws with this protestation, that it is his princely charge, ut populum domini, & super omnia sanctam ecclesiam, regat & gubernet. And king Edgar, in his oration to his English clergy, ego (saith he) Constantini, vos Petri gladium habetis: jungamus dextras, & gladium gladio copulemus, ut ejiciantur extra castra leprosi, & purgetur sanctuarium Domini. So as the kings of England with their own clergy did govern the church, and therein sought no aid of the court of Rome. And the truth is, that though the pope had then long hands, yet he did not extend them so far as England; because they were full of business nearer home in drawing the emperor and the French king under his yoke. But upon the conquest made by the Norman, he apprehended the first occasion to usurp upon the liberties of the crown of England. For the Conqueror came in with the pope's banner, and under it won the battle which got him the garland; and therefore the pope presumed he might boldly pluck some flowers from it, being partly gained by his countenance and blessing. Hereupon he sent two legates into England, which were admitted and received by the Conqueror. With them he called a synod of the clergy, and deposed old Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, because he had not purchased his pall in the court of Rome. He displaced many bishops and abbots, to place his Normans in their rooms. And amongst the rest it is to be noted, that the king having earnestly moved Wulfstan bishop of Worcester, being then very aged, to give up his staff; his answer was, that he would give up his staff only to him of whom he first received the same. And so the old man went to St. Edward's tomb, and there offered up his staff and ring, with these words: Of thee, O holy Edward, I received my staff and my ring, and to thee I do now surrender the same again. Which proves, that before the Norman Conquest the king did invest his bishops per annulum & baculum, as I said before.

Thus we see, by the admission of the pope's legates, the first step or entry made into his usurped jurisdiction in England. Albeit, the king still retained the absolute power of investing bishops, and seemed only to use the advice and assistance of the legates in ecclesiastical matters; for that no decree passed or was put in execution without his royal assent thereunto. Besides, how far forth he submitted himself to the pope, it appeareth by a short epistle he wrote to Gregory 7. in this form. Excellentissimo sanctæ ecclesiæ pastori, Gregorio, gratia Dei Anglorum rex & dux Normannorum Willielmus salutem cum amicitia. Hubertus legatus tuus, religiose pater, ad me veniens ex tua parte, me admonuit, ut tibi & successoribus tuis fidelitatem facerem, & de pecunia, quam antecessores mei ad Romanam ecclesiam mittere solebant, melius cogitarem. Unum admisit, alterum non admisit. Fidelitatem facere nolui, nec volo; quia nec ego promisi, nec antecessores meos antecessoribus tuis id fecisse comperia. Pecunia, tribus fere annis, in Galliis me agente, negligenter collecta est. Nunc vero divina misericordia me in regnum meum reverso, quod collectum est per præfatum legatum, mittitur; & quod reliquum est, per legatos Lanfranci archiepiscopi fidelis nostri, cum opportunitum fuerit, transmittitur, &c.

But in the time of his next successor, king William Rufus, they attempted to pass one degree farther, that is, to draw appeals to the court of Rome. For Anselme being made archbishop of Canterbury, and being at some difference with the king, besought his leave to go to Rome, under pretence of fetching his pall. The king, knowing he would appeal to the pope, denied him leave to go, and withal told him that none of his bishops ought to be subject to the pope, but the pope himself ought to be subject to the emperor; and that the king of England had the same absolute liberties in his dominions as the emperor had in the empire; and that it was an ancient custom and law in England, used time out of mind before the Conquest, that none might appeal to the pope without the king's leave; and that he that breaketh this law or custom doth violate the crown and dignity royal, and he that violates my crown (saith he) is mine enemy, and a traitor. How answer you this, quoth the king? Christ himself answers you, saith the archbishop, tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram, &c. wherewith the king was nothing satisfied. And thereupon Anselme departing out of the realm without licence, the king seized his temporalities, and became so exasperate and implacable towards the bishop, as he kept him in perpetual exile during his reign; albeit great intercession were made for his return, as well by the pope as the king of France.

In the time of the next king, Hen. 1. though he were a learned and a prudent prince, yet they sought to gain a farther point upon him, and to pluck a flower from his crown of greater value, namely, the patronage and donation of bishopricks and all other benefices ecclesiastical. For Anselme being revoked and re-established in the see of Canterbury, the bishopricks of Salisbury and Hereford fell void, which the king bestowed on two of his chaplains. But Anselme their metropolitan did refuse to consecrate them, so as the archbishop of York was fain to perform that office, who with the chief of the English clergy stood with the king, and withstood Anselme. Hereupon the king requires him to do his homage; the bishop denies it. The king demands of him whether the patronage and investiture of all bishopricks were not his rightful inheritance. The bishop said it was not his right; because pope Urban had lately made a decree, that no lay person should give any ecclesiastical benefice. This was the first question, that ever was made, touching the king of England's right of patronage and donation of bishopricks within his dominions. This new question caused many messages and embassages to Rome. At last the king writes plainly to the pope, unum habet sanctuarium vestrum, quod

The first usurpation of the pope upon the crown began in the time of king William the Conqueror.

By sending legates into England.

In the time of W. Rufus the pope attempted to draw appeals to Rome, but prevailed not.

In the time of king Hen. the first the pope usurped the donation of bishopricks, &c.

How the first question was made, touching the king of England's right of patronage and donation of bishopricks within his dominions.

quid me vivente (Deo auxiliante) dignitates & usus regni nostri non minuentur; & si ego (quod absit) in tanta me directione ponerem, magnates mei, imo totius Angliæ populus, id nullo modo pateretur. Besides, William de Warrenh. the king's procurator in the court of Rome, told the pope, that the king would rather lose his kingdom than he would lose the donation of bishopricks. The pope answered, Know you precisely, sir, I speak it before God, that for the redemption of my head I would not suffer him to enjoy it.

After this Anselme being received into the king's favour, in a synod of the English clergy holden at London in the year 1107, a decree was made, cui annuit rex Henricus, saith Matth. Paris, that from thenceforth, nunquam per donationem baculi pastoralis vel annuli quisquam de episcopatu vel abbatia per regem, vel quamlibet laicam manum, investitur in Angliæ. In recompence whereof the pope yielded this favour to the king, that thenceforth no legate should be sent from the pope's side into England, unless the king required it; and that the archbishop of Canterbury for the time being should be for ever legatus natus; and Anselme, for the honour of his see, obtained, that the archbishop of Canterbury should in all general councils sit at the pope's foot, tanquam alterius orbis papa. Notwithstanding, as the succeeding popes kept not their promise touching the sending of legates, so this self-same king, after the death of Anselme, broke the decree touching the investiture of the bishops. For he gave the archbishoprick of Canterbury to Rodolph bishop of London, saith Matth. Paris, et illum per annulum & pastorem baculum investivit; as before he had invested William Gifford in the bishoprick of Winchester, contra novi concilii statuta, as the same author reporteth.

The times of the next succeeding king Stephen were full of civil dissensions, which made the land well-nigh waste, so as St. Peter's successor could not take any fish in such troubled waters. Yet during this king's reign they won that point of jurisdiction, which they attempted to get, but failed thereof, in the time of king William Rufus; namely, that appeals might be made to the court of Rome. For in a synod at London summoned by Henry bishop of Winchester, the pope's legate, it was decreed, that appeals should be made from provincial councils to the pope. Before that time appellationes in usu non erant, saith a monk of that time, domine Henricus Winton. Episcopus malo suo, dum legatus esset, crudeliter intrusit. Thus did the pope usurp three main points of jurisdiction upon three several kings after the Conquest, (for of William Rufus he could win nothing) namely, upon the Conqueror, the sending of legates or commissioners to hear and determine ecclesiastical causes; upon Hen. 1. the donation and investitures of bishopricks and other benefices; upon king Stephen, the appeals to the court of Rome.

Now are we come to king Henry 2. in whose time they made a farther encroachment upon the crown, whereby they endeavoured to make him but half a king, and to take away half his subjects, by exempting all clerks from secular power. Hereupon rose that long and great contention between Henry 2. and Thomas Becket, which on Becket's behalf may be rightly termed rebellion and treason; the just cause and ground whereof was the same that made the late difference between the pope and the Venetians. For a priest had committed a foul murder; and being thereof indicted and convicted, prayed the benefit of his clergy; which being allowed unto him, he was delivered to the bishop of Salisbury, being his ordinary, to make his purgation; which the murderer failing to do should by the law have been degraded, and delivered back to the secular power. But the bishop, contemning the law of the land, to enlarge the liberties of the church, sent his prisoner to Thomas Becket then archbishop of Canterbury, who shifted him into an abbey, and so rescued him from the capital punishment he had justly deserved.

This gap of impunity being once opened, the clergy grew so outrageous, as the king was informed of a hundred murders committed by clerks; and yet not one of them executed for the same; for that the archbishop had protected them all after the same manner. For this the king was justly incensed against the archbishop, who justified his doing herein. Whereupon a common council as well of the bishops as of the nobility was called, wherein they did revive and re-establish the ancient laws and customs of the kingdom for the government of the clergy, and ordering of causes ecclesiastical, whereof these were the principal heads or articles.

1. That no bishop nor clerk should depart the realm without the king's licence; and that such as obtained licence should give securities, that they should procure no hurt or damage to the king or realm during their absence in foreign parts.

2. That all bishopricks and abbeys being void should remain in the king's hands as his own demesnes, until he had chosen and appointed a prelate thereunto; and that every such prelate should do his homage to the king before he were admitted into the place.

3. That appeals should be made in causes ecclesiastical in this manner; from the archdeacon to the ordinary, from the ordinary to the metropolitan, from the metropolitan to the king, and no farther.

4. That Peter-pence should be paid no more to the pope, but to the king.

5. That if any clerk should commit felony, he should be hanged; if treason, he should be drawn and quartered.

6. That it should be adjudged high-treason to bring in bulls of excommunication, whereby the realm should be cursed.

7. That no decree should be brought from the pope to be executed in England, upon pain of imprisonment and confiscation of goods.

To these and other constitutions of the like nature made at Clarendon, all the rest of the bishops and great men did subscribe, and bound themselves by oath to observe the same absolutely. Only the archbishop would not subscribe, and swear, but with a saving, salvo suo ordine & bonæ fidei ecclesiæ. Yet at last he was content to make the like absolute subscription and oath as the rest had done; but presently he repented, and to shew his repentance suspended himself from celebrating mass, till he had received absolution from the pope. Then he began to maintain and justify the exemption of clerks again; whereat the king's displeasure was kindled anew; and then the archbishop once again promised absolute obedience to the king's laws. (See the fickleness and mutability of your constant martyr.) The king, to bind fast this slippery Præmunire, called a parliament of the bishops and barons; and sending for the roll of those laws, required all the bishops to set their seals thereunto. They all assented but the archbishop, who protested he would not set his seal, nor give allowance to those laws. The king, being highly offended with his rebellious demeanour, required the barons in parliament to give judgment of him, who being his subject would not be ruled by his laws; cito facite mihi iustitiam de illo, qui homo meus ligeus est, & stare juri in curia mea recusat. Whereupon the barons proceeding against him, and being ready to condemn him; I prohibit you (quoth the archbishop) in the name of Almighty God to proceed against me; for I have appealed to the pope: and so departed in contempt of that high court, omnibus clamantibus, saith Hoveden, quo progredieris proditor? expecta & audi judicium tuum. After this he lurked secretly near the sea-shore; and changing his apparel and name (like a Jesuit of these times,) he took shipping with a purpose to fly to Rome. But his passage being hindered by contrary winds, he was summoned to a parliament at Northampton, where he made default wilfully; for which contempt, his temporalities were seized, and his body being attached, he was charged with so great an account to the king, as that he was found in arrear thirty thousand marks, and committed to prison; whence he found means to escape shortly after, and to pass out of the realm to Rome. He was no sooner gone, but the king sends writs to all the sheriffs in England to attach the bodies of all such as made any appeals to the court of Rome. Hereupon many messages and letters passing to and fro, all the suffragans of Canterbury join in a letter to the pope, wherein they condemn the fugitive archbishop, and justify the king's proceedings. Upon this the pope sends two legates to the king, being then in Normandy, to mediate for the archbishop. They, with the mediation of the French king, prevailed so far with king Henry, as that he was pleased to accept his submission once again, and promised the king of France, that if he would be obedient to his laws, he should enjoy as ample liberties as any archbishop of Canterbury ever had; and so sent him into England with recommendation unto the young king his son, then lately crowned; who, hearing of his coming, commanded him to forbear to come to his presence, until he had absolved the archbishop of York and others, whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at his coronation. The archbishop returned answer, that they had done him wrong in usurping his office; yet if they would take a solemn oath to become obedient to the pope's commandment in all things concerning the church, he would absolve them. The bishops, understanding this, protested they would never take that oath, unless the king willed them so to do. King Henry the father, being hereof advertised into France, did rise into great passion and choler, and in the hearing of his servants uttered words to this effect; Will no man revenge me of mine enemies? Whereupon the four gentlemen named in the stories of that time passed into England, and first moving the archbishop to absolve the bishops whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at the young king's coronation, and receiving a peremptory answer of denial from the archbishop, they laid violent hands upon him, and slew him; for which the king was fain not only to suffer corporal penance, but in token of his humiliation to kiss the knee of the pope's legate. And this is the abridgment of Becket's troubles, or rather treasons, for which he was celebrated for so famous a martyr. And thus you see by what degrees the court of Rome did within the space of 100 and odd years usurp upon the crown of England four points of jurisdiction, viz. First, sending out of legates into England. Secondly, drawing of appeals to the court of Rome. Thirdly, donation of bishopricks and other ecclesiastical benefices. And fourthly, exemption of clerks from the secular power. And you see withal how our kings and parliaments have from time to time opposed and withstood this unjust usurpation.

Now then the bishop of Rome having claimed and well nigh recovered full and sole jurisdiction in all causes ecclesiastical, and over all persons ecclesiastical, with power to dispose of all ecclesiastical benefices in England, whereby he had upon the matter made an absolute conquest of more than half the kingdom; (for every one that could read the psalm of Miserere was a clerk, and the clergy possessed the moiety of all temporal possessions) there remained now nothing to make him owner and proprietor of all, but to get a surrender of the crown, and to make the king his farmer, and the people his villains, which he fully accomplished and brought to pass in the times of king John and of Henry 3.

The quarrel between the pope and king John, which wrested the scepter out of his hand, and in the end brake his heart, began about the election of the archbishop of Canterbury. I call it election, and not donation or investiture; for the manner of investing of bishops by the staff and ring after the time of king Hen. 1. was not any more used, but by the king's licence they were canonically elected, and being elected, the king gave his royal assent to their election, and by restitution of their temporalities did fully invest them. And though this course of election began to be in use in the time of Ric. 1. and Hen. 2. yet I find it not confirmed by any constitution or charter before the time of king John, who by his charter dated the 15th of January, in the sixteenth year of his reign, granted this privilege to the church of England in these words, viz. Quod quoscunque consuetudo temporibus predecessorum nostrorum baculus in ecclesia Anglicana fuerit observata, & quicquid juris nobis baculus vindicaverimus, do eorum in universis & singulis ecclesiis & monasteriis, cathedralibus & conventibus, totius regni Angliæ, libera sint in perpetuum electiones quorumcumque prelatorum, majorum & minorum: salva nobis & heredibus nostris custodia ecclesiarum & monasteriorum vacantium que ad nos pertinent. Promittimus etiam, quod nec impedimus nec impediri permittemus per ministros nostros, nec procuratores, quoniam in universis & singulis monasteriis & ecclesiis, postquam vacaverint prelatibus, quancumque voluerint libere sibi præficiant electores pos-

Four points of jurisdiction usurped upon the crown of England by the pope before the reign of king John.

The cause of the quarrel between king John and the pope.

When canonical election began first in England.

torum, petita tamen à nobis prius & hæredibus nostris licentia eligendi, quam non denegabimus nec differemus. Et similiter, post celebratam electionem, noster requiratur assensus, quem non denegabimus, nisi adversus eandem rationale proposuerimus, & legitimè probaverimus propter quod non debemus consentire, &c.

But to return to the cause of his great quarrel with the pope. The see of Canterbury being void, the monks of Canterbury suddenly and secretly without the king's license elected one Reignold their sub-prior to be archbishop, who immediately posted away to be confirmed by the pope. But when he came there, the pope rejected him, because he came not recommended from the king. Hereupon the monks made suit to the king to nominate some fit person to whose election they might proceed. The king commends John Gray bishop of Norwich, his principal counsellor, who was afterwards lord justice of this kingdom, who with a full consent was elected by them, and afterwards admitted and fully invested by the king. These two elections bred such a controversy as none might determine but the pope, who gave a short rule in the case; for he pronounced both elections void, and caused some of the monks of Canterbury, who were then present in the court of Rome, to proceed to the election of Stephen Langton, lately made cardinal at the motion and suit of the French king: who being so elected was forthwith confirmed and consecrated by the pope, and recommended to the king of England with a flattering letter, and a present of four rings set with precious stones, which were of great value and estimation in those days. Howbeit, the king more esteeming this jewel of the crown, namely, the patronage of bishopricks, returned a round and kindly answer to the pope, that inconsiderately and rashly he had called and made void the election of the bishop of Norwich, and had caused one Langton, a man to him unknown, and bred up and nourished amongst his mortal enemies, to be consecrated archbishop, without any due form of election, and without his royal assent, which was most of all requisite by the ancient laws and customs of his realm. That he marvelled much, that the pope himself and the whole court of Rome did not consider what a precious account they ought to make of the king of England's friendship, in regard that his one kingdom did yield them more profit and revenue than all the other countries on this side the Alps. To conclude, he would maintain the liberties of his crown to the death, he would restrain all his subjects from going to Rome. And since the archbishops, bishops and other prelates within his dominions, were as learned and religious as any other in Christendom, his subjects should be judged by them in ecclesiastical matters, and should not need to run out of their own country to beg justice at the hands of strangers.

King John's round and kindly letter to the pope.

The pope curseth the king, and interdicteth the realm.

But what followed upon this? The pope, after a sharp reply, sendeth forth a bull of malediction against the king, and of interdiction against the realm, whereby all the churches in England were shut up, the priests and religious persons were forbidden to use any liturgies or divine service, to marry, to bury, or to perform any Christian duty among the people. This put the king into such a rage, that he on the other part seized the temporalities of all bishops and abbots, and confiscated the goods of all the clergy. Then doth the pope by a solemn sentence at Rome depose the king, and by a bull sent into England dischargeth his subjects of their allegiance, and by a legate sent to the king of France gave the kingdom of England to him and his successors for ever.

These things brought such confusion and misery to all estates and degrees of people in England, as the king became odious to all his subjects, as well to the laity as to the clergy. For as the bishops and religious people cursed him abroad; so the barons took arms against him at home, till with much bloodshed they forced him, by granting the great charter, to restore king Edward's laws, containing the ancient liberties of the subjects of England. The pope being a spectator of this tragedy, and seeing the king in so weak and desperate estate, sent a legate to comfort him, and to make a reasonable motion unto him; to wit, that he should surrender and give up his crown and kingdom to the pope, which should be regranted unto him again to hold in fee-farm and vassalage of the church of Rome: and that thereupon the pope would bless him and his realm again, and curse his rebels and enemies in such sort, as he should be better established in his kingdom then he was before. In a word, this motion was presently embraced by that miserable king, so as with his own hands he gave up the crown to the pope's legate, and by an instrument or charter sealed with a bull or seal of gold he granted to God and the church of Rome, the apostles Peter and Paul, and to pope Innocent the third and his successors, the whole kingdom of England, and the whole kingdom of Ireland; and took back an estate thereof by an instrument sealed with lead, yielding yearly to the church of Rome over and above the Peter-pence a thousand marks sterling, viz. seven hundred marks for England, and three hundred marks for Ireland, with a flattering saving of all his liberties and royalties. The pope had no sooner gotten this conveyance, though it were void in law, but he excommunicateth the barons, and repeals the great charter, affirming that it contained liberties too great for his subjects; calls the king his vassal, and these kingdoms St. Peter's patrimony; grants a general bull of provision for the bestowing of all ecclesiastical benefices, and takes upon him to be absolute and immediate lord of all. And thus, under colour of exercising jurisdiction within these kingdoms, the pope, by degrees, got the very kingdoms themselves. And so would he do at this day, if the king would give way to his jurisdiction.

But what use did the pope make of this grant and surrender of the crown unto him? What did he gain by it, if our kings retained the profits of their kingdoms to their own use? Indeed we do not find, that the fee-farm of a thousand marks was ever paid, but that it is all run in arrear till this present day. For the truth is, the court of Rome did scorn to accept so poor a revenue as a thousand marks per annum out of two kingdoms. But after the death of king John, during all the reign of Hen. 3. his son, the pope did not claim a seigniorship or a rent out of

VOL. XI.

England and Ireland, but did endeavour to convert all the profits of both lands to his own use, as if he had been seized of all in demesne. For whosoever will read Matt. Paris his story of the time of king Hen. 3. will say these things spoken of before were but the beginnings of evils. For the exactions and oppressions of the court of Rome were so continual and intolerable, as that poor monk, who lived in those times, though otherwise he adored the pope, doth call England Balaam's ass laden, beaten, and enforced to speak; doth call the court of Rome Charybdis and Barathrum avaritiæ, the pope's collectors harpys, and the pope himself a stepfather, and the church of Rome a stepmother. He sheweth, that two third parts of the land being then in the hands of church-men, the entire profits thereof were exported to enrich the pope and the court of Rome: which was done for the most part by these two ways and means. First, by conferring the best ecclesiastical benefices upon Italians, and other strangers resident in that court, whose farmers and factors in England took the profits, turned them into money, and returned the money to Rome. Secondly, by imposing continual taxes and tallages, (worse then Irish cuttings) being sometimes the tenth, sometimes the fifteenth, sometimes the third, sometimes the moiety of all the goods both of the clergy and laity, under colour of maintaining the pope's holy wars against the emperor and the Greek church, who were then said to be in rebellion against their lady and mistress the church of Rome. Besides, for the speedy levying and safe return of these moneys, the pope had his Lombards and other Italian bankers and usurers resident in London and other parts of the realm, who offered to lend and disburse the moneys taxed, and return the same by exchange to Rome, taking such penal bonds, the form whereof is set down by Matt. Paris, and such excessive usury, as the poor religious houses were fain to sell their chalices and copes, and the rest of the clergy and laity had their backs bowed and their estates broken under the burthen. Besides, the pope took for perquisites and casualties the goods of all clerks that died intestate, the goods of all usurers, and all goods given to charitable uses. Moreover he had a swarm of friars, (the first corrupters of religion in England) who persuaded the nobility and gentry to put on the sign of the cross, and to vow themselves to the holy wars; which they had no sooner done, but they were again persuaded to receive dispensations of their vows, and to give money for the same to the church of Rome. I omit divers other policies then used by the pope's collectors to exhaust the wealth of the realm, which they affirmed they might take with as good a conscience as the Hebrews took the jewels of the Egyptians. Briefly, whereas the king had scarce means to maintain his royal family, they received out of England seventy thousand pounds sterling at least yearly, which amounteth to two hundred and ten thousand pounds sterling of the monies current at this day. Besides, they exported six thousand marks out of Ireland at one time, which the emperor Frederick intercepted. Lastly, the king himself was so much dejected, as at a royal feast he placed the pope's legate in his own chair of estate, himself sitting on his right hand, and the bishop of York on his left, non sine multorum obliquantibus oculis, saith Matt. Paris.

Thus we see the effect of the pope's pretended jurisdiction within the dominions of the king of England. We see to what calamity and servitude it then reduced both the prince and people. Was it not therefore high time to meet and oppose those inconveniences? Assuredly if king Edward 1. who was the son and heir of Hen. 3. had inherited the weakness of his father, and had not resisted this usurpation and insolency of the court of Rome, the pope had been proprietor of both these islands, and there had been no king of England at this day.

But king Edward 1. may well be stiled vindex Angliæ libertatis, the Moses that delivered his people from slavery and oppression: and as he was a brave and victorious prince, so was he the best pater patriæ that ever reigned in England since the Norman Conquest, till the coronation of our gracious sovereign. At the time of the death of his father he was absent in the war of the holy land, being a principal commander of the Christian army there, so as he returned not before the second year of his reign. But he was no sooner returned and crowned, but the first work he did was to shake off the yoke of the bishop of Rome. For the pope having then summoned a general council, before he would license his bishops to repair to it, he took of them a solemn oath, that they should not receive the pope's blessing. Again, the pope forbids the king to war against Scotland; the king regards not his prohibition: he demands the first-fruits of ecclesiastical livings; the king forbids the payment thereof unto him. The pope sendeth forth a general bull prohibiting the clergy to pay subsidies or tributes to temporal princes: a tenth was granted to the king in parliament, the clergy refused to pay it: the king seizeth their temporalities for their contempt, and got payment notwithstanding the pope's bull. After this he made the statute of Mortmain, whereby he brake the pope's chief net, which within an age or two more would have drawn to the church all the temporal possessions of the kingdom, &c. Again, one of the king's subjects brought a bull of excommunication against another: the king commandeth he should be executed as a traitor, according to the ancient law. But because that law had not of long time been put in execution, the chancellor and treasurer kneeled before the king, and obtained grace for him, so as he was onely banished out of the realm. And as he judged it treason to bring in bulls of excommunication; so he held it a high contempt against the crown to bring in bulls of provision or briefs of citation; and accordingly the law was so declared in parliament 25 Ed. 1. which was the first statute made against provisors: the execution of which law, during the life of king Ed. 1. did well-nigh abolish the usurped jurisdiction of the court of Rome, and did revive and restore again the ancient and absolute sovereignty of the king and crown of England.

His successor, king Edward 2. being but a weak prince, the pope attempted to usurp upon him again: but the peers and people withstood his usurpation. And when that unhappy king was to be deposed, amongst many articles framed against him

King Ed. 1. opposeth the pope's usurpation.

Ed. 1. suffereth the pope to usurp again.

him by his enemies, this was one of the most hainous, that he had given allowance to the pope's bulls.

E. 3. rebelleth the usurpation of the pope. Again, during the minority of king Ed. 3. and after that in the heat of the wars in France, the pope sent many briefs and bulls into England; and at last presumed so far, as that he gave an Italian the title of a cardinal in England, and withal by his bull gave him power to bestow all ecclesiastical promotions as they should fall void from time to time. This moved the king and the nobility to write to the pope to this effect. 'We and our ancestors have richly endowed the church of England, and have founded abbies and other religious houses for the jurisdiction of our people, for maintenance of hospitality, and for the advancement of our countrymen and kinsmen. Now you provide and place strangers in our benefices, that come not to keep residence thereupon; and if they come, understand not our language; and some of them are subjects to our mortal enemies; by reason whereof our people are not instructed, hospitality is not kept, our scholars are unpreferred, and the treasure of the realm is exported.' The pope returneth answer, that the emperor had lately submitted himself to the church of Rome in all points, and was become the pope's great friend; and in menacing manner advised the king of England to do the like. The king replies, that if the emperor and French king both should take his part, he was ready to give battle to both in defence of the liberties of his crown. Hereupon the several statutes against provisors before recited were put in execution so severely, as the king and his subjects enjoyed their right of patronage clearly: and their exemption of clerks took no place at all; for that the abbot of Waltham and bishop of Winchester were both attained of high contempts, and the bishop of Ely of a capital offence, as appeareth in the records of this king's reign. Yet

King Rich. 2. during the nonage of Rich. 2. they began once again to encroach upon the crown, by sending legates and bulls and briefs into England, whereof the people were so sensible and impatient, as that at their special prayer, this law of 16 Rich. 2. (whereupon our indictment is framed) was enacted, being more sharp and penal than all the former statutes against provisors. And yet against this king, as against Ed. 2. it was objected at the time of his deprivation, that he had allowed the pope's bulls, to the enthralling of the crown.

After this in the weak time of king Hen. 6. they made one attempt more to revive their usurped jurisdiction by this policy. The commons had denied the king a subsidy when he stood in great want of moneys. The archbishop of Canterbury and the rest of the bishops offered the king a large supply of his wants, if he would consent that all the laws against provisors, and especially this law of 16 Rich. 2. might be repealed. But Humphry duke of Gloucester, who had lately before cast the pope's bull into the fire, did likewise cause this motion to be rejected. So as by special providence these laws have stood in force even till this day in both these kingdoms.

The evidence against Lator. Then the attorney-general descended to the evidence, whereby he proved fully all the parts of the indictment. First, it was proved by Lator's own confession, upon several examinations taken before the lord-deputy and lord-chancellor, and others, that he had accepted the office and title of vicar-general in the dioceses of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, by virtue of the pope's bull. Secondly, it appeared by the copies of sundry letters found among his papers at his apprehension, that he stiled himself the pope's vicar, in this form, Robertus Dublinien. & Kildaren. & Fernen. diocesis. vicarius apostolicus. Thirdly, there were produced the copies of divers acts and instruments, written for the most part with Lator's own hand, some of institutions of popish priests to benefices, others of dispensations with marriage within the degrees, others of divorces, others of dispensations for non-payment of tithes. Whereby it was manifestly proved that he did execute the pope's bull, in usurping and exercising episcopal jurisdiction, as vicar-general of the see apostolick, within the dioceses before named.

To this evidence he made a three-fold answer. First, that he was no suiter for the office of vicar-general, but it was imposed on him, and he accepted virtute obedientie, only to obey his superiors. Next, that he did exercise the office of vicar-general in foro conscientie tantum, and not in foro judicii. And lastly, that those copies of institutions, dispensations and divorces, were many of them written with his man's hand, as precedents of such acts and instruments, without his privacy or direction. Hereupon sir James Ley, chief justice, told him, that he could not well say, that he accepted that unlawful office virtute obedientie, for there was no virtue in that obedience; that he owed an obedience to the law and to the king, who is the true superior and sovereign over all his subjects, and hath no peer within his dominions; and that the superiors whom he meant and intended were but usurpers upon the king's jurisdiction, and therefore this excuse did aggravate his contempt, in that it appeared he had vowed obedience to those who were apparent enemies to the king and his crown. And though it were manifest that he exercised jurisdiction in foro judicii, (for every institution is a judgment, and so is every sentence of divorce) yet were his offence nothing diminished if he had executed his office of vicar-general in foro conscientie tantum; for the court of man's conscience is the highest tribunal, and wherein the power of the keys is exercised in the highest degree.

Hereunto the attorney-general took occasion to add thus much, that Lator had committed these high offences, not only against the law, but against his own conscience, and that he was already condemned in foro conscientie. For that he upon his second examination had voluntarily acknowledged himself not to be a lawful vicar-general, and that he thought in his conscience he could not lawfully take upon him the said office. He hath also acknowledged our sovereign lord king James to be his lawful, chief and supreme governor, in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil; and that he is in conscience bound to obey him in all the said causes, &c. as it is contained in his acknowledgment or confession before set down:

Lator's confession publicly read. which being shewed forth by the attorney-general, the court caused it to be publicly read; and thereupon demanded of Lator, if that were not his free and voluntary confession signed with his own hand, and confirmed by his oath before the lord-deputy and council. He was not a little abashed at the publishing of this acknowledgment and confession in the hearing of so many principal gentlemen, to whom he had preached a contrary doctrine; therefore, said he, the shewing forth of this confession is altogether impertinent and besides the matter. Howsoever, he could not deny but that he made it, and signed it, and swore it, as it was testified by the lord-deputy and the rest.

Then was it demanded of him, whether since the making of this confession he had not protested to divers of his friends, that he had not acknowledged the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical causes. His answer was, that indeed he had said to some of his friends who visited him in the Castle of Dublin, that he had not confessed or acknowledged that the king was his supreme governor in spiritual causes, for that the truth is, in the confession there is no mention made of spiritual causes, but of ecclesiastical.

This is a subtle evasion indeed, said the attorney-general; I pray you what difference do you make between ecclesiastical causes and spiritual causes? This question, said Lator, is sudden and unexpected at this time, and therefore you shall do well to take another day to dispute this point. Nay, said the attorney-general, we can never speak of it in a better time or fitter place; and therefore, though you, that bear so reverend a title, and hold the reputation of so great a clerk, require a farther time, yet shall you hear that we laymen that serve his majesty, and by the duty of our places are to maintain the jurisdiction of the crown, are never so unprovided, but that we can say somewhat touching the nature and difference of these causes.

First then, let us see when this distinction of ecclesiastical or spiritual causes from civil and temporal causes did first begin in point of jurisdiction. Assuredly, for the space of three hundred years after Christ, this distinction was not known or heard of in the Christian world. For the causes of testaments, of matrimony, of bastardy and adultery, and the rest which are called ecclesiastical or spiritual causes, were merely civil, and determined by the rules of the civil law, and subject only to the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate, as all civilians will testify with me.

But after that the emperors had received the Christian faith, out of a zeal and desire they had to grace and honour the learned and godly bishops of that time, they were pleased to single out certain special causes wherein they granted jurisdiction unto the bishops; namely, in causes of tithes, because they were paid to men of the church; in causes of matrimony, because marriages were for the most part solemnized in the church; in causes testamentary, because testaments were many times made in extremis, when church-men were present, giving spiritual comfort to the testator, and therefore they were thought the fittest persons to take the probates of such testaments. Howbeit these bishops did not proceed in these causes according to the canons and decrees of the church, (for the canon law was not then hatched or dreamed of) but according to the rules of the imperial law, as the civil magistrate did proceed in other causes; neither did the emperors, in giving this jurisdiction unto them, give away their own supreme and absolute power, to correct and punish these judges as well as others, if they performed not their several duties. This then is most certain, that the primitive jurisdiction in all these causes was in the civil magistrate, and so in right it remains at this day; and though it be derived from him, it remaineth in him as in the fountain. For every Christian monarch (as well as the godly kings of Juda) is custos utriusque tabule; and consequently hath power to punish not only treason, murder, theft, and all manner of force and fraud, but incest, adultery, usury, perjury, simony, forcery, idolatry, blasphemy. Neither are these causes in respect of their own quality and nature to be distinguished one from another by the names of spiritual or temporal: for why is adultery a spiritual cause, rather than murder, when they are both offences alike against the second table; or idolatry rather than perjury, being both offences likewise against the first table? And indeed if we consider the natures of these causes, it will seem somewhat absurd, that they are distinguished by the name of spiritual and temporal; for, to speak properly, that which is opposed to spiritual should be termed carnal; and that which is opposed to temporal should be called eternal. And therefore if things were called by their proper names, adultery should not be called a spiritual offence, but a carnal. But shall I express plainly and briefly why these causes were first denominated, some spiritual or ecclesiastical, and others temporal and civil?

Truly, they were so called, not from the nature of the causes, as I said before, but from the quality of the persons whom the prince had made judges in those causes. The clergy did study spiritual things, and did profess to live secundum spiritum; and were called spiritual men; and therefore they called the causes wherein princes had given them jurisdiction spiritual causes, after their own name and quality. But because the lay-magistrates were said to intend the things of this world, which are temporal and transitory, the clergy called them secular or temporal men, and the causes wherein they were judges temporal causes. This distinction began first in the court of Rome, where the clergy having by this jurisdiction gotten great wealth, their wealth begot pride, their pride begot ingratitude towards princes, who first gave them their jurisdiction; and then, according to the nature of all ungrateful persons, they went about to extinguish the memory of the benefit. For whereas their jurisdiction was first derived from Caesar, in the execution whereof they were Caesar's judges, so as both their courts and causes ought still to have born Caesar's image and superscription, as belonging unto Caesar; they blotted Caesar's name out of the stile of their courts, and called them courts Christian, as if the courts holden by other magistrates had been in comparison but courts of Ethnicks; and the causes which in their nature were merely civil, they called spiritual and ecclesiastical. So as if the emperor should challenge his courts and causes again, and say, redde Casari quæ sunt Caesaris, they would all cry out on the contrary part and say, dare Deo quæ sunt Dei; our courts bear the name and title of Christ, the superscription of Cæsar is quite worn out, and not to be found upon them. And this point of their policy is worth the observing, that when they found their jurisdiction in matrimonial causes to be the most sweet and gainful of all other, (for of matrimony they made matter of money indeed) to the end that Cæsar might never resume so rich a perquisite of their spiritual jurisdiction, they reduced matrimony into the number of the seven sacraments: after which time it had been sacrilege, if the civil magistrate had intermeddled with the least matter that had relation to matrimony, or any dependency thereupon. So then it appeareth, that all causes, whereof ecclesiastical or spiritual persons have cognizance or jurisdiction by the grants or permission of princes, are called ecclesiastical or spiritual causes. And as all their courts are called spiritual courts, so all causes determinable in those courts are called spiritual causes. And therefore where M. Lator hath acknowledged the king's majesty to be supreme governor in all ecclesiastical causes, he hath therein acknowledged the king's supremacy in all spiritual causes; wherein he hath but rendered to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, and hath given unto his majesty no more than all the bishops of England have yielded to his predecessors; not only in this latter age, but also in former times both before and since the Conquest, as hath been before at large expressed.

When the distinction of ecclesiastical and spiritual causes from civil and temporal causes began in the world.

Here the day being far spent, the court demanded of the prisoner if he had any more to say for himself. His answer was, that he did willingly renounce his office of vicar-general, and did humbly crave his majesty's grace and pardon. And to that end, he desired the court to move the lord-deputy to be favourable unto him. Then the jury departed from the bar, and returning within half an hour, found the prisoner guilty of the contempts whereof he was indicted. Whereupon the solicitor-general moved the court to proceed to judgement. And sir Dominick Sarsfield, knight, one of the justices of his majesty's chief place, gave judgment according to the form of the statute whereupon the indictment was framed.

[The encroachments of the church of Rome, on the king's ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are the subject of other cases besides the preceding one of præmunire. In particular they are historically discussed in lord Coke's Case of the King's Ecclesiastical Law, in the 5th Report. The publication of this latter case, with the active zeal of lord Coke as attorney-general, in the prosecution of the conspirators in the gunpowder-plot, gave occasion to a volume of animadversions by the famous Jesuit father Parsons, which was published in 1606, by the title of An Answer to Lord Coke's 5th Report, by a Catholick divine. But the asperity with which lord Coke was treated, did not provoke a reply. All that it drew from him was a short notice of the work in the preface to his 6th Report, in which he represents the author as a calumniator, and as such disdained to answer him. But the controversy was afterwards continued by Mr. Prynne, who asserted the cause of the crown against the see of Rome, in a work of prodigious extent in the plan; for though the part published consists of three large volumes, of more than 1000 pages each, yet it reaches only to the end of the reign of Edward the first. The work we allude to, is Mr. Prynne's Chronological Vindication of the King's supreme Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, the publication of which commenced four or five years after the Restoration. The first volume extends to the Conquest. The second, which was published first, concludes with the reign of Henry the third. The third, being in part a supplement to the second, is occupied with the reigns of Henry the third, John, and our first Edward. When the author had advanced thus far, death interposed, and prevented the completion of the undertaking. What he lived to publish is become so extremely scarce, that twenty guineas are the common price of a compleat copy. The cause is the small remnant of copies of the first volume, most of them having been burnt in the great fire of London.—Such as are curious to see an account of the Jesuit Parsons, may consult Camden's Annals of Elizabeth. XVI. The Case of the Postnati, or of the Union of the Realm of Scotland with England; Trin. 6 James I.

[From the meeting of the crowns of England and Scotland in the person of the first James, grew one of the most important questions of State, which ever engaged the attention of either country. It was, whether the postnati, or those born in Scotland after the accession of James to the crown of England, were in the latter country to be deemed aliens or natives. As to the ante-nati, all seem to have agreed, that they remained aliens. But there was a great difference of opinion about the condition of the postnati. The king, anxious for every thing which tended to consolidate the island into one kingdom, was eager to have it declared as law, that the union of the crowns effected a mutual naturalization of the postnati in the two countries. His wishes were soon made known by the proclamation, in which he assumed the stile of king of Great Britain, with an exception however in favor of legal process instruments and assurances; and words were introduced, importing, that his succession to the crown of England had made a great change in the law of naturalization. Rym. Fœd. v. 16. p. 603. 2. Bac. last 4to. ed. 144. The commissioners, appointed by the respective parliaments of the two countries to treat for an union of government and laws, followed the king in this language; for they resolved to propound to both parliaments a declaration of the law to that effect. But when the proposition was made, the English house of commons were found averse to it, notwithstanding the countenance given by the lords, and an opinion delivered to them by ten out of eleven judges. It was therefore determined to settle the point out of parliament in the regular way, by resorting to the English courts of justice. For this purpose, two suits were instituted in the name of Robert Calvin, a postnatus of Scotland and an infant; one in the King's Bench for the freehold of some land; and the other in Chancery for detainer of writings concerning the title to the freehold of the same estate: and in both it was pleaded by the defendants in abatement, that the plaintiff was an alien born in Scotland at a time which by the pleading appeared to be since the king's accession to the crown of England. A demurrer to this plea necessarily brought forward the intended question about the postnati; for if Calvin was an alien, he could not maintain either suit, aliens being incapable to sue for the freehold of land. These causes were adjourned into the Exchequer-Chamber, in order to have the solemn opinion of all the judges; and there the business ended with a resolution in favour of the postnati, in which the lord-chancellor and twelve judges out of fourteen concurred. However, very eminent lawyers appear to have entertained a different opinion of the point. In parliament, Dodridge, Hyde, Brock, Crew, Moore, and Hedley, all spoke against the postnati. What the names of the two dissenting judges were, is not mentioned; except that lord Ellesmere alludes to both having the christian name of Thomas, the only judges of which name at the time were lord chief justice Fleming, Mr. justice Walmesley, and Mr. justice Foster. It is suspected too, that the known inclinations and wishes of the king had no little influence in the decision. But be this as it may, we are not apprized that the main point of the case has been ever disturbed by any subsequent judicial opinion.]

The only regular report we have of this case is by lord Coke. But there is a great deal of matter relative to it in other books. Lord-chancellor Ellesmere published his argument separately. Mr. serjeant Moore gives the history of the previous passages in parliament on the great point of law, for deciding which the case was afterwards made. In lord Bacon's works, there are both his speeches in parliament on the subject, and his argument before the judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, with some other pieces. 2. Bac. 4to. ed. 173. 185. 514. Nathaniel Bacon, in his book on government, examines and controverts the principles, on which lord Coke reports the case to have been decided. Bac. on Gov. part 2. page 76. The Parliamentary History relates the proceedings in the English parliament in the 2 and 4 Jam. on the proposal for an union between England and Scotland, and gives a short view of some arguments in the commons on the point of naturalization. 5. Lord Coke's report of Calvin's case. 4. Lord-chancellor Ellesmere's speech in the Exchequer-Chamber, as published by himself.

Case of the Union of the realm of Scotland with England, from Moore's Reports, page 790.

BY act of parliament in the first session anno primo Jacobi regis, certain commissioners of England were appointed to meet with commissioners of Scotland, and to treat for the weale of both kingdoms, and to put their doings in schedules tripartite, to be delivered, one to the king, the other to the parliament of England, and the third to the parliament of Scotland. The commissioners of both nations met in the painted chamber at Westminster, anno 2 Jac. regis, and treated long, and in the end made schedules, and delivered them according to the act. The schedule for the parliament of England was presented by the lord Ellesmere lord chancellor of England, to whom the commissioners had delivered the same for that purpose, himself being one of the commissioners, the first day of the session of parliament holden anno 3 Jac. R. the king himself, the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons being all assembled in the upper house of parliament. But the consideration of that schedule was by another act made in that session of an' 3 Jac. R. deferred untill the then next session.

The next session being this instant of an' 4 Jacobi regis, the schedule was considered of dividedly by the lords and commons: the material parts consisting upon 3 heads. The first the commissioners did propose, that all hostile lawes of either nation one against the other might be abrogated, and did enumerate the same lawes. The second, they proposed a course for commerce and merchandizing by merchants of both nations between themselves and with forreiners. Thirdly, they proposed that the common law of both nations should be declared to be, that all born in either nation sithence his majesty was king of both, were mutually naturalized in both. And further, that an act might be made to naturalize all born before, with certain cautions and restrictions for bearing principall offices of the crown, offices of judicature, or having voice in parliament, and with a saving of the kings prerogative.

Upon the two first articles, the lords and commons had sundry conferences in the painted chamber, and in effect agreed to give way to the substance of them. But upon the third, the commons could not assent to declare the law as was proposed, and thereupon after long debate amongst themselves, they appointed committees to confer with the lords committees, who mett the 25 of February 1606, in the painted chamber. At which conference sir Francis Bacon appointed by the house to introduce the rest begun in this manner.

Bacon. That this conference and the subject thereof was non in deliberativo, but in judiciali, not de bono but de vero, not to consult of a law to be made, but to declare the law already planted, whereto the commons were drawn, by insatisfaction of their judgments, not indisposition of their minds to the happy union intended, to oppose the proposition of the commissioners. And whereas his majesty had by a proclamation expressed the law to be as the commissioners had proposed, the commons did not take themselves prejudicated by the proclamation; first, for that that matter came but obiter in the proclamation, and was not the principal part or purpose thereof; then, for that the proclamation mentioneth the king to be so informed by divers sages of the law, which is not to be understood judges of the law, but some learned in the lawes, whose opinion may the better be opposed: yet the proclamation hath so tempered the tongues of the speakers, as it hath kept down all flashes of heat, which otherwise might have happened in the argument. Howbeit the danger of a declaratory statute, being like Janus Bifrons striking both wayes, raiseth in the commons too much fear to assent to the proposition, leaving the proclamation nevertheless to its own effect. Pur inducement pur les auters speakers apres cest induction, he shewed that it was a singular commendation to the lawes of England, that it was not inflexible, but contented to hear and be advised by other sciences in matters of dependencie upon them; as in cases of exposition of words, by grammarians; in matters of matrimony, deprivation, bastardy, by civilians; in minerals, by natural philosophers; in uses, by moral philosophers. Upon which consideration the commons had selected out of themselves divers gentlemen, some for inducement, some for argument in the point of law. Those for inducement were to shew the law of nations, and of reason, and the stories of other countries and the civil law elsewhere put in use upon unions; those for argument were gentlemen of the profession of the common laws of this realm: all which being here ready, he left them to discharge their own proper duties.

Sir Edwyn Sandes shewed that this case was proper to be consulted with the law of nations, which is called jus gentium; for there being no president for it in the law, lex deficit, and deficiente lege recurritur ad consuetudinem, and deficiente consuetudine recurritur ad rationem naturalem, which ratio naturalis is the law of nations called jus gentium. The question of difference is thus, whether subjection to one king make all the people born within the places of that subjection to be naturalized over all places of that kings subjection, which as he thought if it were to be measured by the law of reason and nations did not. And therefore shewed 7 reasons for his opinion.

1. That although ab antiquo, when people were together in one heap irregularly, having one head, their subjection gave to every one equal priviledge in all places of their subjection, yet sithence the world is grown to distribution of people into places, and to discipline in their government, though their subjection still remain in the general to one head; yet the manner of it is locally circumscribed to the places where they are brought forth, and those of one place do not, nor should partake of the discipline, priviledges, and birthright of the other places, but every one left to his own, as acquired for patrimony by their antecessors of that place, upon reasons peradventure now not extant nor to be exactly understood.

2. This is in use in other nations, who obtain their naturalization by charters, and for such time, and with such cautions, as may be granted unto them, and take it not by the general law of that nation whereto they were united.

3. In the time of the old civil Romans, who united unto them divers provinces, they had degrees in naturalizing; for first, the party had jus domicilii, then jus civitatis, next jus tribus, and lastly jus honoris; whereas if the law of England should be, that subjection brought all this together, it were a law overliberal, and more bountiful, then the laws of this civil state grounded upon reason and policy.

4. That Scotland being governed by the civil law, alloweth not English by bare subjection to their king to be naturalized within them; and therefore the law of England should be very unequal, if it should allow it to Scots here.

5. This case may give a dangerous example for mutual naturalizing of all nations that hereafter may fall into the subjection of the king, although they be very remote, in that their mutual communalty of priviledges may disorder the settled government of every of the particulars; and how many of them may happen, is uncertaine; for we see, that where there were 100 kings, they came after to 11, and are now brought to 6 only within Christendome.

6. The Scots shall be in better case by this law of naturalizing then the English, in the English nation; for the English pay all impositions and taxes for services of the crown, which the Scots do not within England.

7. All the reasons given for naturalizing extend aswell to them before born, as sithence the king came to the crown of England; for the subjection is now all one. Therefore, the law that should make a difference is not reasonable; and because the law is confessed to be, that those before born be not naturalized, therefore the law must also be, if it retain the same reason, that those born after are not naturalized.

Nevertheless he concluded, that he held it in reason, that in respect of one subjection, the Scots should not be accounted nor dealt withall by our lawes, as aliens, although not enabled to the full rights of Englishmen born amongst us.

Sir Roger Owen for stories, 1. shewed, that in all the presidents of the Romans, and in all their varieties of aristocracy or monarchy, there was no naturalizing ipso jure, but by charters of grace or constitutions special, and that by Naninus begun and introduced. 2. The president of Spain and Castile is not to this point; for Alaricus the emperour first lord of all Spain gave out Castile, and the coming of Castile again is rather a reuniting or a remitter, then a new union, and therefore reasonable they be one naturalized in the other as they were at the first. 3. The president fresh of France and Scotland by marriage of the kings mother with Francis the second king of France, because the subjection made no naturalization ipso jure, therefore the Scots in France and the French in Scotland were naturalized by acts of parliament and with cautions.

Sir John Bennet doctor of the civil law, he shewed that the civil law had no resolution of this point in terminis terminantibus; but of other unions lesser then kingdoms, there were rules, which he divided into these heads; one a maxime, the other a distribution; the maxime, cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona æquum est ac fissent in diversis, as one parson of two churches, one dean of two deaneries: the customes of every place remain still distinct and divided. And he cited an example, that the earldome of Flanders and Artois were holden of the king of France as sovereign by the duke of Brabant and Holland, who within Brabant and Holland was a free state: the question was whether this duke having both the dukedome and the earldome, and owing subjection to France only for the earldome, might make a league with the English for his dukedome, without breaking allegiance with France: and this being debated in the parliament of Paris, it was adjudged he might, because he held the dukedome and the earldome as distinct in his person, and owed no subjection to France for his dukedome. The distribution he made was this, upon the difference of unum and unitum: there was a union subordinate, that is, when an inferiour is united to the superiour, as Ireland to England, in this case privilegia communicantur. There is an union by incorporation, that is, when two be made unum, and not unitum, and then privilegia communicantur, as Wales and England. The third is when disjunct kingdoms are united, and that unicum is secundum quid, and non simpliciter; in which case privilegia non communicantur; and so he concluded that Scottish men were not naturalized in England; and yet he affirmed that it was in the power of the king by the civil law to naturalize them, and give them the priviledges.

The earl of Salisbury here interposed, and said, that he was desirous to understand whether the arguments made were upon the point in question; for as he conceived the question now in debate was a legal question of the law of England, and therefore time was to be spent upon argument and discussion of the law of England, and so sapiens contentio aut prodest aut non obest.

The lord chancellor then spake and said, that the first man that spake by introduction and inducement of the rest brought the question to the quick, that is, that it was not a question de bono but de vero, not what was fit to be done, but what the law already is, which is what the law of England is; in which question, if it shall be doubtful, it is more then indifferent to declare it as the commissioners have proposed for three causes. 1. The kings proclamation having divulged it so, it is for his honor to declare it so, if it be not clear otherwise. 2. The opinion of the commissioners whom both houses trusted. 3. The act of recognition, whereby we have acknowledged the king of both, and that we both live under one imperial crown.

The

The earl of Northampton said, that it appeared by the civilians, that in the civil law there was no president in terminis terminantibus; and therefore from them we could take no rule for this case; nor no stories or examples of forraign states, which are applicable and framed to their own particular policies. Nor as this case is, can we be measured or guided by inconveniences that may be forecast; because we are confined to a point of law already received and planted, and are to reason and discuss what that law is. Nevertheless he desired leave to use a comparison to them, to be commended to their consideration, between the union in a body politick and in a body natural. The head in a body natural hath his influence into all the members by spirits of life and sense. So hath the head of the body politick, to whom all the members be children in obedience, and brothers one to the other. The sinews in a body natural are ligaments that binde together the joynts and flesh. So are lawes in the body politick that tye people in a band of subjection and civil life. The blood, that passeth in the veins of the body natural by continual motion, doth maintain and refresh the spirits of life. So traffick, commerce, and contracts in a body politick, do support, maintaine and refresh the common-wealth. But of all these there is a superior spirit sent by God, which is the soul to the body of man, by which all our blessedness is infused. So may we well say, that the kings majestie is like the soul, a blessedness sent from God to dwell in both these nations as a continual spirit of union amongst them, to pacifie and temper all bitterness, even as the soul by instinct of reason quieteth the natural passions of the natural bodies. Wherefore let us consider how unfit it is to have two spirits or souls in one body; what their opposition may work for distemper and dissolution; what the sweet harmony of one good vertuous and religious soul in every part of the body may do, for consolidating, strengthening, and continuing in the whole body that prosperous estate of life and health that is to be wished: and therefore in the case whatsoever may tend to the happy and firm uniting of these two kingdomes in resemblance of lives and fortunes is to be inclined to, and recommended to your grave consideration.

Dodridge the king's solicitor, Laurence Hyde, Brock, Crewe, & Hedley, professors of the common law, now begin. And for the common law they urged 9 reasons or arguments, that those born thence his majesty came to the crown of England within Scotland should not be naturalized in England. Which question sprang out of two positions granted, as a third doubtful between, and this third is oculus questionis. The first of these two positions is, that in the kings person there is an union of sovereignty over both nations. The second is, that notwithstanding this union, yet the fundamental lawes of either nation do remaine distinct. The third, which is the doubt between both these, whether naturalization proceed from the king or the lawes. Out of this one head all the reasons were derived as followeth.

1 That lex & ligeancia came out of one root, and as it is called lex a ligando, so it is called ligeance, a ligatione; which proveth allegiance to be tied to laws; and consequently the laws of these two nations being severall, notwithstanding the union of sovereignty in the kings person, the allegiance of the subjects remaineth still severall; and therefore naturalization being measured by allegiance must still remaine severall and distinct in either nations, as allegiance and laws do, and cannot be united and made one in both nations. To enforce this they cited the statute of 25 Ed. 3. statute 2. de natis ultra mare. In many places where it mentioneth ligeance, is added 'out of the ligeance of England, or within the same ligeance of England;' which doth infer, that ligeance is tyed to the kingdom, and not to the person of the king.

2 Reason, that postnati in Scotland are not subject to the laws of England, and therefore should not have benefit of the laws of England.

3 Reason, that every nation hath a precinct wherein the laws have operation; and naturalization is an act or operation of law; therefore it cannot extend to places out of the precinct for the laws. Which being granted, it followeth, that as English laws extend not into Scotland, so to be naturalized by the laws of England, extends not into Scotland nor to those born in Scotland.

The 4 and 5 Reason, that the great seal of England, which is the organ by which the law is conveyed, is not powerful nor binding in Scotland; therefore those born in Scotland not inheritable to the laws of England, nor to be born subjects of England, when they cannot be commanded by the great seal of England.

6 Reason, that in subordinate kingdomes, dukedomes, or feignories, as Ireland, Gascoigne, Aquitaine, Angois, the great seal of England is passable, and the parliament of England hath power; as is proved by that a writ of error may be brought in the Kings Bench of a judgment in Ireland, and the parliament of England may make a statute to bind in Ireland, if Ireland be specially named, but without special naming it doth not bind. So 27 E. 3. cap. 7. a statute was made to authorise the steward of Gascoigne to arrest the bodies of such as bargain for wines elsewhere, then in the portes of Burdeaux and Bayon, and to send them to the Tower of London. An habeas corpus hath been directed under the great seal of England into Gascoigne, as appeareth by records of the Kings Bench. And the islanders do send petitions and make proctors to the parliament of England, as is still put in use to this day. By which it appeareth, that the case is not like between England and these kingdomes and dukedomes subordinate to England, as it is between England and Scotland; Scotland being a distinct kingdom not subordinate, and as ancient as England itself. And therefore whereas some have conceived, that when Gascoigne was by marriage united to England, those of Gascoigne were not aliens to England, and enforce this exposition out of the prior Shels case, 27 E. 3. pla. 48. in the book of Assizes, in that the prior having his lands seized in time of war, for that he was born in Gascoigne under the kings allegiance, and thereupon the matter being found true, he had restitution; to that, it may be confessed; and yet it matcheth not our case for Scotland, a distinct kingdom, and the reason of that restitution may be the ceasing of the wars aswell as being born in Gascoigne; for those of Gascoigne were in those times accounted aliens in England, as may appear by the statute of 38 E. 3. cap. 11. where it is enacted, that the Gascoignes and other aliens should come into England with their wines; which proveth, that those of Gascoigne could not bring their wines into England, and they were then aliens to England, by the words of Gascoignes and other aliens.

7 Reason, that regnum and rex were relatives, and therefore distinct kingdomes, distinct kings as to the kingdomes; and the person of the king possessing both kingdomes possesseth the people and the laws of them distinct, as the kingdomes are themselves. Therefore the subjection of every people is distinguished to the severall kingdomes, and one not subject to the other, nor naturalized within the other. And this is proved by the statute of 14 E. 3. whereby it is declared, that notwithstanding the king of England were king of France, yet the people of England were not subject unto him as king of France, but only as king of England.

8 Reason, that no man can be born a subject of two allegiances, nor by birth natural of two distinct kingdomes, therefore Scots born in Scotland cannot be naturalized in England.

9 Inconvenience would ensue in honors privileges and things of value, which would be confounded without order, if this commixtion should be planted in both nations without discipline or rules.

The time being thus spent the 25 day of February, the next day was appointed to proceed with the conference, at which time the lords committees desired the judges there attending to deliver their advice and opinions concerning the point of law: for which the lord chief justice Popham had the night before prayed respite until this time. Whereupon the said lord chief justice, and sir Edward Cook chief justice of the Common Pleas, and sir Thomas Flemming chief baron, did openly deliver their opinions and their reasons, the said lord chief justice Popham making these three inducements in commendation of the laws of England. 1 That they had continued as a rock without alteration in all the varieties of people that had possessed this land, namely the Romans, Brittons, Danes, Saxons, Normans, and English, which he imputed to the integrity and justice of these laws, every people taking a liking to them, and desirous to continue them and live by them, for which he cited Fortescues book of the laws of England.

2 Commendation, the price that those laws did cost, which was no lesse then blood; not laws of blood or bloody laws, but laws bought and purchased by the blood of our antecessors, as appeareth by magna charta, planted in king H. 3. time, after long and bloody wars between the kings and barons of this realm, the stories whereof do yet live fresh in every chronicle.

3 Commendation is the proceedings of the law, which he divided into 3 parts. 1 Judgments. 2 Trials. 3 Testimonies. The judgments so even and so impartial, as they give way to no mans affection, nor impute blame to any man; but to say the law requireth such judgment, is an excuse satisfactory to all men, for the king, and the judges. And therefore the said lord chief justice cited a resolution in parliament when himself served as speaker: That whereas it was proposed to have a law made, that the judges might use their discretion in appointing trials in forraigne counties, in respect the meaner sort of people were overweighed with the power of great men in some shires that were parties to the suites; it was upon grave advice and consultation denied, with this answer, that it were better to live under a certain known law, though hard sometimes in a few cases, then to be subject to the alterable discretion of any judges. The trials of the law for the most part so equal by the oaths of 12, as he protested that he never knew of the multitude that had passed before himself, scarce two of a hundred passe otherwise then himself should have passed, if he had been in their case. For the testimonies being viva voce before the judges in open face of the world, he said was much to be preferred before written depositions by private examiners or commissioners. First, for that the judge and jurors discern often by the countenance of a witnesse whether he come prepared, and by his readiness and slackness, whether he be ill affected or well affected, and by those questions may draw out circumstances to approve or discredit his testimony, and one witnesse may contest with another where they are viva voce. All which are taken away by written depositions in a corner.

For argument the said judges answered with one assent, to the first reason of the commons, that allegiance and laws were not of equiparation for 6 causes. 1. Allegiance was before laws. 2. Allegiance is after laws. 3. Allegiance is where the laws are not. 4. Between sovereignty and allegiance laws are begotten. 5. Allegiance extends as far as defence, which is beyond the circuit of laws. 6. Allegiance followeth the natural person, not the politick. To prove this, it was said, if a heap of people meet together so near, that they appoint a king, there allegiance is before they have laws proclaimed or prescribed: wherefore allegiance is before laws. If the king be expelled by force and another usurps, yet the allegiance is not taken away, though the law be taken away. If the king go out of England with a company of his servants, allegiance remaineth amongst his subjects and servants, although he be out of his own realm, whereto his laws are confined, as is proved by a case in Fluta, who wrote in Ed. 2 time, which is thus. King Ed. 1. went in person into France, to a marriage; one of his servants in France stole 2 silver dishes, for which he was apprehended by the French: the king required to have him redelivered, being his subject and of his traine; and upon dispute in the parliament of Paris, he was sent to the king of England to do his own justice upon him, whereupon he was tried before the steward and marshal of the kings house, and executed in France in a meadow called St. Jermins meadow. Which proveth that the kings law followeth his allegiance out of the local limit of the laws of England. And even so it is, where the king of England sendeth a lieutenant or general with an army royal out of the realm, the army is to be guided by the martial law of England, as the lord Cook affirmed, who also cited the case of Fluta. If there were not a sovereign to prescribe laws, and people of allegiance to obey them, there could be no laws made nor executed. By which it appeareth, that between sovereignty and allegiance laws are begotten; and therefore in nations conquered there are no laws, yet is there present allegiance; and after allegiance gotten, it is secondary for the king to deliver laws to the people of his allegiance. And to prove the the allegiance to be tyed to the body natural of the king, not to the body politick, the lord Cook cited the phrases of divers statutes mentioning the king our natural liege sovereign, and these words natural subjects in acts of recognition usual and familiar. And to prove that allegiance extended further then the laws national, they shewed, that every king of divers kingdoms or dukedomes is to command every people to defend any of his kingdoms without respect of that nation where he is born; as if the king of Spain be invaded in Portugal, he may levy for defence of Portugal armies out of Spain, Naples, Castile, Millan, Flanders, and the like, as a thing incident to the allegiance of all his subjects to joyn together in defence of any one of his territories without respect of extent of the laws of that nation where he was born: whereby it manifestly appeareth, that allegiance followeth the natural person of the king, and is not tyed to the body politick respectively in every kingdom. And therefore, whereas the rule for aliens is this, that those born within the kings allegiance are subjects, and those born out of his allegiance are aliens, it is manifest, that Scots born in Scotland, since the king of England was king of England and Scotland both, are not born out of the kings allegiance, and so not aliens, but subjects, and so to be accounted in England. For further proof of this, the lord Cook shewed statutes, book-cales and pleadings.

For statutes prerogativa regis cap. 12. which was made in the 17 year of king Edward the second, and is a declaration of the prerogative before, wherein it is declared, that the king was to have the escheats of the lands of the Normandi, and all others born in parts beyond seas, whose antecessors were of the faith or loyalty of the king of France, and not of the king of England; as it happened of the barony of Monumeta, after the death of John D. Monumeta, whose heirs were of Brittain and elsewhere. By which declaration the judges did infer, that out of the allegiance, and within the allegiance of the king (fides being to be understood allegiance) maketh the oddes between an alien and a denizen, and not the place of birth in England, or without England; for it is declared, that the king should have the escheats of such as were born in parts beyond seas, and whose parents were of the allegiance of the king of France, and not of the allegiance of the king of England. So that although his birth were out of the bounds of the kingdom of England and out of the reach and extent of the laws of England, yet if it were within the allegiance of the kings of England, the king was not to have his escheat as an alien, as at this time divers places that were within the limits of France were in subjection to the kings of England. And for the instance of the barony of Monumeta, they shewed that king H. 2. had four sons, Henry, Richard, Jeffrey, and John, that Jeffrey was married to the heire of Brittain, and was murdered by John, in which time the case of Monumeta happened, Brittain being not within the allegiance of the king of England, by that marriage of the kings third son. They shewed that it was not material, whether a kingdom or dukedome came to the allegiance of the king of England, nor whether by marriage or conquest; for many dukedoms were sometimes kingdoms, and kingdoms were but dukedoms, as Castile at the first but an earldom, now a kingdom; little Brittain once a kingdom, then after and now a dukedom; Ireland a dukedom, now a kingdom. But the matter of difference is, whether they be free and divided states in their laws and government, and so were both these dukedoms of Aquitaine, Gascoigne, Guyen, &c. which have been so much insisted upon, and so is Scotland, and yet all under one allegiance and faith to one king: which unity and allegiance to one king, taketh away the rule of alien born from them all, howsoever they were united, be it by marriage or conquest. And yet for Gascoigne and Aquitaine, it came by marriage and descent, as Scotland. The next statute is the statute of 42 E. 3. cap. 10. that the commons desired in parliament that children born beyond seas, within the seignories of Calice and elsewhere within the lands and seignories that pertain to the king beyond seas, might inherit in England. Whereto the answer is, it is accorded, that the common law and the statute upon the same point another time may be holden. The judges, examining what statute that was, found it was the statute of 25 E. 3. stat. 2. de natis ultra mare. Which statute contains a preamble, and 3 ordinances. The preamble is a recital of a doubt, whether children should inherit in England, that were born beyond seas out of the legiance of England. The 1 ordinance is a declaration of the law, that the kings children wheresoever born are inheritable in England. The 2 is a constitution particular for some named, and which the king shall name, which were born beyond seas, out of the legiance of England, to inherit in England. The 3 is a new law, that children from henceforth born out of the legiance of the king, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and shall be at the faith and of the allegiance of the king of England, shall inherit in England, &c. Out of this they did infer, that the third ordinance only did touch the point now in question; which ordinance nevertheless came not to the question proposed; for the ordinance is for persons born beyond seas, and out of the kings legiance, whose parents are English; whereas our question is for persons born in Scotland, which is within the faith and allegiance of the king, and so much the odds is, as the words import, viz. out of the allegiance and within the allegiance. So as that statute directs not this controversy; and therefore it must be the common law that doth it, whereto the statute of 42 E. 3. doth refer concerning those born at Callis, and other seignories beyond seas, that pertain to the king: which persons having been ever expounded to inherit in England, it must needs be taken, that they inherit by the common law, and not by statute. 28 H. 6. cap. 5. against extortions used by searchers amongst merchants, the merchants of Gascoigne, Guyen, Ireland and the Isles, are called the kings liege people.

The books and judgments cited by the judges, were first 27 E. 3. in the book of Assizes the 48 plea, the case of the prior of Sheln, who being a prior alien, and his temporalities being seised in time of war, shewed that he was not an alien, for that he was born in Gascoigne, within the legiance of the king; which plea was found true by verdict, and thereupon his temporalities were restored. And then the same case came again in question in the common place in a quare impedit, because in his restitution he had no special words of advowsons, whether the king might not present to the advowsons of the priory notwithstanding the restitution, for that also the restitution was, that the king of his grace did restore, &c. So it was of grace, not of right. But the book is, that the king should not present; and the reason alledged, because the seizure was by wrong, the prior being no alien, and so a restitution in that case, by which the king doth not give but do right, needs not contain special mention of advowsons; neither the recital of the kings grace could escape the justice of the court examining the cause, to say it was not of right. For concurrence with this book, they cited the case of 11 H. 4. fo. 26. that two husbands and their wives parceners brought an assize, and then were summoned and seivered: the tenant pleaded to her that was seivered, that her husband was an alien, and born out of the realm, and all the legiance, and not made denizen: but in the end in respect of the seiverance, and that the plea was in disablement of him that was seivered, the writ was awarded good. Yet the note special of the case is the manner of the plea, viz. alien born out of the realm, and all the allegiance; whereof it is inferred that allegiance is further then the realm, and not confined to the circuit of the laws of the realm. 14 H. 4. fo. 19. b. one challenged a juror for that he was an alien, and the manner of his challenge is, that he was not a liege to the king, because he was born out of his legiance, and shewed that he was a Flemming; and the triers found that he was born in Flanders, but had lived of a child in England, and was sworn to the king in a leet: nevertheless the court would not allow him to be sworn. But the note of the case is, the manner of the challenge, viz. not a liege to the king, because he was born out of his legiance. So Littleton in his chapter of villenage sheweth him to be an alien that is born out of the kings allegiance. And this distinction of allegiance quatenus king of England, and quatenus king of Scotland, or quatenus duke of Ireland, Aquitaine, Gascoigne, &c. is never heard of in the books of our law.

For pleadings they shewed the president in the book of Entries, to be, that he that disableth an alien must alledge affirmatively, that he is an alien; and yet that sufficeth not, but he must alledge further that he was born extra obedientiam domini regis; and not that alone, but also he must assigne a place where he was born, infra obedientiam of some other king. As in 9 E. 4. fo. 7. in the assize by Bagot of the office of clerk of the crown in the Chancery, the tenant pleaded, that Bagot was an alien in this manner, dicat quod idem Johannes Bagot est alienigena genitus extra ligeanciam domini regis Angliæ, viz. apud Pontoys infra regnum Franciæ sub obedientia Caroli nuncupantis se regem Franciæ, adversarii & magni inimici domini regis Angliæ. Which course of pleading cannot be held with those of Scotland; for that Scotland is not out of the kings allegiance, neither is the king of Scots enemy to the king of England, but he is also king of England, whereof both nations do and must take notice.

And whereas it hath been urged that the trial of an alien must be within England, so that he which will destroy the plea of an alien against himself must assigne a place in England of his birth, and cannot assigne a place in Scotland; this is easily answered, and proveth nothing on the other part; for so if a deed be made in Ireland or in Gascoigne, or in the Isles, you must assigne the making of it in some county of England, to the end a trial may be had by jury, which is not but in England; nevertheless you may give in evidence the making of it in Ireland or the Isles. So is the case of 13 H. 4. pla. 10. for an obligation made in Gascoigne. And so is 32 H. 6. fo. 26. in debt upon a bond made in the bishoprick of Durham being a county palatine; and there the reason of this case debated, and Brown citeth it to be adjudged, that if the defendant alledge that the plaintiff is a Scot born at St. Johns town in Scotland, out of the legiance, this is a trial where the writ is brought; but if the plaintiff will reply, that he was born at London within the allegiance, the defendant must rejoyne, that the plaintiff was born at St. Johns town in Scotland, without that, that he was born in London, and the issue shall be tried in London. So are affirmative issues allowed for necessity of trial; but evidence of his birth in any place within the kings dominions is sufficient to maintain the issue, although for form of pleading it be laid to be at London. In which case of 13 H. 4. it was put by Treby, that a liegman of England was killed by another liegman of England in Scotland, and his wife brought her appeal in England in the court of the lord constable of England.

Then the judges examined what should be given to the Scots, if they should be naturalized. First, they being not enemies, if they be aliens, are to be protected in their bodies and goods, and may bring personal actions. But if they buy land, the king if he will, may seize it. But for dignities of honor, or voices in parliament as barons, Scotchmen cannot have in England, so long as the laws stand distinct. And therefore they cited the case of 11 E. 3. titulo brieve 473. where the writ was brought against the earl of Richmond, who alledged, that he was duke of Brittain, and not so named in the writ, and prayed that the writ might abate; but the judges allowed not his plea, because the dukedom of Brittain is a forraigne dignity, of which we take no notice in England. Yet Edmand Baliol assigning the same cause in abatement of a writ, for that he was not named king of Scots, the exception was held good; for that a king is in notice of all countries, and so is a knight, but not barons, earldoms, dukedoms and the like. Nevertheless 39 E. 3. fo. 35. en title de brieve 517. a writ was abated for not naming the defendant earle of Angus, although it be a dignity in Scotland: but the reason is shewed to be, for that he had alway a writ to attend at the parliament of England. And by this, the judges said, that the 9th objection being matter of inconvenience in places of honour was answered with this addition, that no naturalizing could make them barons of parliament of England for their dignities in Scotland, neither did naturalizing give any man a place in parliament, except he were chosen, or gave him any lands or goods except he could purchase them.

For the matter of the great seal the judges shewed, that the seal was alterable by the king at his pleasure, and he might make one seal for both kingdoms, for seals, coyn, and leagues are of absolute prerogative gative to the king without parliament, not restrained to any assent of the people. But for further resolution of this point, how far the great seal doth command out of England, they made this distinction, that the great seal was current for remedials which groweth upon complaint of the subjects, and thereupon writs are addressed under the great seal of England, which writs are limited their precinct to be within the places of the jurisdiction of the courts that must give the redress of the wrong. And therefore writs are not to go into Ireland, nor the Isles, nor Wales, nor the counties palatine; because the kings courts here have not power to hold plea of lands or things there. But the great seal hath a power preceptory to the person, which power extendeth to any place where the person may be found. And for this the lord Cook cited Nicholas Ludlows case in 4 E. 3. in the Tower record rotulo clauso numero 21. that Ludlow being at Rome, a commandment under the great seal was sent to him to return. So Berties case in queen Maries time, and sir Franc. Inglesfields in queen Elizabeths time, the privy seal went to command them to return into the realm, and for not coming their lands were seized, as appeareth by my lord Diers report of both those cases. So the case before of 39 E. 3. fo. 35. a parliament writ was current into Scotland, to the earle of Angus; and 14 H. 8. a habeas corpus into the Isle of Man; which habeas corpus is a preceptory writ to have the body of his subject, and may be directed into Scotland, or any place where the king hath ministers, otherwise how shall the king come by the person of his subject whom he would command. So as where remedial writs run not, yet preceptories under the great seal do; and therefore the position of the great seal not to be current in Scotland holdeth for remedials, not for preceptories: and this doth answer the objection, that the great seal is current in subordinate kingdoms, or dukedoms, and not in all places of the kings dominions in distinct kingdoms.

And as to the rule taken by the civilians, cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diversis, that holdeth not in things personal but real: and therefore a marquisse, that is a baron and an earle, can by the statute of 21 H. 8. have no more chaplains then his best dignity alloweth, and not for every dignity.

And as to the objection that none can be born a natural subject of two kingdoms, they denied that absolutely; for although locally he can be born but in one, yet effectually the allegiance of the king extending to both, his birthright shall extend to both.

And as to the objection that rex & regnum be relatives, and therefore the allegiance of a king can extend but to that kingdom; they answered, that rex and regna were relatives, but rex & regnum be not so relatives, as a king can be king but of one kingdom, for that were proprium quarto modo, viz. omni, soli & semper, which clearly holdeth not, but that his kingly power extending to divers nations and kingdoms, all owe him equal subjection, and are equally born to the benefit of his protection. And although he is to govern them by their distinct laws, yet any one of the people coming into the other is to have the benefit of the laws wheresoever he cometh, and is to bear the burthens and taxes of the place where he cometh; but living in one, or for his livelyhood in one, he is not to be taxed in the other, because laws ordain taxes impositions and charges, as a discipline of subjection particularized to every particular nation.

And so these 3 judges delivered their opinions openly, and the rest were ready and did affirme the same to be all their opinions, but only justice Walmesly who differed in the main point, the rest were Warburton and Daniel, of the Common Place, Fenner, Williams, and Tanfield, of the Kings Bench, Snigg and Altham, barons of the Exchequer.

Speech of lord Bacon, as counsel for Calvin in the Exchequer Chamber. From the last 4to. ed. of his works, vol. 2. p. 514.

May it please your Lordships,

THIS case your lordships do well perceive to be of exceeding great consequence. For whether you do measure that by place, that reacheth not only to the realm of England, but to the whole island of Great Britain; or whether you measure that by time, that extendeth not only to the present time, but much more to future generations,

Et nati natorum, et qui nascuntur ab illis.

And therefore as that is to receive at the bar a full and free debate, so I doubt not but that shall receive from your lordships a sound and just resolution according to law, and according to truth. For, my lords, though he were thought to have said well, that said that for his word, rex fortissimus; yet he was thought to have said better, even in the opinion of a king himself, that said, veritas fortissima, et prævalet: and I do much rejoice to observe such a concurrence in the whole carriage of this cause to this end, that truth may prevail.

The case no feigned or framed case; but a true case between true parties.

The title handled formerly in some of the king's courts, and free-hold upon it; used indeed by his majesty in his high wisdom to give an end to this great question, but not raised; occasio, as the schoolmen say, arripita, non porrecta.

The case argued in the King's Bench by Mr. Walter with great liberty, and yet with good approbation of the court: the persons assigned to be of counsel on that side, inferior to none of their quality and degree in learning; and some of them most conversant and exercised in the question.

The judges in the King's Bench have adjourned it to this place for conference with the rest of their brethren. Your lordship, my lord chancellor, though you be absolute judge in the court where you sit, and might have called to you such assistance of judges as to you had seemed good; yet would not forerun or lead in this case by any opinion there to be given; but have chosen rather to come yourself to this assembly; all tending, as I said, to this end, whereunto I for my part do heartily subscribe, ut vincat veritas, that truth may first appear, and then prevail. And I do firmly hold, and doubt not but I shall well maintain, that this is the truth, that Calvin the plaintiff is ipso jure by the law of England a natural born subject, to purchase free-hold, and to bring real actions within England. In this case I must so consider the time, as I must much more consider the matter. And therefore though it may draw my speech into farther length; yet I dare not handle a case of this nature confusedly, but purpose to observe the ancient and exact form of pleadings; which is,

First, to explain or induce.

Then, to confute, or answer objections.

And lastly, to prove, or confirm.

And first for explanation. The outward question in this case is no more, but whether a child, born in Scotland since his majesty's happy coming to the crown of England, be naturalized in England, or no. But the inward question or state of the question evermore beginneth, where that which is confessed on both sides doth leave.

It is confessed, that if these two realms of England and Scotland were united under one law and one parliament, and thereby incorporated and made as one kingdom, that the post-natus of such an union should be naturalized.

It is confessed, that both realms are united in the person of our sovereign; or, because I will gain nothing by surreption, in the putting of the question, that one and the same natural person is king of both realms.

It is confessed, that the laws and parliaments are several. So then, whether this privilege and benefit of naturalization be an accessory or dependency upon that which is one and joint, or upon that which is several, hath been, and must be the depth of this question. And therefore your lordships do see the state of this question doth evidently lead me by way of inducement to speak of three things: the king, the law, and the privilege of naturalization. For if you well understand the nature of the two principals, and again the nature of the accessory; then shall you discern to whether principal the accessory doth properly refer, as a shadow to a body, or iron to an adamant.

And therefore your lordships will give me leave in a case of this quality, first to visit and open the foundations and fountains of reason, and not begin with the positions and eruditions of a municipal law; for so was that done in the great case of Mines; and so ought that to be done in all cases of like nature. And this doth not at all detract from the sufficiency of our laws, as incompetent to decide their own cases, but rather addeth a dignity unto them, when their reason appearing as well as their authority doth shew them to be as fine moneys, which are current not only by the stamp, because they are so received, but by the natural metal, that is, the reason and wisdom of them.

And master Littleton himself in his whole book doth commend but two things to the professors of the law by the name of his sons; the one, the inquiring and searching out the reasons of the law; and the other, the observing of the forms of pleadings. And never was there any case that came in judgment that required more, than that Littleton's advice should be followed in those two points, than doth the present case in question. And first of the king.

It is evident that all other commonwealths, monarchies only excepted, do subsist by a law precedent. For where authority is divided amongst many officers, and they not perpetual, but annual or temporary, and not to receive their authority but by election, and certain persons to have voice only to that election, and the like; these are busy and curious frames, which of necessity do pre-suppose a law precedent, written or unwritten, to guide and direct them. But in monarchies, especially hereditary, that is, when several families or lineages of people do submit themselves to one line, imperial or royal, the submission is more natural and simple, which afterwards by laws subsequent is perfected and made more formal; but that is grounded upon nature. That this is so, it appeareth notably in two things; the one the platforms and patterns which are found in nature of monarchies; the original submissions, and their motives and occasions. The platforms are three:

The first is that of a father, or chief of a family; who governing over his wife by prerogative of sex, over his children by prerogative of age and because he is author unto them of being, and over his servants by prerogative of virtue and providence (for he that is able of body, and improvident of mind, is natura servus) that is a very model of a king. So is the opinion of Aristotle, lib. iii. Pol. cap. 14. where he saith, verum autem regnum est, cum penes unum est rerum summa potestas: quod regnum procuracionem familiae imitatur. And therefore Lycurgus, when one counselled him to dissolve the kingdom, and to establish another form of estate, answered, 'Sir, begin to do that which you advise first at home in your own house: noting, that the chief of a family is as a king; and that those, that can least endure kings abroad, can be content to be kings at home. And this is the first platform, which we see is merely natural.'

The second is that of a shepherd and his flock, which Xenophon saith, Cyrus had ever in his mouth. For shepherds are not owners of the sheep; but their office is to feed and govern. No more are kings proprietaries or owners of the people; for God is sole owner of people. The nations, as the scripture saith, sunt ei hereditas: but the office of kings is to govern, maintain, and protect people. And that is not without a mystery, that the first king that was instituted by God, David, for Saul was but an untimely fruit, was translated from a shepherd, as you have it in Psalm lxxviii. Et elegit David servum suum, de gregibus ovium sustulit eum, — pascere Jacob servum suum, et Israel hereditatem suam. This is the second platform; a work likewise of nature.

The third platform is the government of God himself over the world, whereof whereof lawful monarchies are a shadow. And therefore both amongst the Heathen, and amongst the Christians, the word, sacred, hath been attributed unto kings, because of the conformity of a monarchy with a divine majesty; never to a senate or people. And so you find it twice in the lord Coke's reports; once in the second book, the bishop of Winchester's case; and his fifth book, Cawdrie's case. And more anciently in the 10 of H. VII. fol. 18. rex est persona mixta cum sacerdote; an attribute, which the senate of Venice, or a canton of Swisses, can never challenge. So, we see, there be precedents or platforms of monarchies, both in nature, and above nature; even from the monarch of heaven and earth to the king, if you will, in an hive of bees. And therefore other states are the creatures of law; and this state only subsisteth by nature.

For the original submissions, they are four in number. I will briefly touch them.

The first is paternity or patriarchy, which was when a family growing so great as it could not contain itself within one habitation, some branches of the descendants were forced to plant themselves into new families; which second families could not by a natural instinct and inclination but bear a reverence, and yield an obeisance, to the eldest line of the ancient family from which they were derived.

The second is the admiration of virtue, or gratitude towards merit, which is likewise naturally infused into all men. Of this Aristotle putteth the case well, when it was the fortune of some one man, either to invent some arts of excellent use towards man's life, or to congregate people that dwelt scattered into one place where they might cohabit with more comfort, or to guide them from a more barren land to a more fruitful, or the like: upon these deserts, and the admiration and recompense of them, people submitted themselves.

The third, which was the most usual of all, was conduct in war, which even in nature induceth as great an obligation as paternity. For as men owe their life and being to their parents in regard of generation, so they owe that also to saviours in the wars in regard of preservation. And therefore we find in chap. xviii. of the book of Judges, ver. xxii. dixerunt omnes viri ad Gideon, dominare nostri, tu et filii tui, quoniam servasti nos de manu Madian. And so we read when it was brought to the ears of Saul, that the people sung in the streets, Saul hath killed his thousand, and David his ten thousand of enemies, he said straightways: quid ei superest nisi ipsum regnum? For whosoever hath the military dependence, wants little of being king.

The fourth is an enforced submission, which is conquest, whereof it seemed Nimrod was the first precedent, of whom it is said; ipse cepit potens esse in terra, et erat robustus venator coram Domino. And this likewise is upon the same root, which is the saving or gift as it were of life and being; for the conqueror hath power of life and death over his captives; and therefore where he giveth them themselves, he may reserve upon such a gift what service and subjection he will.

All these four submissions are evident to be natural and more ancient than law.

To speak therefore of law, which is the second part of that which is to be spoken of by way of inducement. Law no doubt is the great organ by which the sovereign power doth move, and may be truly compared to the sinews in a natural body, as the sovereignty may be compared to the spirits: for if the sinews be without the spirits, they are dead and without motion; if the spirits move in weak sinews, it causeth trembling: so the laws, without the king's power, are dead; the king's power, except the laws be corroborated, will never move constantly, but be full of staggering and trepidation. But towards the king himself the law doth a double office or operation. The first is to intitle the king, or design him; and in that sense Bracton saith well, lib. 1. fol. 5. and lib. 3. fol. 107. lex facit quod ipse sit rex; that is, it defines his title; as in our law, that the kingdom shall go to the issue female; that it shall not be departable amongst daughters; that the half-blood shall be respected, and other points differing from the rules of common inheritance. The second is, that whereof we need not fear to speak in good and happy times, such as these are, to make the ordinary power of the king more definite or regular; for it was well said by a father, plenitudo potestatis est plenitudo tempestatis. And although the king, in his person, be solutus legibus, yet his acts and grants are limited by law, and we argue them every day.

But I demand, do these offices or operations of law evacuate or frustrate the original submission, which was natural; or shall it be said that all allegiance is by law? No more than it can be said, that potestas patris, the power of the father over the child, is by law: and yet no doubt laws do diversly define of that also; the law of some nations having given fathers power to put their children to death; others, to sell them thrice; others, to disinherit them by testament at pleasure, and the like. Yet no man will affirm, that the obedience of the child is by law, though laws in some points do make it more positive: and even so it is of allegiance of subjects to hereditary monarchs, which is corroborated and confirmed by law, but is the work of the law of nature. And therefore you shall find the observation true, and almost general in all states, that their lawgivers were long after their first kings, who governed for a time by natural equity without law. So was Theseus long before Solon in Athens: so was Eurytion and Sotus long before Lycurgus in Sparta: so was Romulus long before the Decemviri. And even amongst ourselves there were more ancient kings of the Saxons; and yet the laws ran under the name of Edgar's laws. And in the refounding of the kingdom in the person of William the Conqueror, when the laws were in some confusion for a time, a man may truly say, that king Edward I. was the first lawgiver, who enacting some laws, and collecting others, brought the law to some perfection. And therefore I will conclude this point with the stile, which divers acts of parliaments do give unto the king; which term him very effectually and truly, 'our natural sovereign liege lord.' And as it was said by a principal judge here present when he served in another place, and question was moved by some occasion of the title of Bullen's lands, that he would never allow, that queen Elizabeth (I remember it for the efficacy of the phrase) should be a statute queen, but a common-law queen: so surely I shall hardly consent, that the king shall be esteemed or called only our rightful sovereign, or our lawful sovereign, but our natural liege sovereign; as acts of parliament speak: for as the common law is more worthy than the statute law; so the law of nature is more worthy than them both.

Having spoken now of the king and the law, it remaineth to speak of the privilege and benefit of naturalization itself; and that according to the rules of the law of England.

Naturalization is best discerned in the degrees whereby the law doth mount and ascend thereunto. For it seemeth admirable unto me, to consider, with what a measured hand, and with how true proportions, our law doth impart and confer the several degrees of this benefit. The degrees are four.

The first degree of persons, as to this purpose, that the law takes knowledge of, is an alien enemy; that is, such a one as is born under the obeisance of a prince or state that is in hostility with the king of England. To this person the law giveth no benefit or protection at all; but if he come into the realm after war proclaimed, or war in fact, he comes at his own peril, he may be used as an enemy: for the law accounts of him but, as the scripture saith, as of a spy that comes to see the weakness of the land. And so it is in 2 Rich. III. fol. 2. Nevertheless, this admitteth a distinction. For if he come with safe-conduct otherwise it is: for then he may not be violated, either in person or goods. But yet he must fetch his justice at the fountain-head, for none of the conduit pipes are open to him; he can have no remedy in any of the king's courts; but he must complain himself before the king's privy council: there he shall have a proceeding summary from hour to hour, the cause shall be determined by natural equity, and not by rules of law; and the decree of the council shall be executed by aid of the Chancery, as in 13 Ed. IV. And this is the first degree.

The second person is an alien friend, that is, such a one as is born under the obeisance of such a king or state as is confederate with the king of England, or at least not in war with him. To this person the law alloteth this benefit, that as the law accounts, that the hold it hath over him, is but a transitory hold, for he may be an enemy; so the law doth indue him but with a transitory benefit, that is, of moveable goods and personal actions. But for free-hold, or lease, or actions real or mixt, he is not enabled, except it be in autre droit. And so it is 9 Ed. IV. fol. 7. 19 Ed. IV. fol. 6. 5 Mar. and divers other books.

The third person is a denizen, using the word properly, for sometimes it is confounded with a natural born subject. This is one that is but subditus insitivus, or adoptivus, and is never by birth, but only by the king's charter, and by no other mean, come he never so young into the realm, or stay he never so long. Mansion or habitation will not indene him, no, nor swearing obedience to the king in a leet, which doth in-law the subject; but only, as I said, the king's grace and gift. To this person the law giveth an ability and capacity abridged, not in matter, but in time. And as there was a time when he was not subject, so the law doth not acknowledge him before that time. For if he purchase free-hold after his denization, he may take it; but if he have purchased any before, he shall not hold it: so if he have children after, they shall inherit; but if he have any before, they shall not inherit. So as he is but privileged à parte post, as the schoolmen say, and not à parte ante.

The fourth and last degree is a natural born subject, which is evermore by birth, or by act of parliament; and he is complete and entire. For in the law of England there is nil ultra, there is no more subdivision or more subtle division beyond these. And therein it seemeth to me, that the wisdom of the law, as I said, is to be admired both ways, both because it distinguisheth so far, and because it doth not distinguish farther. For I know that other laws do admit more curious distinction of this privilege; for the Romans had, besides jus civitatis, which answereth to naturalization, jus suffragii. For although a man were naturalized to take lands and inheritance, yet he was not enabled to have a voice at passing of laws, or at election of officers. And yet farther they have jus petitionis, or jus honorum. For though a man had voice, yet he was not capable of honour and office. But these be the devices commonly of popular or free estates, which are jealous whom they take into their number, and are unfit for monarchies. But by the law of England the subject, that is natural born, hath a capacity or ability to all benefits whatsoever; I say capacity or ability: but to reduce potentiam in actum, is another case. For an earl of Ireland, though he be naturalized in England, yet hath no voice in the parliament of England, except he have either a call by writ, or creation by patent; but he is capable of either.

But upon this quadripartite division of the ability of persons, I do observe to your lordships three things, being all effectually pertinent to the question in hand.

The first is, that if any man conceive that the reasons for the post-nati might serve as well for the ante-nati, he may by the distribution which we have made, plainly perceive his error. For the law looketh not back; and therefore cannot, by any matter ex post facto, after birth, alter the state of the birth; wherein no doubt the law hath a grave and profound reason; which is this, in few words, nemo subito fingitur; aliud est nasci, aliud fieri. We indeed more respect and affect those worthy gentlemen of Scotland, whose merits and conversations we know; but the law, that proceeds upon general reason, and looks upon no mens faces, affecteth and privilegeth those which drew their first breath under the obeisance of the king of England.

The second point is, that by the former distribution it appeareth that there be but two conditions by birth, either alien, or natural born; nam tertium penitus ignoramus. It is manifest then, that if the post-nati of Scotland be not natural born, they are alien born, and in no better degree at all than Flemings, French, Italians, Spanish, Germans, and others, which are all at this time alien friends, by reason his majesty is in peace with all the world.

The third point seemeth to me very worthy the consideration, which is, that in all the distributions of persons, and the degrees of abilities or capacities, the king's act is all in all, without any manner of respect to law or parliament. For it is the king that makes an alien enemy, by proclaiming a war, wherewith the law or parliament intermeddles not. So the king only grants safe-conducts, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king likewise that maketh an alien friend, by concluding a peace, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king that makes a denizen by his charter, absolutely of his prerogative and power, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. And therefore it is strongly to be inferred, that as all these degrees depend wholly upon the king's act, and no ways upon law or parliament; so the fourth, although it comes not by the king's patent, but by operation of law, yet that the law, in that operation, respecteth only the king's person, without respect of subjection to law or parliament. And thus much by way of explanation and inducement: which being all matter in effect confessed, is the strongest ground-work to that which is contradicted or controverted.

There followeth the confutation of the arguments on the contrary side.

That which hath been materially objected, may be reduced to four heads.

The first is, that the privilege of naturalization followeth allegiance, and that allegiance followeth the kingdom.

The second is drawn from that common ground, cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in duobus; a rule, the words whereof are taken from the civil law; but the matter of it is received in all laws, being a very line or rule of reason, to avoid confusion.

The third consisteth of certain inconveniencies conceived to ensue of this general naturalization, ipso jure.

The fourth is not properly an objection, but a pre-occupation of an objection or proof on our part, by a distinction devised between countries devolute by descent, and acquired by conquest.

For the first, it is not amiss to observe that those who maintain this new opinion, whereof there is altum silentium in our books of law, are not well agreed in what form to utter and express that: for some said that allegiance hath respect to the law, some to the crown, some to the kingdom, some to the body politic of the king: so there is confusion of tongues amongst them, as it commonly cometh to pass in opinions that have their foundations in subtilty and imagination of man's wit, and not in the ground of nature. But to leave their words, and to come to their proofs: they endeavour to prove this conceit by three manner of proofs: first, by reason; then, by certain inferences out of statutes; and lastly, by certain book-cases, mentioning and reciting the forms of pleadings.

The reason they bring is this; that naturalization is an operation of the law of England; and so indeed it is, that may be the true genus of it.

Then they add, that granted, that the law of England is of force only within the kingdom and dominions of England, and cannot operate but where it is in force. But the law is not in force in Scotland, therefore that cannot endure this benefit of naturalization by a birth in Scotland.

This reason is plausible and sensible, but extremely erroneous. For the law of England, for matters of benefit or forfeitures in England, operateth over the world. And because it is truly said that res publica constituitur poena et premia, I will put a case or two of either.

It is plain that if a subject of England had conspired the death of the king in foreign parts, it was by the common law of England treason. How prove I that? By the statute of 35 H. VIII. cap. 2. wherein you shall find no words at all of making any new case of treason which was not treason before; but only of ordaining a form of trial; ergo, it was treason before: and if so, then the law of England works in foreign parts. So of contempts, if the king send his privy seal to any subject beyond the seas, commanding him to return, and he disobey, no man will doubt but there is a contempt, and yet the fact enduring the contempt was committed in foreign parts.

Therefore the law of England doth extend to acts or matters done in foreign parts. So of reward, privilege or benefit, we need seek no other instance than the instance in question; for I will put you a case that no man shall deny, where the law of England doth work and confer the benefit of naturalization upon a birth neither within the dominions of the kingdom, nor king of England. By the statute of 25 E. III. which, if you will believe Huffey, is but a declaration of the common law, all children born in any parts of the world, if they be of English parents continuing at that time as liege subjects to the king, and having done no act to forfeit the benefit of their allegiance, are ipso facto naturalized. Nay, if a man look narrowly into the law in this point, he shall find a consequence that may seem at the first strange, but yet cannot be well avoided; which is, that if divers families of English men and women plant themselves at Middleburgh, or at Roan, or at Lisbon, and have issue, and their descendents do intermarry amongst themselves, without any intermixture of foreign blood; such descendents are naturalized to all generations: for every generation is still of liege parents, and therefore naturalized; so as you may have whole tribes and lineages of English in foreign countries.

And therefore it is utterly untrue that the law of England cannot operate or confer naturalization, but only within the bounds of the dominions of England.

To come now to their inferences upon statutes.

The first is out of this statute which I last recited. In which statute it is said, that in four several places there are these words, 'born within the allegiance of England'; or again, 'born without the allegiance of England'; which, say they, applies the allegiance to the kingdom, and not to the person of the king. To this the answer is easy; for there is no trope of speech more familiar than to use the place of addition for the person. So we say commonly, the line of York, or the line of Lancaster, for the lines of the duke of York, or the duke of Lancaster. So we say the possessions of Salisbury or Warwick, intending the possessions of the dukes of Salisbury or earls of Warwick. So we see earls sign, Salisbury, Northampton, for the earls of Salisbury or Northampton. And in the very same manner the statute speaks, allegiance of England, for allegiance of the king of England. Nay more, if there had been no variety in the penning of that statute, this collection had had a little more force; for those words might have been thought to have been used of purpose and in propriety; but you may find in three other several places of the same statute, allegiance and obeisance of the king of England, and especially in the material and concluding place, that is to say, children whose parents were at the time of their birth at the faith and obeisance of the king of England. So that it is manifest by this indifferent and promiscuous use of both phrases, the one proper, the other improper, that no man can ground any inference upon these words, without danger of cavillation.

The second statute, out of which they infer, is a statute made in 32 Hen. VIII. touching the policy of strangers tradesmen within this realm. For the parliament finding that they did eat the Englishmen out of trade, and that they entertained no apprentices but of their own nation, did prohibit that they should receive any apprentice but the king's subjects. In which statute is said, that in nine several places there is to be found this context of words, 'aliens born out of the king's obedience'; which is pregnant, say they, and doth imply that there be aliens born within the king's obedience. Touching this inference, I have heard it said, qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice; but this is not worthy the name of cortex, it is but muscus corticis, the moss of the bark. For it is evident that the statute meant to speak clearly and without equivocation, and to a common understanding. Now then there are aliens in common reputation, and aliens in precise construction of law; the statute then meaning not to comprehend Irishmen, or *Jersey*men, or *Calais*men, for explanation sake, lest the word alien might be extended to them in a vulgar acceptance, added those further words, 'born out of the king's obedience.' Nay, what if we should say, that those words, according to the received laws of speech, are no words of difference or limitation, but of declaration or description of an alien, as if it had been said with a widelicet, aliens; that is, such as are born out of the king's obedience? They cannot put us from that construction. But sure I am, if the bark make for them, the pith makes for us; for the privilege of liberty which the statute means to deny to aliens of entertaining apprentices, is denied to none born within the king's obedience, call them aliens or what you will. And therefore by their reason, a post-natus of Scotland shall by that statute keep what stranger apprentices he will, and so is put in the degree of an English.

The third statute, out of which inference is made, is the statute of 14 E. III. cap. solo, which hath been said to be our very case; and I am of that opinion too, but directly the other way. Therefore to open the scope and purpose of that statute: after that the title to the crown of France was devolute to king E. III. and that he had changed his stile, changed his arms, changed his seal, as his majesty hath done, the subjects of England, saith the statute, conceived a fear that the realm of England might become subject to the realm of France, or to the king as king of France. And I will give you the reasons of the double fear, that it should become subject to the realm of France. They had this reason of fear. Normandy had conquered England; Normandy was feudal of France. Therefore because the superior feignior of France was now united in right with the tenancy of Normandy, and that England, in regard of the Conquest, might be taken as a perquisite to Normandy, they had probable reason to fear, that the kingdom of England might be drawn to be subject to the realm of France. The other fear, that England might become subject to the king as king of France, grew no doubt of this foresight, that the kings of England might be like to make their mansion and seat of their estate in France, in regard of the climate, wealth, and glory of that kingdom; and thereby the kingdom of England might be governed by the king's mandates and precepts issuing as from the king of France. But they will say, whatsoever the occasion was, here you have the difference authorised of subjection to a king generally, and subjection to a king as king of a certain kingdom. But to this I give an answer three-fold.

First, it presseth not the question; for doth any man say that a post-natus of Scotland is naturalized in England, because he is a subject of the king as king of England? No, but generally because he is the king's subject.

Secondly, the scope of this law is to make a distinction between crown and crown; but the scope of their argument is to make a difference between crown and person.

Lastly, this statute, as I said, is our very case retorted against them; for this is a direct statute of separation, which presupposeth, that the common law had made an union of the crowns in some degree, by virtue of the union in the king's person, if this statute had not been made to stop and cross the course of the common law in that point; as if Scotland now should be suitors to the king, that an act might pass to like effect, and upon like fear. And therefore if you will make good your distinction in this present case, shew us a statute for that. But I hope you can shew no statute of separation between England and Scotland. And if any man say that this was a statute declaratory of the common law, he doth not mark how that is penned: for after a kind of historical declaration in the preamble, that England was never subject to France, the body of the act is penned thus: 'The king doth grant and establish;' which are words merely introductive novæ legis, as if the king gave a charter of franchise, and did invest, by a donative, the subjects of England with a new privilege or exemption, which by the common law they had not.

To come now to the book-cases which they put; which I will couple together, because they receive one joint answer.

The first is 42 E. III. fol. where the book saith, exception was taken, that the plaintiff was born in Scotland at Ross out of the allegiance of England.

The next is 22 H. VI. fol. 38. Adrian's case; where it is pleaded, that a woman was born at Bruges out of the allegiance of England.

The third is 13 Eliz. Dyr. fol. 300. where the case begins thus: Doctor Story qui notarius dignoscitur esse subditus regni Angliæ. In all these three, say they, that is pleaded, that the party is subject of the kingdom of England, and not of the king of England.

To

To these books I give this answer, that they be not the pleas at large, but the words of the reporter, who speaks compendiously and narratively, and not according to the solemn words of the pleading. If you find a case put, that it is pleaded a man was seized in fee-simple, you will not infer upon that, that the words of the pleading were in feodo simplici, but sibi et heredibus suis. But shew me some precedent of a pleading at large, of natus sub ligeantia regni Angliæ; for whereas Mr. Walter said that pleadings are variable in this point, he would fain bring it to that; but there is no such matter; for the pleadings are constant and uniform in this point. They may vary in the word fides, or ligeantia, or obedientia, and some other circumstances. But in the form of regni and regis they vary not: neither can there, as I am persuaded, be any one instance shewed forth to the contrary. See 9 Eliz. 4. Baggot's Affize, fol. 7. where the pleading at large is entered in the book. There you have alienigena natus extra ligeantiam domini regis Angliæ. See the precedents in the book of Entries, pl. 7. and two other places; for there be no more: and there you shall find still sub ligeantia domini regis, or extra ligeantiam domini regis. And therefore the forms of pleading, which are things so reverend, and are indeed towards the reasons of the law, as palma and pugnus, containing the reason of the law, opened or unfolded, or displayed, they make all for us. And for the very words of reporters in books, you must acknowledge and say, sicet obuium numero. For you have 22 Aff. pl. 25. 27 Aff. the prior of Shells case, pl. 48. 14 H. IV. fol. 19. 3 H. VI. fol. 35. 6 H. VIII. in my lord Dyer, fol. 2. In all these books, the very words of the reporters have 'the allegiance of the king,' and not, the allegiance of England. And the book in the 24 Edw. III. which is your best book, although while it is tossed at the bar, you have sometimes the words 'allegiance of England,' yet when it comes to Thorpe, chief justice, to give the rule, he saith, 'we will be certified by the roll, whether Scotland be within the allegiance of the king.' Nay, that farther form of pleading beateth down your opinion, that it sufficeth not to say that he is born out of the allegiance of the king, and stay there, but he must shew in the affirmative, under the allegiance of what king or state he was born. The reason whereof cannot be, because it may appear whether he be a friend or an enemy, for that in a real action is all one. Nor it cannot be because issue shall be taken thereupon; for the issue must arise on the other side upon indigena pleaded and traversed. And therefore it can have no other reason, but to apprise the court more certainly, that the country of the birth is none of those that are subject to the king.

As for the trial, that it should be impossible to be tried, I hold it not worth the answering; for the venire facias shall go either where the natural birth is laid, although it be but by fiction, or if it be laid according to the truth, it shall be tried where the action is brought, otherwise you fall upon a main rock, that breaketh your argument in pieces; for how should the birth of an Irishman be tried, or of a Ferfeyman? Nay, how should the birth of a subject be tried, that is born of English parents in Spain or Florence, or any part of world? For to all these the like objection of trial may be made, because they are within no counties: and this receives no answer. And therefore I will now pass on to the second main argument.

It is a rule of the civil law, say they, cum duo jura, &c. when two rights do meet in one person, there is no confusion of them, but they remain still in the eye of law distinct, as if they were in several persons: and they bring examples of one man bishop of two sees, or one parson that is rector of two churches. They say this unity in the bishop or the rector doth not create any privy between the parishioners or diocesaners, more than if there were several bishops, or several parsons. This rule I allow, as was said, to be a rule not of the civil law only but of common reason, but receiveth no forced or coined but a true and sound distinction or limitation; which is, that it evermore faileth and deceiveth in cases where there is any vigour or operation of the natural person; for generally in corporations the natural body is but suffulcimentum corporis corporati, it is but as a stock to uphold and bear out the corporate body; but otherwise it is in the case of the crown, as shall be manifestly proved in due place. But to shew that this rule receiveth this distinction, I will put but two cases. The statute of 21 H. VIII. ordaineth that a marquis may retain six chaplains qualified, a lord treasurer of England four, a privy-counsellor three. The lord treasurer Paulet was marquis of Winchester, lord treasurer of England, and privy-counsellor, all at once. The question was, whether he should qualify thirteen chaplains? Now by the rule cum duo jura he should; but adjudged, he should not. And the reason was, because the attendance of chaplains concerned and respected his natural person; he had but one soul, though he had three offices. The other case which I will put is the case of homage. A man doth homage to his lord for a tenancy held of the manor of Dale; there descendeth unto him afterwards a tenancy held of the manor of Sale, which manor of Sale is likewise in the hands of the same lord. Now by the rule cum duo jura, he should do homage again, two tenancies and two feignories, though but one tenant and one lord, æquum est ac si esset in duobus. But ruled that he should not do homage again. Nay in the case of the king he shall not pay a second respect of homage, as upon grave and deliberate consideration it was resolved, 24 H. VIII. and usus senecarii, as there is said, accordingly. And the reason is no other; but because when a man is sworn to his lord, he cannot be sworn over again: he hath but one conscience, and the obligation of this oath trencheth between the natural person of the tenant and the natural person of the lord. And certainly the case of homage and tenure, and of homage liege, which is one case, are things of a near nature, save that the one is much inferior to the other; but it is good to behold these great matters of state in cases of lower element, as the eclipse of the sun is used to be in a pail of water.

The third main argument containeth certain supposed inconveniences, which may ensue of a general naturalization ipso jure, of which kind three have been specially remembered.

The first is the loss of profit to the king upon letters of denization and purchases of aliens.

The second is the concourse of Scotsmen into this kingdom, to the infeebling of that realm of Scotland in people, and the impoverishing of this realm of England in wealth.

The third is, that the reason of this case stayeth not within the compass of the present case; for although it were some reason that Scotsmen were naturalized, being people of the same island and language, yet the reason which we urge, which is, that they are subject to the same king, may be applied to persons every way more estranged from us than they are; as if in future time, in the king's descendents, there should be a match with Spain, and the dominions of Spain should be united with the crown of England, by one reason, say they, all the West-Indies should be naturalized; which are people not only alterius soli but alterius cæli.

To these conceits of inconvenience, how easy it is to give answer, and how weak they are in themselves, I think no man that doth attentively ponder them can doubt. For how small revenue can arise of such denizations; and how honourable were it for the king to take escheats of his subjects, as if they were foreigners, for seizure of aliens lands are in regard the king hath no hold or command of their persons and services; every one may perceive. And for the concourse of Scotsmen, I think, we all conceive the spring-tide is past at the king's first coming in. And yet we see very few families of them throughout the cities and boroughs of England. And for the naturalizing of the Indies, we can readily help that, when the case comes; for we can make an act of parliament of separation, if we like not their consort. But these being reasons politic, and not legal, and we are not now in parliament, but before a judgment-seat, I will not meddle with them, especially since I have one answer which avoids and confounds all their objections in law; which is, that the very self-same objections do hold in countries purchased by conquest. For in subjects obtained by conquest, it were more profit to indenizeate by the poll; in subjects obtained by conquest, they may come too fast. And if king Henry VII. had accepted the offer of Christopher Columbus, whereby the crown of England had obtained the Indies by conquest or occupation, all the Indies had been naturalized by the confession of the adverse part. And therefore since it is confessed, that subjects obtained by conquest are naturalized, and that all these objections are common and indifferent, as well to case of conquest as case of descent, these objections are in themselves destroyed.

And therefore, to proceed now to overthrow that distinction of descent and conquest. Plato saith well, the strongest of all authorities is, if a man can alledge the authority of his adversary against himself. We do urge the confession of the other side, that they confessed the Irish are naturalized; that they confess the subjects of the isles of Ferfey and Guernsey, and Berwick, to be naturalized; and the subjects of Calais and Tournay, when they were English, were naturalized; as you may find in the 5 Eliz. in Dyer, upon the question put to the judges by sir Nicholas Bacon lord keeper.

To avoid this, they fly to a difference, which is new-coined, and is—I speak not to the disadvantage of the persons that use it, for they are driven to it tantum ad ultimum refugium, but the difference itself—it is, I say, full of ignorance and error. And therefore, to take a view of the supports of this difference, they alledge four reasons.

The first is, that countries of conquest are made parcel of England, because they are acquired by the arms and treasure of England. To this I answer, that it were a very strange argument, that if I wax rich upon the manor of Dale, and upon the revenue thereof purchase a close by it, that it should make that parcel of the manor of Dale. But I will set this new learning on ground with a question or case put. For I oppose them that hold this opinion with this question, if the king should conquer any foreign country by an army compounded of Englishmen and Scotsmen, as it is like whensoever wars are so it will be, I demand, whether this country conquered shall be naturalized both in England and Scotland, because it was purchased by the joint arms of both? And if yea, whether any man will think it reasonable, that such subjects be naturalized in both kingdoms; the one kingdom not being naturalized towards the other? These are the intricate consequences of conceits.

A second reason they alledge is, that countries won by conquest become subject to the laws of England, which countries patrimonial are not; and that the law doth draw the allegiance, and allegiance naturalization.

But to the major proposition of that argument, touching the dependency of allegiance upon law, somewhat hath been already spoken, and full answer shall be given when we come to it. But in this place it shall suffice to say, that the minor proposition is false; that is, that the laws of England are not superinduced upon any country by conquest; but that the old laws remain until the king by his proclamation or letters patent declare other laws; and then if he will he may declare laws which be utterly repugnant, and differing from the laws of England. And hereof many ancient precedents and records may be shewed, that the reason why Ireland is subject to the laws of England is not ipso jure upon conquest, but grew by a charter of king John; and that extended but to so much as was then in the king's possession; for there are records in the time of king E. I. and II. of divers particular grants to sundry subjects of Ireland and their heirs, that they might use and observe the laws of England.

The third reason is, that there is a politic necessity of intermixture of people in case of subjection by conquest, to remove alienations of mind, and to secure the state; which holdeth not in case of descent. Here I perceive Mr. Walter hath read somewhat in matter of state; and so have I likewise; though we may both quickly lose ourselves in causes of this nature. I find by the best opinions, that there be two means to assure and retain in obedience countries conquered, both very differing, almost in extremes, the one towards the other.

The one is by colonies, and intermixture of people, and transplantation of families, which Mr. Walter spoke of; and it was indeed the Roman manner; but this is like an old relic, much revered, and almost never used. But the other, which is the modern manner, and almost wholly in practice and use, is by garrisons and citadels, and lists or companies of men of war, and other like matters of terror and bridle.

To the first of these, which is little used, it is true that naturalization doth conduce; but to the latter it is utterly opposite, as putting too great pride and means to do hurt in those that are meant to be kept short and low. And yet in the very first case, of the Roman proceeding, naturalization did never follow by conquest, during all the growth of the Roman empire; but was ever conferred by charters, or donations, sometimes to cities and towns, sometimes to particular persons, and sometimes to nations, until the time of Adrian the emperor, and the law in orbe Romano (a): and that law or constitution is not referred to title of conquest and arms only, but to all other titles; as by the donation and testament of kings, by submission and dedition of states, or the like: so as this difference was as strange to them as to us. And certainly I suppose it will found strangely in the hearing of foreign nations, that the law of England should ipso facto naturalize subjects of conquests, and should not naturalize subjects which grow unto the king by descent; that is, that it should confer the benefit and privilege of naturalization upon such as cannot at the first but bear hatred and rancour to the state of England, and have had their hands in the blood of the subjects of England, and should deny the like benefit to those that are conjoined with them by a more amiable mean; and that the law of England should confer naturalization upon slaves and vassals, for people conquered are no better in the beginning, and should deny it to freemen: I say, it will be marvelled at abroad, of what complexion the laws of England be made, that breedeth such differences. But there is little danger of such scandals; for this is a difference that the law of England never knew.

The fourth reason of this difference is, that in case of conquest the territory united can never be separated again. But in case of descent, there is a possibility. If his majesty's line should fail, the kingdoms may sever again to their respective heirs; as in the case of 8 Henry VI. where it is said, that if land descend to a man from the ancestor on the part of his father, and a rent issuing out of it from an ancestor on the part of the mother; if the party die without issue, the rent is revived. As to this reason, I know well the continuance of the king's line is no less dear to those that alledge the reason, than to us that confute it. So as I do not blame the pressing of the reason. But it is answered with no great difficulty. For, first, the law doth never respect remote and foreign possibilities, as notably appeared in the great case between Mr. Hugh Cholmley and Houlford in the Exchequer, where one in the remainder, to the end to bridle tenant in tail from suffering a common recovery, granted his remainder to the king; and because he would be sure to have it out again without charge or trouble when his turn was served, he limited it to the king during the life of tenant in tail. Question grew, whether this grant of remainder were good, yea or no. And it was said to be frivolous and void, because it could never by any possibility execute; for tenant in tail cannot surrender; and if he died, the remainder likewise ceased. To which it was answered, that there was a possibility that it might execute, which was thus: put case, the tenant in tail should enter into religion, having no issue; then the remainder should execute, and the king should hold the land during the natural life of tenant in tail, notwithstanding his civil death. But the court una voce exploded this reason, and said, that monasteries were down, and entries into religion gone, and they must be up again ere this could be; and that the law did not respect such remote and foreign possibilities. And so we may hold this for the like: for I think we all hope, that neither of those days shall ever come, either for monasteries to be restored, or for the king's line to fail. But the true answer is, that the possibility subsequent, remote or not remote, doth not alter the operation of law for the present. For that should be, as if in case of the rent which you put, you should say, that in regard that the rent may be severed, it should be said to be in esse in the mean time, and should be grantable; which is clearly otherwise. And so in the principal case, if that should be, which God of his goodness forbid, cessante causa cessat effectus, the benefit of naturalization for the time to come is dissolved. But that altereth not the operation of the law; rebus sic stantibus. And therefore I conclude, that this difference is but a device full of weakness and ignorance; and that there is one and the same reason of naturalizing subjects by descent, and subjects by conquest; and that is the union in the person of the king; and therefore that the case of Scotland is as clear as that of Ireland, and they that grant the one cannot deny the other. And so I conclude the second part, touching confutation.

To proceed therefore to the proofs of our part, your lordships cannot but know many of them must be already spent in the answer which we have made to the objections. For corruptio unius, generatio alterius, holds as well in arguments, as in nature: the destruction of an objection begets a proof. But nevertheless I will avoid all iteration, lest I should seem either to distract your memories, or to abuse your patience; but will hold myself only to these proofs which stand substantially of themselves, and are not intermixed with matter of confutation. I will therefore prove unto your lordships that the post-natus of Scotland is by the law of England natural, and ought so to be adjudged, by three courses of proof.

1. First, upon point of favour of law.

2. Secondly, upon reasons and authorities of law.

3. And lastly, upon former precedents and examples.

1. Favour of law. What mean I by that? The law is equal, and favoureth not. It is true, not persons; but things or matters it doth favour. Is it not a common principle, that the law favoureth three things, life, liberty, and dower? And what is the reason of this favour? This, because our law is grounded upon the law of nature. And these three things do flow from the law of nature, preservation of life natural; liberty, which every beast or bird seeketh and affecteth naturally; the society of man and wife, whereof dower is the reward natural. It is well, doth the law favour liberty so highly, as a man shall enfranchise his bondman when he thinketh not of it, by granting to him lands or goods; and is the reason of it quia natura omnes homines erant liberi; and that servitude or villenage doth cross and abridge the law of nature? And doth not the self-same reason hold in the present case? For, my lords, by the law of nature all men in the world are naturalized one towards another; they were all made of one lump of earth, of one breath of God; they had the same common parents: nay, at the first they were, as the scripture sheweth, unius labii, of one language, until the curse; which curse, thanks be to God, our present case is exempted from. It was civil and national laws that brought in these words and differences of civis and exterus, alien and native. And therefore because they tend to abridge the law of nature, the law favoureth not them, but takes them strictly; even as our law hath an excellent rule, that customs of towns and boroughs shall be taken and construed strictly and precisely, because they do abridge and derogate from the law of the land. So by the same reason all national laws whatsoever are to be taken strictly and hardly in any point wherein they abridge and derogate from the law of nature. Whereupon I conclude, that your lordships cannot judge the law for the other side, except the case be lucè clarius. And if it appear to you but doubtful, as I think no man in his right senses but will yield it to be at least doubtful, then ought your lordships, under your correction be it spoken, to pronounce for us because of the favour of the law. Furthermore, as the law of England must favour naturalization as a branch of the law of nature, so it appears manifestly, that it doth favour it accordingly. For is it not much to make a subject naturalized? By the law of England, it should suffice, either place or parents. If he be born in England, it is no matter though his parents be Spaniards, or what you will. On the other side, if he be born of English parents, it skilleth not though he be born in Spain, or in any other place of the world. In such sort doth the law of England open her lap to receive in people to be naturalized; which indeed sheweth the wisdom and excellent composition of our law, and that it is the law of a warlike and magnanimous nation fit for empire. For look, and you shall find that such kind of estates have been ever liberal in point of naturalization: whereas merchant-like and envious estates have been otherwise.

For the reasons of law joined with authorities, I do first observe to your lordships, that our assertion or affirmation is simple and plain: that it sufficeth to naturalization, that there be one king, and that the party be natus ad fidem regis, agreeable to the definition of Linston, which is: alien is he which is born out of the allegiance of our lord the king. They of the other side speak of respects, and quoad, and quatenus, and such subtleties and distinctions. To maintain therefore our assertion, I will use three kinds of proofs.

The first is, that allegiance cannot be applied to the law or kingdom, but to the person of the king; because the allegiance of the subject is more large and spacious, and hath a greater latitude and comprehension than the law or the kingdom. And therefore it cannot be a dependency of that without the which it may of itself subsist.

The second proof which I will use is, that the natural body of the king hath an operation and influence into his body politic, as well as his body politic hath upon his body natural; and therefore, that although his body politic of king of England, and his body politic of king of Scotland, be several and distinct, yet nevertheless his natural person, which is one, hath an operation upon both, and createth a privy between them.

And the third proof is the binding text of five several statutes.

For the first of these, I shall make it manifest, that the allegiance is of a greater extent and dimension than laws or kingdom, and cannot consist by the laws merely; because it began before laws, it continueth after laws, and it is in vigour where laws are suspended and have not their force.

That it is more ancient than law, appeareth by that which was spoken in the beginning by way of inducement, where I did endeavour to demonstrate, that the original age of kingdoms was governed by natural equity, that kings were more ancient than lawgivers, that the first submissions were simple, and upon confidence to the person of kings, and that the allegiance of subjects to hereditary monarchies can no more be said to consist by laws, than the obedience of children to parents.

That allegiance continueth after laws, I will only put the case, which was remembered by two great judges in a great assembly, the one of them now with God: which was; that if a king of England should be expelled his kingdom, and some particular subjects should follow him in flight or exile in foreign parts, and any of them there should conspire his death, upon his recovery of his kingdom, such a subject might by the law of England be proceeded with for treason committed and perpetrated at what time he had no kingdom, and in place where the law did not bind.

That allegiance is in vigour and force where the power of law hath a cessation, appeareth notably in time of wars; for silent leges inter arma. And yet the sovereignty and imperial power of the king is so far from being then extinguished or suspended, as contrariwise it is raised and made more absolute; for then he may proceed by his supreme authority and martial law, without observing formalities of the laws of his kingdom. And therefore whosoever speaketh of laws, and the king's power by laws, and the subjects obedience or allegiance to laws, speak but of one half of the crown. For Bracton, out of Justinian, doth truly define the crown to consist of laws and arms, power civil and martial, with the latter whereof the law doth not intermeddle: so as where it is much spoken, that the subjects of England are under one law, and the subjects of Scotland are under another law, it is true at Edinburgh or Stirling, or again in London or York; but if Englishmen and Scotsmen meet in an army royal before Calais, I hope, then they are under one law. So likewise not only in time of war, but in time of peregrination. If a king of England travel or pass through foreign territories, yet the allegiance of his subjects followeth him; as appeareth in that notable case which is reported in Pluta, where one of the train of king Edward I. as he passed through France from the Holy Land, imbezeled some silver plate at Paris,

(a) [The law here alluded to by lord Bacon is one, by which the emperor Antoninus Caracalla communicated the rights of a Roman citizen to the whole Roman empire. It is noticed in Justinian's Digest, lib. 1. tit. 5. l. 17. and in Novell. 79. c. 5. An-toninus Pius and other emperors have been named as authors of the law. But Heinsius, who is very full and satisfactory on the point, is clear in opinion, that this extension was first made by Caracalla. Heinsius. Syntagma. Append. lib. 2. c. 15. EDITOR.]

and jurisdiction was demanded of this crime by the French king's counsel at law, ratione soli, and demanded likewise by the officers of king Edward, ratione personæ: and after much solemnity, contestation, and interpleading, it was ruled and determined for king Edward, and the party tried and judged before the knight marshal of the king's house, and hanged after the English law, and execution in St. Germain's meadows. And so much for the first proof.

For my second main proof, that is drawn from the true and legal distinction of the king's several capacities; for they that maintain the contrary opinion do in effect destroy the whole force of the king's natural capacity, as if it were drowned and swallowed up by his politic. And therefore I will first prove to your lordships, that his two capacities are in no sort confounded. And secondly, that as his capacity politic worketh so upon his natural person, as it makes it differ from all other the natural persons of his subjects; so converso, his natural body worketh so upon his politic, as the corporation of the crown utterly differeth from all other corporations within the realm.

For the first, I will vouch you the very words which I find in that notable case of the duchy, where the question was, whether the grants of king Edward VI. for duchy lands should be avoided in points of nonage. The case, as your lordships know well, is reported by Mr. Plowden as the general resolution of all the judges of England, and the king's learned counsel, Rouswell the solicitor only excepted. There I find the said words, Comment. fol. 215. 'There is in the king not a body natural alone, nor a body politic alone, but a body natural and politic together: corpus corporatum in corpore naturali, et corpus naturale in corpore corporato.' The like I find in the great case of the lord Berkley set down by the same reporter, Comment. fol. 234. 'Though there be in the king two bodies, and that those two bodies are conjoined, yet are they by no means confounded the one by the other.'

Now then to see the mutual and reciprocal intercourse, as I may term it, or influence or communication of qualities, that these bodies have the one upon the other. The body politic of the crown induceth the natural person of the king with these perfections; that the king in law shall never be said to be within age; that his blood shall never be corrupted; and that if he were attainted before, the very assumption of the crown purgeth it; that the king shall not take but by matter of record, although he take in his natural capacity as upon a gift in tail; that his body in law shall be said to be as it were immortal; for there is no death of the king in law, but a demise, as it is termed: with many other the like privileges and differences from other natural persons, too long to rehearse, the rather because the question laboureth not in that part. But on the contrary part let us see what operations the king's natural person hath upon his crown and body politic. Of which the chiefest and greatest is, that it causeth the crown to go by descent, which is a thing strange, and contrary to the course of all corporations, which evermore take in succession, and not by descent; for no man can shew me in all the corporations of England, of what nature soever, whether they consist of one person, or of many, or whether they be temporal or ecclesiastical, any one takes to him and his heirs, but all to him and his successors. And therefore here you may see what a weak course that is, to put cases of bishops and parsons, and the like, and to apply them to the crown. For the king takes to him and his heirs in the manner of a natural body, and the word, successors, is but superfluous; and where that is used, that is ever duly placed after the word, heirs, 'the king, his heirs, and successors.'

Again, no man can deny but uxor et filius sunt nomina naturalia. A corporation can have no wife, nor a corporation can have no son. How is it then, that it is treason to compass the death of the queen or of the prince? There is no part of the body politic of the crown in either of them, but it is intirely in the king. So likewise we find in the case of the lord Berkley, the question was, whether the statute of 35 Henry VIII. for that part which concerned queen Catharine Par's jointure, were a public act or no, of which the judges ought to take notice, not being pleaded; and judged a public act. So the like question came before your lordship, my lord chancellor, in serjeant Heale's case; whether the statute of 11 Edward III. concerning the intailing of the dukedom of Cornwall to the prince, were a public act or no; and ruled likewise a public act. Why? No man can affirm but these be operations of law, proceeding from the dignity of the natural person of the king; for you shall never find, that another corporation whatsoever of a bishop, or master of a college, or mayor of London, worketh any thing in law upon the wife or son of the bishop or the mayor. And to conclude this point, and withal to come near to the case in question, I will shew you where the natural person of the king hath not only an operation in the case of his wife and children, but likewise in the case of his subjects, which is the very question in hand. As for example, I put this case. Can a Scotsman, who is a subject to the natural person of the king, and not to the crown of England; can a Scotsman, I say, be an enemy by the law to the subjects of England? Or must he not of necessity, if he should invade England, be a rebel and no enemy, not only as to the king, but as to the subject? Or can any letters of mart or reprisal be granted against a Scotsman that shall spoil an Englishman's goods at sea? And certainly this case doth press exceeding near the principal case; for it proveth plainly, that the natural person of the king hath such a communication of qualities with his body politic, as it makes the subjects of either kingdom stand in another degree of privacy one towards the other, than they did before. And so much for the second proof.

For the five acts of parliament which I spoke of, which are concluding to this question.

The first of them is that concerning the banishment of Hugh Spencer in the time of king Edward II. in which act there is contained the charge and accusation whereupon his exile proceeded. One article of which charge is set down in these words: 'Homage and oath of the subject is more by reason of the crown than by reason of the person of the king. So that if the king doth not guide himself by reason in right of the crown, his lieges are bound by their oath to the crown to remove the king.'

By which act doth plainly appear the perilous consequence of this distinction concerning the person of the king and the crown. And yet I do acknowledge justly and ingenuously a great difference between that assertion and this, which is now maintained: for it is one thing to make things distinct, another thing to make them separable, aliud est distinctio, aliud separatio; and therefore I assure myself, that those that now use and urge that distinction, do as firmly hold, that the subjection to the king's person and to the crown are inseparable, though distinct, as I do. And it is true that the poison of the opinion and assertion of Spencer is like the poison of a scorpion, more in the tail than in the body: for it is the inference that they make, which is, that the king may be deposed or removed, that is the treason and disloyalty of that opinion. But by your leave, the body is never a whit the more wholesome meat for having such a tail belonging to it. Therefore we see that is locus lubricus, an opinion from which a man may easily slide into an absurdity. But upon this act of parliament I will only note one circumstance more, and so leave it, which may add authority unto it in the opinion of the wisest; and that is, that these Spencers were not ancient nobles or great patriots that were charged and prosecuted by upstarts and favourites: for then it might be said, that it was but the action of some flatterers, who use to extol the power of monarchs to be infinite. But it was contrary; a prosecution of those persons being favourites by the nobility; so as the nobility themselves, which seldom do subscribe to the opinion of an infinite power of monarchs, yet even they could not endure, but their blood did rise to hear that opinion, that subjection is owing to the crown rather than to the person of the king.

The second act of parliament, which determined this case, is the act of recognition in the first year of his majesty, wherein you shall find, that in two several places, the one in the preamble, the other in the body of the act, the parliament doth recognize, that these two realms of England and Scotland are under one imperial crown. The parliament doth not say under one monarchy or king, which might refer to the person, but under one imperial crown, which cannot be applied but to the sovereign power of regiment comprehending both kingdoms. And the third act of parliament is the act made in the fourth year of his majesty's reign, for the abolition of hostile laws; wherein your lordships shall find likewise in two places, that the parliament doth acknowledge, that there is an union of these two kingdoms already begun in his majesty's person: so as by the declaration of that act, they have not only one king, but there is an union in inception in the kingdoms themselves.

These two are judgments in parliament by way of declaration of law, against which no man can speak. And certainly these are righteous and true judgments to be relied upon; not only for the authority of them, but for the verity of them; for to any that shall well and deeply weigh the effects of law upon this conjunction, it cannot but appear, that although partes integrales of the kingdom, as the philosophers speak, such as the laws, the officers, the parliament, are not yet commixed; yet nevertheless there is but one and the self-same fountain of sovereign power depending upon the ancient submission, whereof I spake in the beginning; and in that sense the crowns and the kingdoms are truly said to be united.

And the force of this truth is such, that a grave and learned gentleman, that defended the contrary opinion, did confess thus far: that in ancient times, when monarchies, as he said, were but heaps of people without any exact form of policy; that then naturalization and communication of privileges did follow the person of the monarch; but otherwise since states were reduced to a more exact form: so as thus far we did consent; but still I differ from him in this, that these more exact forms, wrought by time and custom and laws, are nevertheless still upon the first foundation, and do serve only to perfect and corroborate the force and bond of the first submission, and in no sort to disannul or destroy it.

And therefore with these two acts do I likewise couple the act of 14 Edward III. which hath been alledged of the other side. For by collating of that act with this former two, the truth of that we affirm will the more evidently appear, according unto the rule of reason: opposita juxta se posita magis elucescunt. That act of 14 is an act of separation. These two acts formerly recited are acts tending to union. This act is an act that maketh a new law; it is by the words of grant and establish. These two acts declare the common law as it is, being by words of recognition and confession.

And therefore upon the difference of these laws you may substantially ground this position: that the common law of England, upon the adjunction of any kingdom unto the king of England, doth make some degree of union in the crowns and kingdoms themselves; except by a special act of parliament they be dissevered.

Lastly, the fifth act of parliament which I promised, is the act made in the 42 of E. III. cap. 10. which is an express decision of the point in question. The words are, item, (upon the petition put into parliament by the commons) that infants born beyond the seas in the feigneries of Calais, and elsewhere within the lands and feigneries that pertain to our sovereign lord the king beyond the seas, be as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England, it is accorded that the common law and the statute formerly made be holden.

Upon this act I infer thus much; first, that such as the petition mentioners were naturalized, the practice shews; then if so, it must be either by common law or statute, for so the words report: not by statute, for there is no other statute but 25 E. III. and that extends to the case of birth out of the king's obedience, where the parents are English; ergo it was by the common law, for that only remains. And so by the declaration of this statute at the common law, 'all infants, born within the lands and feigneries (for I give you the very words again) that pertain to our sovereign lord the king, (It is not said, as are the dominions of England) are as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England.' What can be more plain? And so I leave statutes and go to precedents; for though the one do bind more, yet the other sometimes doth satisfy more.

For precedents, in the producing and using of that kind of proof, of all others it behoveth them to be faithfully vouched; for the suppressing or keeping back of a circumstance, may change the case: and therefore I am determined to urge only such precedents, as are without all colour or scruple of exception or objection, even of those objections which I have, to my thinking, fully answered and confuted. This is now, by the providence of God, the fourth time that the line and kings of England have had dominions and seignories united unto them as patrimonies, and by descent of blood; four unions, I say, there have been, inclusive with this last. The first was of Normandy, in the person of William, commonly called the Conqueror. The second was of Gascoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, in the person of king Henry II. in his person, I say, though by several titles. The third was of the crown of France, in the person of king Edward III. And the fourth of the kingdom of Scotland, in his majesty. Of these I will set aside such as by any cavillation can be excepted unto. First, I will set aside Normandy; because it will be said, that the difference of countries accruing by conquest, from countries annexed by descent, in matter of communication of privileges, holdeth both ways, as well of the part of the conquering kingdom, as the conquered; and therefore that although Normandy was not a conquest of England, yet England was a conquest of Normandy, and so a communication of privileges between them. Again, set aside France; for that it will be said that although the king had a title in blood and by descent, yet that title was executed and recovered by arms, so as it is a mixt title of conquest and descent, and therefore the precedent not so clear.

There remains then Gascoigne and Anjou, and that precedent likewise I will reduce and abridge to a time, to avoid all question. For it will be said of them also, that after they were lost and recovered in ore gladii, that the ancient title of blood was extinct; and that the king was in upon his new title by conquest. And Mr. Walter hath found a book-case in 13 H. VI. abridged by Mr. Fitz-Herbert, in title of Protection, placito 56. where a protection was cast, quia profecturus in Gasconiam with the earl of Huntingdon, and challenged because it was not a voyage royal; and the justices thereupon required the sight of the commission, which was brought before them, and purported power to pardon felonies and treason, power to coin money, and power to conquer them that resist: whereby Mr. Walter, finding the word conquest, collected that the king's title at that time was reputed to be by conquest. Wherein I may not omit to give obiter that answer which law and truth provide, namely, that when any king obtaineth by war a country whereunto he hath right by birth, that he is ever in upon his ancient right, not upon his purchase by conquest; and the reason is, that there is as well a judgment and recovery by war and arms, as by law and course of justice. For war is a tribunal-seat, wherein God giveth the judgment, and the trial is by battle or duel, as in the case of trial of private right: and then it follows, that whosoever cometh in by eviction, comes in his remitter: so as there will be no difference in countries whereof the right cometh by descent, whether the possession be obtained peaceably or by war. But yet nevertheless, because I will utterly take away all manner of evasion and subterfuge, I will yet set apart that part of time, in and during the which the subjects of Gascoigne and Guienne might be thought to be subdued by a re-conquest. And therefore I will not meddle with the prior of Shelles's case, though it be an excellent case; because it was in the time of 27 E. III. neither will I meddle with any cases, records, or precedents, in the time of king H. V. or king H. VI. for the same reason; but will hold myself to a portion of time from the first uniting of these provinces in the time of king H. II. until the time of king John, at what time those provinces were lost; and from that time again unto the seventeenth year of the reign of king E. II. at what time the statute of prærogativa regis was made, which altered the law in the point in hand.

That both in these times the subjects of Gascoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, were naturalized for inheritance in England by the laws of England, I shall manifestly prove; and the proof proceeds, as to the former time, which is our case, in a very high degree à minore ad majus, and as we say, à multo fortiori. For if this privilege of naturalization remained unto them when the countries were lost, and became subjects in possession to another king, much more did they enjoy it as long as they continued under the king's subjection.

Therefore to open the state of this point. After these provinces were, through the perturbations of the state in the unfortunate time of king John, lost and severed, the principal persons which did adhere unto the French, were attainted of treason, and their escheats here in England taken and seized. But the people, that could not resist the tempest when their heads and leaders were revolted, continued inheritable to their possessions in England; and reciprocally the people of England inherited and succeeded to their possessions in Gascoigne, and were both accounted ad fidem utriusque regis, until the statute of prærogativa regis; wherein the wisdom and justice of the law of England is highly to be commended. For of this law there are two grounds of reason, the one of equity, the other of policy. That of equity was, because the common people were in no fault, but, as the scripture saith in a like case, quid fecerunt oves iste? It was the cowardise and disloyalty of their governors that deserved punishment, but what had these sheep done? And therefore to have punished them, and deprived them of their lands and fortunes, had been unjust. That of policy was, because if the law had forthwith, upon the loss of the countries by an accident of time, pronounced the people for aliens, it had been a kind of accession of their right, and a disclaimer in them, and so a greater difficulty to recover them. And therefore we see the statute, which altered the law in this point, was made in the time of a weak king, that, as it seemed, despaired ever to recover his right, and therefore thought better to have a little present profit by escheats, than the continuance of his claim, and the countenance of his right, by the admitting of them to enjoy their inheritance as they did before.

The state therefore of this point being thus opened, it resteth to prove our assertion, that they were naturalized; for the clearing whereof I shall need but to read the authorities, they be so direct and pregnant. The first is the very text of the statute of prærogativa regis. Rex habebit effectus de terris Normannorum, cujusunque feodi fuerint, salvo servitio, quod pertinet ad capitales dominos feodi illius: et hoc similiter intelligendum est, si aliqua hæreditas descendat alicui nato in partibus transmarinis, et cujus antecessores fuerunt ad fidem regis Franciæ, ut tempore regis Johannis, et non ad fidem regis Angliæ, sicut contigit de baronia Monumetæ, &c.

By which statute it appears plainly, that before the time of king John there was no colour of any escheat, because they were the king's subjects in possession, as Scotland now is; but only it determines the law from that time forward.

This statute, if it had in it any obscurity, it is taken away by two lights; the one placed before it, and the other placed after it; both authors of great credit, the one for ancient, the other for late times.

The former is Bracton, in his cap. de exceptionibus, lib. 5. fol. 427. and his words are these: est etiam et alia exceptio, quæ tenenti competit ex persona petentis, propter defectum nationis, quæ dilatoria est, et non perimit actionem, ut si quis alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Franciæ, et actionem instituat versus aliquem, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Angliæ, tali non respondeatur, saltem donec terræ fuerint communes. By these words it appeareth, that after the loss of the provinces beyond the seas, the naturalization of the subjects of those provinces was in no sort extinguished, but only was in suspense during the time of war, and no longer; for he saith plainly, that the exception, which we call plea, to the person of an alien, was not peremptory, but only dilatory; that is to say, during the time of war, and until there were peace concluded, which he terms by these words, donec terræ fuerint communes: which, though the phrase seem somewhat obscure, is expounded by Bracton himself in his fourth book, fol. 297. to be of peace made and concluded, whereby the inhabitants of England and those provinces might enjoy the profits and fruits of their lands in either place communiter, that is, respectively, or as well the one as the other. So as it is clear they were no aliens in right, but only interrupted and debarred of suits in the king's courts in time of war.

The authority after the statute is that of Mr. Stamford, the best expositor of a statute that hath been in our law; a man of reverend judgment and excellent order in his writings. His words are in his exposition upon the branch of the statute which we read before. 'By this branch it should appear, that at this time men of Normandy, Gascoigne, Guienne, Anjou, and Britain, were inheritable within this realm, as well as Englishmen; because that they were sometimes subjects to the kings of England, and under their dominion, until king John's time, as is aforesaid: and yet after his time, those men, saving such whose lands were taken away for treason, were still inheritable within this realm till the making of this statute; and in the time of peace between the two kings of England and France, they were answerable within this realm, if they had brought any action for their lands and tenements.'

So as by these three authorities, every one so plainly pursuing the other, we conclude that the subjects of Gascoigne, Guienne, Anjou, and the rest, from their first union by descent, until the making of the statute of prærogativa regis, were inheritable in England, and to be answered in the king's courts in all actions, except it were in time of war. Nay more, which is de abundanti, that when the provinces were lost, and disannexed, and that the king was but king de jure over them, and not de facto, yet nevertheless the privilege of naturalization continued.

There resteth yet one objection, rather plausible to a popular understanding than any ways forcible in law or learning, which is a difference taken between the kingdom of Scotland and these duchies; for that the one is a kingdom, and the other was not so; and therefore that those provinces, being of an inferior nature, did acknowledge our laws, and seals, and parliament, which the kingdom of Scotland doth not.

This difference was well given over by Mr. Walter; for it is plain that a kingdom and absolute dukedom, or any other sovereign estate, do differ honore, and not potestate: for divers duchies and countries, that are now, were sometimes kingdoms; and divers kingdoms, that are now, were sometimes duchies, or of other inferior stile: wherein we need not travel abroad, since we have in our own state so notorious an instance of the country of Ireland, whereof king H. VIII. of late time was the first that writ himself king, the former stile being lord of Ireland, and no more; and yet kings had the same authority before, that they have had since, and the same nation the same marks of a sovereign state, as their parliaments, their arms, their coins, as they now have: so as this is too superficial an allegation to labour upon.

And if any do conceive that Gascoigne and Guienne were governed by the laws of England: first, that cannot be in reason; for it is a true ground, that whosoever any prince's title unto any country is by law, he can never change the laws, for that they create his title: and therefore no doubt those duchies retained their own laws; which if they did, then they could not be subject to the laws of England. And next, again, the fact or practice was otherwise, as appeareth by all consent of story and record: for those duchies continued governed by the civil law, their trials by witnesses, and not by jury, their lands testamentary, and the like.

Now for the colours that some have endeavoured to give, that they should have been subordinate to the government of England; they were partly weak, and partly such as make strongly against them: for as to that, that writs of habeas corpus under the great seal of England have gone to Gascoigne, it is no manner of proof; for that the king's writs, which are mandatory, and not writs of ordinary justice, may go to his subjects into any foreign parts whatsoever, and under what seal it pleaseth him to use. And as to that, that some acts of parliament have been cited, wherein the parliaments of England have taken upon them to order matters of Gascoigne; if those statutes be well looked into, nothing doth more plainly convince the contrary; for they intermeddle with nothing but that that concerneth either the English subjects personally, or the territories of England locally, and never the subjects of Gascoigne. For look upon the statute of 27 E. III. cap. 5. there it is said, that there shall be no forestalling of wines. But by whom? Only by English merchants; not a word of the subjects of Gascoigne; and yet no doubt they might be offenders in the same kind. So in the sixth chapter it is said, that all merchants Gascoignes may safely bring wines into what part it shall please them. Here now are the persons of Gascoignes. But then the place whither? Into the realm of England. And in the seventh chapter, that erects the ports of Bordeaux and Bayonne for the staple towns of wine, the statute ordains, 'that if any,' but who? 'English merchant, or his servants, shall buy or bargain other where, his body shall be arrested by the steward of Gascoigne, or the constable of Bordeaux.' True, for the officers of England could not catch him in Gascoigne. But what shall become of him, shall he be proceeded with within Gascoigne? No, but he shall be sent over into England into the Tower of London.

And this doth notably disclose the reason of that custom which some have sought to wrest the other way: that custom, I say, whereof a form doth yet remain, that in every parliament the king doth appoint certain committees in the upper-house to receive the petitions of Normandy, Lord Coke's report of Calvin's case. From the 7th part of his Reports.

[The following report is printed from serjeant Wilson's edition of lord Coke's Reports. All the references not in the body of the report are by Mr. Chilton and the editors of the editions since the one by him. The case is dated by lord Coke, Trin. 6. Jam. 1.]

JAMES, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to the sheriff of Middlesex, greeting: Robert Calvin, gent. hath complained to us, that Richard Smith, and Nicholas Smith, unjustly, and without judgment, have disseised him of his freehold in Haggard, otherwise Haggerston, otherwise Aggerston, in the parish of St. Leonard, in Shoreditch, within 30 years now last past; and therefore we command you, that if the said Robert shall secure you to prosecute his claim, then that you cause the said tenement to be resealed with the chattels, which within it were taken, and the said tenement with the chattels, to be in peace until Thursday next after 15 days of St. Martin next coming; and in the mean time, cause 12 free and lawful men of that neighbourhood to view the said tenement, and the names of them to be inbreviated; and summon them by good summoners, that they be then before us wherever we shall then be in England, ready thereof to make recognition; and put by sureties, and safe pledges, the aforesaid Richard and Nicholas or their bailiffs (if they cannot be found,) that they be then there, to hear the recognition; and have there the summoners, the names of the pledges, and this writ. Witness our self at Westminster, the 3d day of November, in the fifth year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the one and fortieth.

For 40s. paid in the hanger,

Kindesley.

THE assise cometh to recognize, if Rich. Smith, and Nich. Smith, unjustly, and without judgment, did disseise Rob. Calvin, gent. of his freehold in Haggard, otherwise Haggerston, otherwise Aggerston, in the parish of St. Leonard in Shoreditch, within thirty years now last past: and whereupon, the said Robert, who is within the age of twenty-one years, by John Parkinson and William Parkinson, his guardians, by the court of the said king here to this being jointly and severally specially admitted, complaineth; that they disseised him of one messuage with the appurtenances,

&c. And the said Richard and Nicholas, by William Edwards, their attorney, come and say, that the said Robert ought not to be answered to his writ aforesaid, because they say, that the said Robert is an alien, born on the 5th day of November, in the 3d year of the reign of the K. that now is, of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the thirty-ninth, at Edinburgh, within his kingdom of Scotland, aforesaid, and within the allegiance of the said lord the king of the kingdom of Scotland, and out of the allegiance of the said lord the king of his kingdom of England; and at the time of the birth of the said Robert Calvin, and long before, and continually afterwards, the aforesaid kingdom of Scotland, by the proper rights, laws, and statutes of the same kingdom, and not by the rights, laws, or statutes of this kingdom of England, was and yet is ruled and governed. And this he is ready to verify, and thereupon prayeth judgment, if the said Robert, to his said writ aforesaid, ought to be answered, &c. And the aforesaid Robert Calvin saith, that the aforesaid plea, by the aforesaid Richard and Nicholas above pleaded, is insufficient in law, to bar him the said Robert from having an answer to his writ aforesaid; and that the said Robert, to the said plea in manner and form aforesaid pleaded, needeth not, nor by the law of the land is bound to answer; and this he is ready to verify, and hereof prayeth judgment; and that the said Richard and Nicholas, to the aforesaid writ of the said Robert, may answer.

And the said Richard and Nicholas, forasmuch as they have above alledged sufficient matter in law to bar him the said Robert from having an answer to his said writ, which they are ready to verify; which matter the aforesaid Robert doth not gainsay, nor to the same doth in any ways answer, but the said averment altogether refuseth to admit as before; pray judgment, if the aforesaid Robert ought to be answered to his said writ, &c. And because the court of the lord the king here, are not yet advised of giving their judgment of and upon the premises, day thereof is given to the parties aforesaid; before the lord the king at Westminster, until Monday next after 8 days of St. Hilary, to hear their judgment thereof, because the court of the lord the king here thereof are not yet, &c. And the assise aforesaid remains to be taken before the said lord the king, until the same Monday there, &c. And the sheriff to distrain the recognitors of the assise aforesaid: and in the interim to cause a view, &c. At which day, before the lord the king at Westminster, come as well the aforesaid R. Calvin, by his guardians aforesaid, as the aforesaid Rich. Smith and Nic. Smith, by their attorney aforesaid; and because the court of the lord the king here of giving their judgment of and upon the premises is not yet advised, day thereof is given to the parties aforesaid before the lord the king at Westminster, until Monday next after the morrow of the Ascension of our Lord, to hear their judgment; because the court of the lord the king here are not yet, &c. And the assise aforesaid remains further to be taken, until the same Monday there, &c. and the sheriff as before to distrain the recognitors of the assise aforesaid, and in the interim to cause a view, &c. At which day, before the lord the king at Westminster, come as well the aforesaid Robert Calvin by his guardians aforesaid, as the aforesaid Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith, by their attorney aforesaid, &c. and because the court of the lord the king here, &c.

Guienne, and the rest; which, as by the former statute doth appear, could not be for the ordering of the governments there, but for the liberties and good usage of the subjects of those parts when they came hither; or vice versa, for the restraining of the abuses and misdemeanors of our subjects when they went thither.

Wherefore I am now at an end. For us to speak of the mischiefs, I hold it not fit for this place, lest we should seem to bend the laws to policy, and not to take them in their true and natural sense. It is enough that every man knows, that it is true of these two kingdoms, which a good father said of the churches of Christ: si inseparabiles insuperabiles. Some things I may have forgot, and some things perhaps I may forget willingly; for I will not press any opinion or declaration of late time which may prejudice the liberty of this debate; but ex dictis, et ex non dictis, upon the whole matter I pray judgement for the plaintiff.

THE question of this case as to matter in law was, whether Robert Calvin the plaintiff (being born in Scotland since the crown of England descended to his majesty) be an alien born, and consequently disabled to bring any real or personal (a) action for any lands within the realm of England. After this case had been argued in the court of King's Bench, at the bar, by the counsel learned of either party, the judges of that court, upon conference and consideration of the weight and importance thereof, adjourned the same (according to the ancient and ordinary course and order of the law) into the (b) Exchequer-Chamber, to be argued openly there; first by the counsel learned of either party, and then by all the judges of England; where afterwards the case was argued by Bacon solicitor general, on the part of the plaintiff, and by Laur. Hyde, for the defendant; and afterward by Hobart attorney general, for the plaintiff, and by serjeant Hutton, for the defendant; and in Easter term last, the case was argued by Heron, puisne baron of the Exchequer, and Foster, puisne judge of the court of Common Pleas; and on the second day appointed for this case, by Crook, puisne judge of the King's Bench, and Altham, baron of the Exchequer; the third day by Snigge, baron of the Exchequer, and Williams, one of the judges of the King's Bench; the fourth day by Daniel, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas, and by Yalverton, one of the judges of the King's Bench; and in Trinity term following, by Warburton, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Fenner, one of the judges of the King's Bench; and after by Walmesley, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield, chief baron; and at two several days in the same term, Coke, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Fleming, chief justice of the King's Bench, and sir Thomas Egerton, lord Ellesmere, lord chancellor of England, argued the case (the like plea in disability of Robert Calvin's person being pleaded mutatis mutandis in the Chancery in a suit there for evidence concerning lands of inheritance, and by the lord chancellor adjourned also into the Exchequer-Chamber, to the end that one rule might over-rule both the said cases.) And first (for that I intend to make as summary a report as I can) I will at the first set down such arguments and objections as were made and drawn out of this short record against the plaintiff, by those that argued for the defendants. It was observed, that in this plea there were four nouns, quatuor nomina, which were called, nomina operativa, because from them all the said arguments and objections on the part of the defendants were drawn; that is to say, 1. Ligeantia (which is twice repeated in the plea, for it is said, infra ligeantiam domini regis regni sui Scot', & extra ligeantiam domini regis regni sui Angl'.) 2. Regnum (which also appeareth to be twice mentioned, viz. regnum Angl', and regnum Scot'.) 3. Leges (which are twice alledged, viz. leges Angl', and leges Scot', two several and distinct laws.) 4. Alienigena (which is the conclusion of all, viz. that Robert Calvin is alienigena).

1. Ligeantia. By the first it appeareth, that the defendants do make two ligeances, one of England, and another of Scotland, and from these several ligeances two arguments were framed, which briefly may be concluded thus. 1. Whosoever is born infra ligeantiam, within the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of Scotland, is alienigena, an alien born, as to the kingdom of England; but Robert Calvin was born at Edinburgh, within the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of Scotland; therefore Robert Calvin is alienigena, an alien born, as to the kingdom of England. 2. Whosoever is born extra ligeantiam, out of the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of England, is an alien as to the kingdom of England; but the plaintiff was born out of the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of England; therefore the plaintiff is an alien, &c. Both these arguments are drawn from the very words of the plea, viz. quod prae' Robertus est alienigena, natus 5 Nov. anno regni domini regis nunc Angl' &c. tertio apud Edinburgh infra regnum Scot', ac infra ligeantiam dicti domini regis dicti regni sui Scot', ac extra ligeantiam dicti domini regis regni sui Angl'.

2. Regna.

2. Regna. From the several kingdoms, viz. regnum Angl' and regnum Scot', three arguments were drawn. 1. Quando (a) duo jura (imo dua regna) concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diversis; but in the king's person there concur two distinct and several kingdoms; therefore it is as if they were in divers persons, and consequently the plaintiff is an alien, as all the antenati are, for that they were born under the ligeance of another king. 2. Whatsoever is due to the king's several politic capacities of the several kingdoms is several and divided; but ligeance of each nation is due to the king's several politic capacities of the several kingdoms; ergo, the ligeance of each nation is several and divided, and consequently the plaintiff is an alien, for that they that are born under several ligeances are aliens one to another. 3. Where the king hath several kingdoms by several titles and descents, there also are the ligeances several; but the king hath these two kingdoms by several titles and descents; therefore the ligeances are several. These three arguments are collected also from the words of the plea before remembered.

3. Leges. From the several and distinct laws of either kingdom, they did reason thus. 1. Every subject, that is born out of the extent and reach of the laws of England, cannot by judgment of those laws be a natural subject to the king, in respect of his kingdom of England; but the plaintiff was born at Edinburgh, out of the extent and reach of the laws of England; therefore the plaintiff, by the judgment of the laws of England, cannot be a natural subject to the king, as of his kingdom of England.

2. That subject, that is not at the time and in the place of his birth inheritable to the laws of England, cannot be inheritable or partaker of the benefits and privileges given by the laws of England; but the plaintiff at the time, and in the place of his birth, was not inheritable to the laws of England, but only to the laws of Scotland; therefore he is not inheritable or to be partaker of the benefits or privileges of the laws of England.

3. Whatsoever appeareth to be out of the jurisdiction of the laws of England, cannot be tried by the same laws; but the plaintiff's birth at Edinburgh is out of the jurisdiction of the laws of England; therefore the same cannot be tried by the laws of England. Which three arguments were drawn from these words of the plea, viz. quodque tempore natiuitatis præd' Roberti Calvin, ac diu antea, & continuè postea, præd' regnum Scot' per jura, leges & statuta ejusdem regni propria, & non per jura, leges, seu statuta hujus regni Angl' regulat' & gubernat' fuit, & adhuc est.

4. Alienigena. From this word alienigena they argued thus: every subject that is alien' gentis (i. e.) alien' ligeant', est alienigena; but such a one is the plaintiff; therefore, &c.

And to these nine arguments all that was spoken learnedly and at large by those that argued against the plaintiff may be reduced.

But it was resolved by the lord chancellor and twelve judges, viz. the two chief justices, the chief baron, justice Fenner, Warburton, Yelverton, Daniel, Williams, baron Snigge, baron Altham, justice Crooke, and baron Heron, that the plaintiff was no alien, and consequently that he ought to be answered in this assise by the defendants.

This case was as elaborately, substantially, and judicially argued by the lord chancellor, and by my brethren the judges, as I ever read or heard of any; and so in mine opinion the weight and consequence of the cause, both in presenti & perpetuis futuris temporibus justly deserved; for though it was one of the shortest and least that ever we argued in this court, yet was it the longest and weightiest that ever was argued in any court, the shortest in syllables, and the longest in substance; the least for the value (and yet not tending to the right of that least) but the weightiest for the consequence, both for the present, and for all posterity. And therefore it was said, that those that had written de fossilibus did observe, that gold, hidden in the bowels of the earth, was in respect of the mass of the whole earth, parvum in magno; but of this short plea it might be truly said (which is more strange) that here was magnum in parvo.

And in the arguments of those that argued for the pl. I specially noted, that albeit they spake according to their own heart, yet they spake not out of their own head and invention: wherein they followed the counsel given in God's book, interroga pristinam generationem (for out of the old fields must come the new corn) & diligenter investiga- pturum memoriam, and diligently search out the judgments of our forefathers, and that for divers reasons. First, on our own part, besterni enim sumus & ignoramus, & vita nostra sicut umbra super terram; for we are but of yesterday, (and therefore had need of the wisdom of those that were before us) and had been ignorant (if we had not received light and knowledge from our forefathers) and our days upon the earth are but as a shadow, in respect of the old ancient days and times past, wherein the laws have been by the wisdom of the most excellent men, in many successions of ages, by long and continual experience (the trial of right and truth) fined and refined, which no one man, (being of so short a time) albeit he had in his head the wisdom of all the men in the world, in any one age could ever have effected or attained unto. And therefore it is optima regula, qua nulla est verior aut firmiter in jure, neminem oportet esse sapienterem legibus; no man ought to take upon him to be wiser than the laws. Secondly, in respect of our forefathers. Ipsi (saith the text) docerunt te, & loquentur tibi, & ex corde suo proferunt eloquia, they shall teach thee, and tell thee, and shall utter the words of their heart, without all equivocation or mental reservation; they (I say) that cannot be daunted with fear of any power above them, nor be dazzled with the applause of the popular about them, nor fretted with any discontentment (the matter of opposition and contradiction) within them, but shall speak the words of their heart, without all affection or infection whatsoever.

Also in their arguments of this cause concerning an alien, they told no strange histories, cited no foreign laws, produced no alien precedents; and that for two causes: the one, for that the laws of England are so copious in this point, as, God willing, by the report of this case shall appear; the other, lest their arguments, concerning an alien born, should become foreign, strange, and an alien to the state of the question, which, being questio juris concerning freehold and inheritance in England, is only to be decided by the laws of this realm. And albeit I concurred with those that adjudged the plaintiff to be no alien, yet do I find a mere stranger in this case, such a one as the eye of the law (our books and book-cases) never saw, as the ears of the law (our reporters) never heard of, nor the mouth of the law (for judex est lex loquens) the judges our forefathers of the law never tasted: I say, such a one, as the stomach of the law, our exquisite and perfect records of pleadings, entries, and judgments (that make equal and true distribution of all cases in question) never digested. In a word, this little plea is a great stranger to the laws of England, as shall manifestly appear by the resolution of this case.

And now that I have taken upon me to make a report of their arguments, I ought to do the same as truly, fully, and sincerely as possibly I can; howbeit, seeing that almost every judge had in the course of his argument a peculiar method, and I must only hold myself to one, I shall give no just offence to any, if I challenge that which of right is due to every reporter, that is, to reduce the sum and effect of all to such a method, as, upon consideration had of all the arguments, the reporter himself thinketh to be fittest and clearest for the right understanding of the true reasons and causes of the judgment and resolution of the case in question.

In this case five things did fall into consideration. 1. Ligeantia. 2. Leges. 3. Regna. 4. Alienigena. 5. What legal inconveniences would ensue on either side.

1. Concerning ligeance: 1. It was resolved what ligeance was. 2. How many kinds of ligeances there were. 3. Where ligeance was due. 4. To whom it was due. And last, how it was due.

2. For the laws: 1. That ligeance or obedience of the subject to the sovereign is due by the law of nature. 2. That this law of nature is part of the laws of England. 3. That the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law in the world. 4. That the law of nature is immutable, and cannot be changed.

3. As touching the kingdoms: how far forth by the act of law the union is already made, and wherein the kingdoms do yet remain separate and divided.

4. Of alienigena, an alien born: 1. What an alien born is in law. 2. The division and diversity of aliens. 3. Incidents to every alien. 4. Authorities in law. 5. Demonstrative conclusions upon the premises, that the plaintiff can be no alien.

5. Upon due consideration had of the consequent of this case: what inconveniences legal should follow on either party.

And these several parts I will in this report pursue in such order as they have been propounded; and first de ligeantia.

1. (b) Ligeance is a true and faithful obedience of the subject due to his sovereign. This ligeance and obedience is an incident inseparable to every subject: for as soon as he is born, he oweth by birth-right ligeance and obedience to his sovereign. Ligeantia est vinculum fidei: and ligeantia est quasi legis essentia. Ligeantia est ligamentum, quasi ligatio mentium; quia sicut ligamentum est connexio articularum & juncturarum, &c. As the ligatures or strings do knit together the joints of all the parts of the body, so doth ligeance join together the sovereign and all his subjects, quasi uno ligamine. Glanville, who wrote in the reign of H. 2. lib. 9. cap. 4. speaking of the connexion which ought to be between the lord and tenant that holdeth by homage, saith, that mutua debet esse domini & fidelitatis connexio, ita quod quantum debet domino ex homagio, tantum illi debet dominus ex dominio, præter solam reverentiam, and the lord (saith he) ought to defend his tenant. But between the sovereign and the subject there is without comparison a higher and greater connexion; for as the subject oweth to the king his true and faithful ligeance and obedience, so the sovereign is to govern and protect his subjects, regere & protegere subditos suos; so as between the sovereign and subject there is duplex & reciprocum ligamen; quia sicut subditus regi tenetur ad obedientiam, ita rex subdito tenetur ad protectionem: merito igitur ligeantia dicitur a ligando, quia continet in se duplex ligamen. And therefore it is holden in 20 H. 7. 8. a. that there is a liege or ligeance between the king and the subject. And Portescue, cap. 13. rex (c) ad tutelam legis corporum & bonorum subditorum erectus est. And in the acts of parliament of 10 R. 2. cap. 5. and 11 R. 2. cap. 1. 14 H. 8. cap. 2. &c. subjects are called liege people; and in the acts of parliament in 34 H. 8. cap. 1. and 35 H. 8. cap. 3. &c. the king is called the liege lord of his subjects. And with this agreeeth M. Skeene in his book de expositione verborum, (which book was cited by one of the judges which argued against the plaintiff) ligeance is the mutual bond and obligation between the king and his subjects, whereby subjects are called his liege subjects, because they are bound to obey and serve him; and he is called their liege lord, because he should maintain and defend them. Whereby it appeareth, that in this point the law of England and of Scotland is all one. Therefore it is truly said, that protectio trahit subjectionem, & subjectio protectionem. And hereby it plainly appeareth, that ligeance doth not begin by the oath in the leet; for many men owe true ligeance that never were sworn in a leet, and the swearing in a leet maketh no (d) denization, as the book is adjudged in 14 H. 4. fol. 19. b. This word ligeance is well expressed by divers several names or synonyma which we find in our books. Sometimes it is called the obedience or obeysance of the subject to the king, obedientia regi, 9 E. 4. 7. b. 9 E. 4. 6. (e) 2 R. 3. 2. a. in the book of Entries, ejectionis firm' 7. 14 H. 8. cap. 2. 22 H. 8. cap. 8. &c. Sometimes he is called a natural liege man that is born under the power of the king, sub potestate regis, 4 H. 3. (f) tit. Dower. Vide the stat. of 11 E. 3. c. 2. Sometimes ligeance is called faith, fides, ad fidem regis, &c. Bracton, who wrote in the reign of H. 3. lib. 5. tractat' de exception', cap. 24. fol. 427. Est etiam alia exceptio que competit ex persona querentis, propter defectum nationis, ut si quis alieni-

The method that the reporter doth use.

What things did fall into consideration in this case.

The 1st general part, what ligeance is.

gena qui fuit ad fidem regis Franc', &c. And Fleta (which book was made in the reign of E. 1.) agreeth therewith; for l. 6. c. 47. de except' ex omiffione partis, it is said, vel dicere potuit, quod nihil iuris clamare poterit tanquam partis, eo quod est ad fidem regis Francie, quia alienigenae repelluntur in Angl' ab agendo, donec fuerint ad fidem reg' Angl'. Vide 25 E. 3. de natis ultra mare, faith and ligeance of the king of England; and Litt. lib. 2. cap. Homage, (a) saving the faith that I owe to our sovereign lord the king; and Glanv. l. 9. c. 1. salva fide debita dom' regi & heredibus suis. Sometimes ligeance is called ligealty, 22 Aff. pl. 25. By all which it evidently appeareth, that they that are born under the obedience, power, faith, ligealty, or ligeance of the king, are natural subjects, and no aliens. So, as seeing now it doth appear what ligeance is, it followeth in order, that we speak of the several kinds of ligeance. But herein we need to be very wary, for this caveat the law giveth, ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus; and certainly lex non distinguit, but where omnia membra dividenda are to be found out and proved by the law itself.

How many kinds of ligeance there be. 2. There is found in the law 4 kinds of ligeances; the first is, ligeantia naturalis, absoluta, pura & indefinita; and this originally is due by nature and birth-right, and is called alta ligeantia; and he that oweth this is called subditus natus. The second is called ligeantia acquisita, not by nature but by acquisition or denization, being called a denizen, or rather donazion, because he is subditus datus. The third is ligeantia localis, wrought by the law, and that is when an alien that is in amity cometh into England, because as long as he is within England he is within the king's protection; therefore so long as he is here, he oweth unto the king a local obedience or ligeance, for that the one (as it hath been said) draweth the other. The fourth is a legal obedience, or ligeance which is called legal, because the municipal laws of this realm have prescribed the order and form of it; and this to be done upon oath at the torn or leet.

Ligeantia naturalis. The first, that is, ligeance natural, &c. appeareth by the said acts of parliament, wherein the king is called natural liege lord, and his people natural liege subjects. This also doth appear in the indictments of treason (which of all other things are the most curiously and certainly indicted and penned) for in the indictment of the lord Dacre, in 26 H. 8. it is said, præd' dominus Dacre debitum fidei & ligeant' sue, quod præfato domino regi naturaliter & de jure impendere debuit, minime curans, &c. And Reginald Pool was indicted in 30 H. 8. for committing treason contra dom' regem supremum & naturalem dominum suum. And to this end were cited the indictment of Edward duke of Somerset in 5 E. 6. and many others both of ancient and later times. But in the indictment of treason of John Durbick in 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. it is said, quod præd' Johannes machinans, &c. prædicit' dominum Philippum & dominam Mariam supremos dominos suos, and omitted (naturales) because king Philip was not his natural liege lord. And of this point more shall be said when we speak of local obedience.

Ligeantia acquisita. The second is ligeant' acquisita, or denization; and Co. Lit. 129. a. this in the books and records of the law appeareth to be three-fold. 1. Absolute, as the common denizations be, to them and their heirs, without any limitation or restraint. 2. Limited, as when the king doth grant letters of denization to an alien, and to the heirs (b) males of his body, as it appeareth in 9 E. 4. fol. 7. 8. in Baggot's case; or to an alien for term of his life, as was granted to J. Reynel, in 11 H. 6. 3. It may be granted upon (c) condition, for (d) cujus est dare, ejus est disponere, whereof I have seen divers precedents. And this denization of an alien may be effected three manner of ways; by parliament, as it was in 3 H. 6. 55. in Dower; by letters patent, as the usual manner is; and by conquest, as if the king and his subjects should conquer another kingdom or dominion, as well antennati as postnati, as well they which fought in the field, as they which remained at home, for defence of their country, or employed elsewhere, are all denizens of the kingdom or dominion conquered. Of which point more shall be said hereafter.

Ligeantia localis. 3. Concerning the local obedience it is observable, that as there is a local protection on the king's part, so there is a (e) local ligeance of the subjects part. And this appeareth in 4 Mar. Br. 32. (f) & 3 & 4 Phil. & Mar. Dyer, 144. Sherley a Frenchman, being in amity with the king, came into England, and joined with divers subjects of this realm in treason against the king and queen, and the indictment concluded (g) contra ligeant' sue debitum; for he owed to the king a local obedience, that is, so long as he was within the king's protection; which local obedience being but momentary and uncertain, is yet strong enough to make a natural subject, for if he hath issue here, that issue is (h) a natural born subject; a fortiori, he that is born under the natural and absolute ligeance of the king (which, as it hath been said, is alta ligeantia) as the plaintiff in the case in question was, ought to be a natural born subject; for localis ligeantia est ligeantia infima & minima, & maxime incerta. And it is to be observed, that it is neq' celum, nec solum, neither the climate nor the soil, but ligeantia and obedientia that make the subject born; for if enemies should come into the realm, and possess a town or fort, and have issue there, that issue is no subject to the king of England, though he be born upon his soil, and under his meridian, for that he was not born under the ligeance of a subject, nor under the protection of the king. And concerning this local obedience, a precedent was cited in Hilar. 36 Eliz. when Stephano Ferrara de Ganno, and Emanuel Lewis Tineo, two Portuguese born, coming into England under queen Elizabeth's safe conduct, and living here under her protection, joined with doctor Lopez in treason within this realm against her majesty; and in this case two points were resolved by the judges. First, that their indictment ought to begin, that they intended treason contra dominum regnum, &c. omitting these words (naturalem dominum suum) and ought to conclude contra (i) ligeant' sue debitum. But if an (j) alien enemy come to invade this realm, and be taken in war, he cannot be indicted of treason; for the indictment cannot conclude contra ligeant' sue debitum, for he never was in the protection of the king, nor ever owed any manner of ligeance unto him, but malice and enmity, and therefore he shall be put to death by martial law. And so it was in anno 15 H. 7. (1) in Perkin Warbeck's case, who, being an alien born in Flanders, feigned himself to be one of the sons of Edward the fourth, and invaded this realm with great power, with an intent to take upon him the dignity royal: but being taken in the war, it was resolved by the justices, that he could not be punished by the common law, but before the constable and marshal (who had special commission under the great seal to hear and determine the same according to martial law) he had sentence to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, which was executed accordingly. And this appeareth in the book of Griffith attorney-general, by an extract out of the book of H. bart, attorney-general to king H. 7.

4. Now are we to speak of legal ligeance, which in our books, viz. 7 E. 2. tit. Avowry 211. 4 E. 3. fol. 42. 13 E. 3. tit. Avowry 120, &c. is called suit royal, because that the ligeance of the subject is only due unto the king. This oath of ligeance appeareth in Britton, who wrote in anno 5 E. 1. cap. 29. (and is yet commonly in use to this day in every leet) and in our books; the effect whereof is: 'You shall swear, that from this day forward, you shall be true and faithful to our sovereign lord king Jame, and his heirs, and truth and faith shall bear of life and member, and terrene honour, and you shall neither know nor hear of any ill or damage intended unto him, that you shall not defend. So help you Almighty God.' The substance and effect hereof is as hath been said due by the law of nature, ex institutione naturæ, as hereafter shall appear. The form and addition of the oath is, ex provisione hominis. In this oath of ligeance five things were observed. 1. That for the time it is indefinite, and without limit, 'from this day forward.' Secondly, two excellent qualities are required, that is, to be 'true and faithful.' 3. To whom, 'to our sovereign lord the king, and his heirs.' (and albeit Co. Lit. 68. b. Britton doth say, to the king of England, that is spoken prepter excellentiam, to design the person, and not to confine the ligeance; for a subject doth not swear his ligeance to the king, only as king of England, and not to him as king of Scotland, or of Ireland, &c. but generally to the king.) 4. In what manner; 'and faith and troth shall bear, &c. of life and member,' that is, until the letting out of the last drop of our dearest heart's blood. 5. Where and in what places ought these things to be done, in all places whatsoever; for, 'you shall neither know nor hear of any ill or damage, &c.' that you shall not defend, &c. so as natural ligeance is not circumscribed within any place. It is holden 12 H. 7. 18. b. that he, that is sworn in the leet, is sworn to the king for his ligeance, that is, to be true and faithful to the king; and if he be once sworn for his ligeance, he shall not be sworn again during his life. And all letters patent of denization be, that the patentee shall behave himself tantum verus & fidelis ligens domini regis. And this oath of ligeance at the torn and leet was first instituted by king Arthur; for so I read, inter leges sancti Edwardi regis ante Conquestum, 3 cap. 35. Et quod omnes principes & comites, proceres, milites & liberi homines debent jurare, &c. in Folkemote, & similiter omnes proceres regni, & milites & liberi homines universi totius regni Britann' facere debent in pleno Folkemote fidelitatem domino regi, &c. Hanc legem invenit Arthurus, qui quondam fuit in christum rex Britonum, &c. Hujus legis auctoritate expulsi Arthurus rex Saracenos et inimicos a regno, &c. b. 172. b. et hujus legis auctoritate Etheldredus rex uno et eodem die per universum regnum Danos occidit. Vide Lambert inter leges regis Edwardi, &c. fol. 135 & 136. By this it appeareth, when and from whom this legal ligeance had his first institution within this realm. Ligeantia in the case in question is meant and intended of the first kind of ligeance, that is, of ligeance natural, absolute, &c. due by nature and birth-right. But if the plaintiff's father be made a denizen, and purchase lands in England to him and his heirs, and die seised, this land shall never descend to the plaintiff; for that the king by his letters patent may make a denizen, but cannot naturalize him to all purposes, as an act of parliament may do; neither can letters patent make any inheritable in this case, that by the common law cannot inherit. And herewith agreeth 36 H. 6. tit. Denizen, Br. 9.

Homage in our book is two-fold, that is to say, homagium ligeum, and that is as much as ligeance, of which Bracton speaketh, l. 2. c. 35. f. 79. Soli regi debet fide dominio seu servitio, and there is homagium feudale, which hath his original by tenure. In Fit. Nat. Brev. 269. there is a writ for respiting of this later homage, which is due ratione feodi seu tenuræ: sciatis quod respectuamus homagium nobis de terr' et tenementis quæ tenentur de nobis in capite debit'. But homagium ligeum, i. ligeantia, is inherent and inseparable, and cannot be respited.

3. Now are we come to (and almost past) the consideration of this circumstance, where natural ligeance should be due: for by that which hath been said, it appeareth, that ligeance, and faith and truth, which are her members and parts, are qualities of the mind and soul of man, and cannot be circumscribed within the predicament of ubi; for that were to confound predicaments, and to go about to drive (an absurd and impossible thing) the predicament of quality into the predicament of ubi. Non respondetur ad hanc questionem, ubi est? To say, verus et fidelis subditus est; sed ad hanc questionem, qualis est? Recte & apte respondetur, verus & fidelis ligens, &c. est. But yet for the greater illustration of the matter, the point was handled by itself, and that ligeance of the subject was of as great an extent and latitude, as the royal power and protection of the king, et converso. It appeareth by the stat. of 11 H. 7. cap. 1. and 2 E. 6. cap. 2. that the subjects of England are bound by their ligeance to go with the king, &c. in his wars, as well within the realm, &c. as without. And therefore we daily see, that when either Ireland, or any other of his majesty's dominions, be infected with invasion or insurrection, the king of England sendeth his subjects out of England, and his subjects out of Scotland also into Ireland, for the withstanding or suppressing of the same, to the end his rebels may feel the swords of either nation. And so may his subjects of Guernsey, Jersey, Isle of Man, &c. be commanded to make their swords good against either rebel or enemy, as occasion shall be offered. Whereas if natural ligeance of the subjects of England should be local, that is, confined within the realm of England or Scotland, &c. then were not they bound to go out of the continent of the realm of England or Scotland, &c. And the opinion of Thirninge in 7 H. 4. tit. Protect. 100. is thus to be understood, that an English subject is not compellable to go out of the realm without wages, according to the statutes of 1 E. 3. c. 7. 18 E. 3. c. 8. 18 H. 6. c. 19. &c. 7 H. 7. c. 1. 3 H. 8. c. 5. &c. In ann. 25 E. 1. Bigot earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and earl marshal of England, and Bohun earl of Hereford and high constable of England, did exhibit a petition to the king in French (which I have seen anciently recorded) on the behalf of the commons of England, concerning how and in what sort they were to be employed in his majesty's wars out of the realm of England; and the record saith, that, post multas & varias altercationes, it was resolved, they ought to go but in such manner and form as after was declared by the said statutes, which seem to be but declarative of the common law. And this doth plentifully and manifestly appear in our books, being truly and rightly understood. In

3 H. 6. tit. Protection 2. one had the benefit of a protection, for that he was sent into the king's wars in comitiva of the protector; and it appeareth by the record, and by the chronicles also, that this employment was into France; the greatest part thereof then being under the king's actual obedience, so as the subjects of England were employed into France for the defence and safety thereof: in which case it was observed, that seeing the protector, who was prorex, went, the same was adjudged a voyage royal. 8 H. 6. fol. 16. b. the lord Talbot went with a company of Englishmen into France, then also being for the greatest part under the actual obedience of the king, who had the benefit of their protections allowed unto them. And here were observed the words of the writ in the Register, fol. 88. where it appeareth that men were employed in the king's wars out of the realm per preceptum nostrum, and the usual words of the writ of protection be in obsequio nostro. * 32 H. 6. fol. 4. a. it appeareth, that Englishmen were pressed into Guyenne, † 44 E. 3. 12. a. into Gascoyne with the duke of Lancaster, 17 H. 6. tit. Protection, into Gascoyne with the earl of Huntington, steward of Guienne, 11 and 12 H. 4. 7. a. into (a) Ireland, and out of this realm with the duke of Gloucester and the lord Knolles: vide (b) 19 H. 6. 35. b. And it appeareth in 19 Ed. 2. tit. Avowry 224. 26 Ass. 66. 7 H. 4. 19. &c. that there was forinsecum servitium, foreign service, which Bracton, fol. 36. calleth regale servitium; and in Fitz. N. B. 28. that the king may send men to serve him in his wars beyond the sea. But thus much (if it be not in so plain a case too much) shall suffice for this point for the king's power, to command the service of his subjects in his wars out of the realm, whereupon it was concluded, that the ligeance of a natural-born subject was not local, and confined only to England. Now let us see what the law saith in time of peace, concerning the king's protection and power of command, as well without the realm, as within, that his subjects in all places may be protected from violence, and that justice may equally be administered to all his subjects.

And certainly this was, when Lyons in France (bordering upon Burgundy, an ancient friend to England) was under the actual obedience of king H. 6. For the king commanded fidelibus suis, his faithful magistrates there, that if any injury were there done, it should be by them reformed and redressed, and that they should protect the party in his person and goods in peace. In the Register, fol. 26. two other writs. Rex omnibus seneschallis, majoribus, juratis, paribus prepositis, ballivis et fidelibus suis in ducatu Aquitanie ad quos, &c. salutem. Quia dilecti nobis T. et A. cives civitatis Burdegal' coram nobis in cancellar' nostr' Angli' et Aquitan' jura sua prosequentes, et metuentes ex verisimilibus conjecturis per quosdam sibi comminantes tam in corpore quam in rebus suis, sibi posse grave damnum inferri, supplicaverunt nobis sibi de protectione regia providere: nos volentes dictos T. et A. ab oppressionibus indebitis preservare, suscepimus ipsos T. et A. res ac justas possessiones et bona sua quaecunque in protectionem et salvam gardiam nostram specialem. Et vobis et cuilibet vestrum injungimus et mandamus, quod ipsos T. et A. familias, res ac bona sua quaecunque a violentiis et gravaminibus indebitis defendatis, et ipsos in justis possessionibus suis manuteneatis. Et si quid in prejudicium hujus protectionis et salvæ gardiæ nostræ attentatum inveneritis, ad statum debitum reducat. In cujus, &c. dat' in palatio nostro Westm' sub magni sigilli testimonio, sexto die Augusti anno 44 E. 3.—Rex universis et singulis seneschallis, constabularis, castellanis, prepositis, ministris, et omnibus ballivis et fidelibus suis in dominio nostro Aquitan' constitutis ad quos, &c. salutem. Volentes G. et R. uxorem ejus favore prosequi gratiose, ipsos G. et R. homines et familias suas ac justas possessiones, et bona sua quaecunque, suscepimus in protectionem et defensionem nostram, necnon in salvam gardiam nostram specialem. In cujus, &c. per unum annum duratur. T. &c. By all which it is manifest, that the protection and government of the king is general over all his dominions and kingdoms, as well in time of peace by justice, as in time of war by the sword, and that all be at his command, and under his obedience. Now seeing power and protection draweth ligeance, it followeth, that seeing the king's power command and protection extendeth out of England, that ligeance cannot be local, or confined within the bounds thereof. He that is abjured the realm, qui abjurat regnum amittit regnum, sed non regem, amittit patriam, sed non patrem

Cawly 139. patriæ: for notwithstanding the abjuration, he oweth the king his ligeance, and he remaineth within the king's protection; for the king may pardon and restore him to his country again. So seeing that ligeance is a quality of the mind, and not confined within any place; it followeth, that the plea, that doth confine the ligeance of the plaintiff to the kingdom of Scotland; infra ligeantiam regis regni sui Scotiæ, & extra ligeantiam regis regni sui Angliæ, whereby the defendants do make one local ligeance for the natural subjects of England, and another local ligeance for the natural subjects of Scotland, is utterly insufficient, and against the nature and quality of natural ligeance, as often it hath been said.

And Coke, chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, cited a ruled case out of Hingham's reports, tempore E. 3. which in his argument he shewed in court written in parchment, in an ancient hand of that time. Constance de N. brought a writ of avel against Roger de Cobledike, and others, named in the writ, and counted that from the seisin of Roger her grandfather it descended to Gilbert his son, and from Gilbert to Constance, as daughter and heir. Sutton dit, sir, el ne doit este responde, pur ceo que el est Francois & nient de la ligeance ne a la foy Denglitterre, & demand judgement si el doit action aver: that is, she is not to be answered, for that she is a French woman, and not of the ligeance, nor of the faith of England, and demanded judgment, if she this action ought to have. Bereford (then chief justice of the court of Common Pleas) by the rule of the court disalloweth the plea, for that it was too short, in that it referred ligeance and faith to England, and not to the king. And thereupon Sutton saith as followeth; sir, nous voilons averre, que el ne est my de la ligeance Denglitterre, ne a la foy le roy, et demand judgement, et si vous agardes que el doit este responde, nous dirromus assens: that is, sir, we will aver, that she is not of the ligeance of England, nor of the faith of the king, and demand judgment, &c. Which latter words of the plea (nor of the faith of the king) referred faith to the king indefinitely and generally, and restrained not the same to England, and thereupon the plea was allowed for good, according to the rule of the court: for the book saith, that afterward the plaintiff desired leave to depart from her writ. The rule of that case of Cobledike, did (as Coke chief justice said) over-rule this case of Calvin, in the very point now in question; for that the plea in this case doth not refer faith or ligeance to the king indefinitely and generally, but limiteth and restraineth faith and ligeance to the kingdom, extra ligeantiam regis regni sui Angliæ, out of the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of England: which afterwards the lord chancellor and the chief justice of the King's Bench, having copies of the said ancient report, affirmed in their arguments. So as this point was thus concluded, quod ligeantia naturalis nullis claustris coarctatur, nullis metis refranatur, nullis finibus premitur.

4 & 5. By that which hath been said it appeareth, that this ligeance is due only to the king; so as therein the question is not now, cui, sed quomodo debetur. It is true, that the king hath two capacities in him: one a natural body, being descended of the blood royal of the realm; and this body is of the creation of Almighty God, and is subject to death, infirmity, and such like: the other is a politick body or capacity, so called, because it is framed by the policy of man (and in 21 E. 4. 39. b. is called a mystical body;) and in this capacity the king is esteemed to be immortal, invincible, not subject to death, infirmity, infancy, (a) nonage, &c. Pl. Com. in the case of the lord Barkley 238. and in the case of the Duchy 213. 6 E. 3. 291. and 26 Aff. pl. 54. Now seeing the king hath but one person, and several capacities, and one politick capacity for the realm of England, and another for the realm of Scotland, it is necessary to be considered, to which capacity ligeance is due: And it was resolved, that it was due to the natural person of the king (which is ever accompanied with the politick capacity, and the politick capacity as it were appropriated to the natural capacity) and it is not due to the politick capacity only, that is, to his crown or kingdom distinct from his natural capacity, and that for divers reasons. First, every subject (as it hath been affirmed by those that argued against the plaintiff) is presumed by law to be sworn to the king, which is to his natural person, and likewise the king is sworn to his subjects, (as it appeareth in Bracton, lib. 3. de actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107.) which oath he taketh in his natural person: for the politick capacity is invincible and immortal; nay, the politick body hath no soul, for it is framed by the policy of man. 2. In all indictments of treason, when any do intend or compass mortem & destructionem domini regis (which must needs be understood of his natural body, for his politick body is immortal, and not subject to death) the indictment concludeth, contra (b) ligeantiam suam debitum; ergo, the ligeance is due to the natural body. Vide Fit. Justice of Peace 53. and Pl. Com. 384. in the earl of Leicester's case. 3. It is true, that the king in genere dieth not, but, no question, in individuo he dieth: as for example, H. 8. E. 6. &c. and queen Eliz. died, otherwise you should have many kings at once. In 2 and 3 Pb. and Mar. Dyer 128. (c) one Constable dispersed divers bills in the streets in the night, in which it was written, that king E. 6. was alive and in France, &c. and in Coleman-street, in London, he pointed to a young man, and said that he was king Edward the sixth. And this being spoken de individuo (and accompanied with other circumstances) was resolved to be high treason; for the which Constable was attainted and executed. 4. A (d) body politick (being invincible) can as a body politick neither make or take homage: Vide 33 H. 8. tit. Fealty, Brook 15. 5. In fide, in faith or ligeance, nothing ought to be feigned, but ought to be ex fide non ficta. 6. The king holdeth the kingdom of England by birth-right inherent, by descent from the blood royal, whereupon succession doth attend; and therefore it is usually said, to the king, his heirs, and successors, wherein heirs is first named, and successors is attendant upon heirs. And yet in our ancient books succession and successor are taken for hereditance and heirs. Bract. lib. 2. de acquirendo rerum dominio, c. 29. Et sciend' est, quod hereditas est successio in universum jus quod defunctus antecessor habuit, ex causa quacunque acquisitionis vel successionis, & alibi affinitatis jure nulla successio permittitur. But the title is by descent. By queen Elizabeth's death the crown and kingdom of England descended to his majesty, and he was fully and absolutely thereby king, without any essential ceremony or act to be done ex post facto: for coronation is but a royal ornament and solemnization of the royal descent, but no part of the title. In the first year of his majesty's reign, before his majesty's coronation, Watson (e) and Clarke, seminary priests, and others, were of opinion, that his majesty was no complete and absolute king before his coronation, but that coronation did add a confirmation and perfection to the descent; and therefore (observe their damnable and damned consequent) that they by strength and power might before his coronation take him and his royal issue into their possession, keep him prisoner in the Tower, remove such counsellors and great officers as pleased them, and constitute others in their places, &c. and that these and other acts of like nature could not be treason against his majesty, before he were a crowned king. But it was clearly resolved by all the judges of England, that presently by the descent his majesty was completely and absolutely king, without any essential ceremony or act to be done ex post facto; and that (f) coronation was but a royal ornament, and outward solemnization of the descent. And this appeareth evidently by infinite precedents and book-cases; as (taking one example in a case so clear for all) king Henry VI. was not crowned until the eighth year of his reign, and yet divers men before his coronation were attainted of treason, of felony, &c. and he was as absolute and complete a king, both for matters of judicature, as for grants, &c. before his coronation, as he was after, as it appeareth in the Reports of the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 years of the same king. And the like might be produced for many other kings of this realm, which for brevity in a case so clear I omit. By which it manifestly appeareth, that by the laws of England there can be no ^{*}interregnum within the same. If the king be seised of land by a defeasible title, and dieth seised, this descent shall toll the entry of him that right hath, as it appeareth by 9 (g) E. 4. 51. But if the next king had it by succession, that should take away no entry, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 97. If a disseisor of an infant convey the land to the king who dieth seised, this descent taketh away the entry of the infant, as it is said in 34 H. 6. fol. 34. (h) 45. lib. Aff. pl. 6. Plow. Com. 234. where the case was; king H. 3. gave a manor to his brother the earl of Cornwall in tail (at what time the same was a fee-simple conditional) king H. 3. died, the earl before the statute of donis conditional (having no issue) by deed exchanged the manor with warranty for other lands in fee, and died without issue, and the warranty and assets descended upon his nephew king Edward I. and it was adjudged, that this warranty and assets, which descended upon the natural person of the king, barred him of the possibility of reverter. In the reign of Ed. 2. the Spencers, the father and the son, to cover the treason hatched in their hearts, invented this damnable and damned opinion, that homage and oath of ligeance was more by reason of the king's crown (that is, of his politic capacity) than by reason of the person of the king, upon which opinion they inferred execrable and detestable consequences. 1. If the king do not demean himself by reason in the right of his crown, his lieges be bound by oath to remove the king. 2. Seeing that the king could not be reformed by suit of law, that ought to be done by the sword. 3. That his lieges be bound to govern in aid of him, and in default of him. All which were condemned by two parliaments; one in the reign of Ed. 2. called Exilium Hugonis le Spencer, and the other in ann. 1. Ed. 3. c. 1. Bracton, lib. 2. de acquirendo rerum dominio, c. 24. f. 55. faith thus, est enim corona regis facere justitiam & judicium, & tenere pacem, & sine quibus corona consistere non potest nec tenere. Hujusmodi autem jura sive jurisdictiones ad personas vel tenementa transferri non poterunt, nec a privata persona possideri, nec usus nec executio juris, nisi hoc datum fuit ei desuper, sicut jurisdictio delegata delegari non poterit quin ordinaria remaneat cum ipso rege. Et lib. 3. de actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107. separare autem debet rex, cum sit Dei vicarius in terra, jus ab injuria, equum ab iniquo, ut omnes sibi subiecti honeste vivant, & quod nullus alium laedat, & quod unicuique quod suum fuerit recta contributione reddatur. In respect whereof one faith, that corona est quasi cor ornans, cujus ornamenta sunt misericordia & justitia. And therefore a king's crown is an hieroglyphic of the laws, where justice, &c. is administered; for so faith P. Val. l. 41. p. 400. coronam dicimus legis judicium esse, propterea quod certis est vinculis complicata, quibus vita nostra veluti religata coercetur. Therefore if you take that which is signified by the crown, that is, to do justice and judgment, to maintain the peace of the land, &c. to separate right from wrong, and the good from the ill; that is to be understood of that capacity of the king, that in rei veritate hath capacity, and is adorned and endued with endowments as well of the soul, as of the body, and thereby able to do justice and judgment according to right and equity, and to maintain the peace, &c. and to find out and discern the truth, and not of the invincible and immortal capacity that hath no such endowments; for of itself it hath neither soul nor body. And where divers books and acts of parliament speak of the ligeance of England, as 31 E. 3. tit. Cosinage 5. 42 Ed. 3. 2. 13 E. 3. tit. Brief 677. 25 Ed. 3. stat. de natis ultra mare; all these and other speaking briefly in a vulgar manner (for (i) loquendum ut vulgus) and not pleading (for sentendum ut docti) are to be understood of the ligeance due by the people of England to the king; for no man will affirm, that England itself, taking it for the continent thereof, doth owe any ligeance or faith, or that any faith or ligeance should be due to it: but it manifestly appeareth, that the ligeance or faith of the subject is proprium quarto modo to the king, omni, soli, & semper. And oftentimes in the reports of our book-cases, and in acts of parliament also, the crown or kingdom is taken for the king himself, as in Fitzb. Natur. Brev. fol. 5. Tenure in capite is a tenure of the crown, and is a feignory in grofs, that is of the person of the king: and so is 30 H. 8. Dyer fol. 44. 45. a tenure in chief, as of the crown, is merely a tenure of the person of the king, and therewith agreeth 28 H. 8. tit. Tenure Br. 65. The statute of 4 H. 5. cap. ultimo, gave priors aliens, which were conventual to the king and his heirs, by which gift faith 34 H. 6. 34. the same were annexed to the crown. And in the said act of 25 Ed. 3. whereas it is said in the beginning, within the ligeance of England, it is twice afterward said in the same act, within the ligeance of the king, and yet all one ligeance due to the king. So in 42 Ed. 3. fol. 2. where it is first said, the ligeance of England, it is afterwards in the same case called, the ligeance of the king; wherein though they used several manner and phrases of speech, yet they intended one and the same ligeance. So in our usual commission of assize, of gaol-delivery, ofoyer and terminer, of the peace, &c. power is given to execute justice, secundum legem & consuetudinem regni nostri Angliæ; and yet Littleton, lib. 2. in his chapter of Vilainage, fol. 43. in disabling of a man that is attainted in a premunire faith, that the same is the king's law; and so doth the Register in the writ of ad jura regia style the same.

Cobledike's case, temp. E. 3. reported by Hingham. Ellesmere's Postnati 91.

Note.

To whom and how ligeance is due.

The reasons and causes, wherefore by the policy of the law the king is a body politic, are three, viz. 1. causa majestatis, 2. causa necessitatis, and 3. causa utilitatis. First, causa majestatis, the king cannot give or take but by matter of record for the dignity of his person. Secondly, causa necessitatis, as to avoid the (k) attainder of him that hath right to the crown, as it appeareth in 1 H. 7. 4. left in the interim there should be an (l) interregnum, which the law will not suffer. Also by force of this politic capacity, though the (m) king be within age, yet may he make leases and other grants, and the same shall bind him; otherwise his revenue should decay, and the king should not be able to reward service, &c. Lastly, causa utilitatis, as when lands and possessions descend from his collateral ancestors, being subjects, as from the earl of March, &c. to the king, now is the king seised of the same in jure corona, in his politic capacity; for which cause the same shall go with the crown; and therefore, albeit queen Elizabeth was of the half-blood to queen Mary, yet she in her body politic enjoyed all those fee-simple lands, as by the law she ought, and no collateral cousin of the whole blood to queen Mary ought to have the same. And these are the causes wherefore by the policy of the law the king is made a body politic: so as for these special purposes the law makes him a body politic, immortal and invincible, whereunto our ligeance cannot appertain. But to conclude this point, our ligeance is to our natural liege sovereign, descended of the blood royal of the kings of this realm. And thus much of the first general part de ligeantia.

Now followeth the second part, de legibus, wherein these parts were considered: first, that the ligeance or faith of the subject is due unto the king by the law of nature: secondly, that the law of nature is part of the law of England: thirdly, that the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law: fourthly, that the law of nature is immutable.

The law of nature is that which God at the time of creation of the nature of man infused into his heart, for his preservation and direction; and this is lex aeterna, the moral law, called also the law of nature. And by this law, written with the finger of God in the heart of man, were the people of God a long time governed, before the law was written by Moses, who was the first reporter or writer of law in the world. The apostle in the second chapter to the Romans saith, cum enim gentes, quæ legem non habent, naturaliter ea quæ legis sunt faciunt.

And this is within that command of the moral law, honora patrem, which doubtless doth extend to him that is pater patriæ. And the apostle saith, omnis anima potestatibus sublimioribus subdita sit. And these be the words of the great divine, hoc Deus in sacris scripturis jubet, hoc lex naturæ dicat, ut quilibet subditus obediat superiori. And Aristotle, nature's secretary, lib. 5. Ethic. saith, that jus naturale est, quod apud omnes homines eandem habet potentiam. And herewith doth agree Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5. and Fortescue, cap. 8, 12, 13, and 16. Doctor and Student, cap. 2, and 4. And the reason hereof is, for that God and nature is one to all, and therefore the law of God and nature is one to all.

By this law of nature is the faith, ligeance, and obedience of the subject due to his sovereign or superior. And Aristotle

1 Politicorum proveth, that to command and to obey is of nature, and that magistracy is of nature: for whatsoever is necessary and profitable for the preservation of the society of man is due by the law of nature; but magistracy and government are necessary and profitable for the preservation of the society of man; therefore magistracy and government are of nature. And herewith accordeth Tully, lib. 3. de legibus, sine imperio nec domus ulla, nec civitas, nec gens, nec hominum universum genus stare, nec ipse denique mundus potest. This law of nature, which indeed is the eternal law of the Creator, infused into the heart of the creature at the time of his creation, was two thousand years before any laws written, and before any judicial or municipal laws. And certain it is, that before judicial or municipal laws were made, kings did decide causes according to natural equity, and were not tied to any rule or formality of law, but did dare jura. And this appeareth by Fortescue, cap. 12 and 13. and by Virgil that philosophical poet, 7 Æneid.

*Hoc Priami gestamen erat, cum jura vocatis

And 5th Æneid.

—Gaudet regno Trojani Acestes,
Inducitque forum & patribus dat jura vocatis.

And Pomponius, lib. 2. cap. de origine juris, affirmeth, that in Tarquinius Superbus's time there was no civil law written, and that Papirius reduced certain observations into writing, which was called Jus Civile Papirianum. Now the reason wherefore laws were made and published, appeareth in Fortescue, cap. 13. and in Tully, lib. 2. Officiorum: at cum jus æquabile ab uno viro homines non consequerentur, inventi sunt leges. Now it appeareth by demonstrative reason, that ligeance, faith, and obedience of the subject to the sovereign, was before any municipal or judicial laws. 1. For that government and subjection were long before any municipal or judicial laws. 2. For that it had been in vain to have prescribed laws to any, but to such as owed obedience, faith, and ligeance before, in respect whereof they were bound to obey and observe them: frustra enim feruntur leges nisi subditis & obedientibus. Seeing then that faith, obedience, and ligeance, are due by the law of nature, it followeth that the same cannot be changed or taken away; for albeit judicial or municipal laws have inflicted and imposed in several places, or at several times, divers and several punishments and penalties, for breach or not observance of the law of nature, (for that law only consisted in commanding or prohibiting, without any certain punishment or penalty) yet the very law of nature itself, never was nor could be (a) altered or changed. And therefore it is certainly true, that (b) jura naturalia sunt immutabilia. And herewith agreeth Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5. and Doctor and Student, cap. 5 and 6. And this appeareth plainly and plentifully in our books.

If a man hath a ward by reason of a feignory, and is outlawed, he forfeiteth the wardship to the king: but if a man hath the wardship of his own son or daughter, which is his heir apparent, and is outlawed, he doth not (c) forfeit this wardship; for nature hath annexed it to the person of the father, as it appeareth in 33 H. 6. 55. b. Et bonus rex nihil a bono patre differt; & patria dicitur a patre, quia habet communem patrem, qui est pater patriæ. In the same manner, maris & femina conjunctio est de jure naturæ, as Bracton in the same book and chapter, and St. Germin in his book of the Doctor and Student, cap. 5. do hold. Now if he, that is attainted of treason or felony, be slain by one that hath no authority, or executed by him that hath authority, but pursueth not his warrant, in this case his eldest son can have no appeal, for he must bring his appeal as heir, which being ex provisione b. minis, he loseth it by the attainder of his father; but his (d) wife (if any he have) shall have an appeal, because she is to have her appeal as wife, which she remaineth notwithstanding the attainder, because maris & femina conjunctio est de jure naturæ, and therefore (it being to be intended of true and right matrimony) is indissoluble; and this is proved by the book in 33 H. 6. 57. So if there be mother and daughter, and the daughter is attainted of felony, now cannot she be heir to her mother for the cause aforesaid; yet after her attainder, if she kill her mother, this is parricide and petit treason; for yet she remaineth her daughter, for that is of nature; and herewith agreeth 21 E. 3. 17. b. If a man be attainted of felony or treason, he hath lost the king's legal protection, for he is thereby utterly disabled to sue any action real or personal (which is a greater disability than an alien in league hath) and yet such a person so attainted hath not lost that protection which by the law of nature is given to the king, for that is indelebilis & immutabilis, and therefore the king may protect and pardon him, and if any man kill him without warrant, he shall be punished by the law as a manslayer, and thereunto accordeth 4 Ed. 4. and 35 H. 6. 57. 2 Aff. pl. 3. By the statute of 25 Ed. 3. cap. 22. a man attainted in a præmunire, is by express words out of the king's protection generally; and yet this extendeth only to legal protection, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 43. for the parliament could not take away that protection which the law of nature giveth unto him; and therefore notwithstanding that statute, the king may protect and pardon him. And though by that statute it was farther enacted, that it should be done with him as with an enemy, by which words any man might have slain such a person (as it is holden in 24 H. 8. tit. Coron. Br. 197.) until the statute made anno 5 Eliz. cap. 1. yet the king might protect and pardon him. A man outlawed is out of the benefit of the municipal law; for so saith Fitz N. B. 161. a. ut legatus est quasi extra legem positus; and Bract. l. 3. tract. 2. c. 11. saith, that caput gerit lupinum; yet is he not out either of his natural ligeance, or of the king's natural protection; for neither of them is tied to municipal laws, but is due by the law of nature, which (as hath been said) was long before any judicial or municipal laws. And therefore if a man were outlawed for felony, yet was he within the king's natural protection, for no man but the sheriff could execute him, as it is adjudged in 2 lib. Aff. pl. 3. Every subject is by his natural ligeance bound to obey and serve his sovereign, &c. It is enacted by the parliament of 23 H. 6. that no man should serve the king as sheriff of any county above one year, and that, notwithstanding any clause of non obstante to the contrary, that is to say, notwithstanding that the king should expressly dispense with the said statute. Howbeit it is agreed in 2 H. 7. that against the express purview of that act, the king may by a special non obstante dispense with that act, for that the act could not bar the king of the service of his subject, which the law of nature did give unto him. By these and many other cases that might be cited out of our books, it appeareth, how plentiful the authorities of our laws be in this matter. (dd) Wherefore to conclude this point (and to exclude all that hath been or could be objected against it) if the obedience and ligeance of the subject to his sovereign be due by the law of nature, if that law be parcel of the laws, as well of England as of all other nations, and is immutable, and that postnati * and we of England are united by birth-right in obedience and ligeance (which is the true cause of natural subjection) by the law of nature; it followeth, that Calvin the plaintiff being born under one ligeance to one king, cannot be an alien born. And there is great reason, that the law of nature should direct this case, wherein five natural operations are remarkable: first, the king hath the crown of England by birth-right, being naturally procreated of the blood royal of this realm: secondly, Calvin the plaintiff naturalized by procreation and birth-right, since the descent of the crown of England: thirdly, ligeance and obedience of the subject to the sovereign, due by the law of nature: fourthly, protection and government due by the law of nature: fifthly, this case, in the opinion of divers, was more doubtful in the beginning, but the further it proceeded, the clearer and stronger it grew; and therefore the doubt grew from some violent passion, and not from any reason grounded upon the law of nature, quia quanto magis violentus motus (qui fit contra naturam) appropinquat ad suum finem, tanto debiliores & tardiores sunt ejus motus; sed naturalis motus, quanto magis appropinquat ad suum finem, tanto fortiores & velociores sunt ejus motus. Hereby it appeareth how weak the objection grounded upon the rule of (e) quando duo jura concurrunt in una persona, &c. is: for that rule holdeth not in personal things, that is, when two persons are necessarily and inevitably required by law, as in the case of an alien born there is; and therefore no man will say, that now the king of England can make war or league with the king of Scotland, & sic de cæteris: and so in case of an alien born, you must of necessity have two several ligeances to two several persons. And to conclude this point concerning laws, non adversatur diversitas regnor' sed regnati; non patriarum, sed patrum patriar'; non coronarum, sed coronatorum; non legum municipalium, sed regum majestatum. And therefore thus were directly and clearly answered as well the objections drawn from the severalty of the kingdoms, seeing there is but one head of both, and the postnati and us joined in ligeance to that one head, which is copula & tanquam oculus of this case; as also the distinction of the laws, seeing that ligeance of the subjects of both kingdoms, is due to their sovereign by one law, and that is the law of nature.

For the third, it is first to be understood, that as the law hath wrought four unions, so the law doth still make four separations. The first union is of both kingdoms under one natural liege sovereign king, and so acknowledged by the act of parliament of recognition. The 2d is an union of ligeance and obedience of the subjects of both kingdoms, due by the law of nature to their sovereign: and this union doth suffice to rule and over-rule the case in question; and this in substance is but a uniting of the hearts of the subjects of both kingdoms one to another, under one head and sovereign. The 3d union is an union of protection of both kingdoms, equally belonging to the subjects of either of them: and therefore the two first arguments or objections drawn from two supposed several ligeances were fallacious, for they did disjungere conjungenda. The 4th union and conjunction is of the three lions of England and that one of Scotland, united and quartered in one escutcheon.

Concerning the separations yet remaining: 1st, England and Scotland remain several and distinct kingdoms. 2. They are governed by several judicial or municipal laws. 3. They have several distinct and separate parliaments. 4. Each kingdom hath several nobilities; for albeit a postnatus in Scotland, or any of his posterity, be the heir of a nobleman of Scotland, and by his birth is legitimated in England, yet he is none of the (a) peers or nobility of England; for his natural ligeance and obedience, due by the law of nature, maketh him a subject and no alien within England: but that subjection maketh him not noble within England, for that nobility had his original by the king's creation, and not of nature. And this is manifested by express authorities, grounded upon excellent reasons in our books. If a baron, viscount, earl, marquis, or duke of England, bring any action real or personal, and the defendant pleadeth in abatement of the writ, that he is no baron, viscount, earl, &c. and thereupon the demandant or plaintiff taketh issue; this issue shall not be tried by jury, but by the (b) record of parliament, whether he or his ancestor, whose heir he is, were called to serve there as a peer, and one of the nobility of the realm. And so are our books adjudged in 22 Aff. 24. 48 Edw. 3. 30. 35 H. 6. 40. 20. Eliz. Dyer 360. Vide in the sixth part of my reports, in the countess of Rutland's case. So as the man, that is not de jure a peer, or one of the nobility, to serve in the upper house of the parliament of England, is not in the legal proceedings of law accounted noble within England. And therefore if a countess of France or Spain, or any other foreign kingdom, should come into England, he should not here sue, or be sued by the name of countess, &c. for that he is none of the nobles that are members of the upper house of the parliament of England; and herewith agree the book-cales of (c) 20 Ed. 4. 6. a. b. and 11 Ed. 3. tit. Bre. 473. like law it is, and for the same reason, of an earl or baron of Ireland, he is not any peer, or of the nobility of this realm: and herewith agreeth the book in 8 R. 2. tit. (d) Proce. pl. ultim. where in an action of debt process of outlawry was awarded against the earl of Ormond in Ireland; which ought not to have been, if he had been noble here. Vide Dyer (e) 20 Eliz. 360.

But yet there is a diversity in our books worthy of observation, for the highest and lowest dignities are universal; for if a king of a foreign nation come into England, by the leave of the king of this realm (as it ought to be) in this case he shall sue and be sued by the name of a king; and herewith agreeth 11 E. 3. tit. Br. (f) 473. where the case was, that Alice, which was the wife of R. de O. brought a writ of dower against John earl of Richmond, and the writ was præcip. Johann. comiti Richmondie custodi terræ & hæredis of William the son of R. de O. the tenant pleaded that he is duke of Britain, not named duke, judgment of the writ? But it is ruled, that the writ was good, for that the dukedom of Britain was not within the realm of England. But there it is said, that if a man bring a writ against Edward (g) Baliol, and name him not king of Scotland, the writ shall abate for the cause aforesaid. And hereof there is a notable precedent in Fleta, lib. 2. cap. 3. § 9. where treating of the jurisdiction of the king's court of Marshalsea it is said, et hæc omnia ex officio suo licite facere poterit (scilicet seneschallus aut hospitii regis) non obstante alicujus libertate, etiam in alieno regno, dum tamen reus in hospitio regis poterit inveniri; secundum quod contingit Paris. anno 14 Ed. 1. de Engelramo de Nogent capto in hospitio regis Angli (ipso rege tunc apud Parisiam existente) cum discis argenti furatis recenter super facto, rege Franc' tunc presente; & unde licet curia regis Franc' de præd' latrone per castellum Paris. petita fuerit, habitis hinc & inde tractatibus in consilio regis Franc', tandem consideratum fuit, quod rex Angli illa regia prærogativa, & hospitii sui privilegio uteretur, & gauderet; qui, coram Roberto Fitz-John milite tunc hospitii regis Angli seneschallo de latrocinio convictus, per considerationem ejus cur' fuit (h) suspensus in patibulo sancti Germani de prætis. Which proveth, that though the king be in a foreign kingdom, yet he is judged in law a king there. The other part of the said diversity is proved by the book-case in 20 (i) E. 4. fol. 6. a. b. where in a writ of debt brought by sir J. Douglas, knight, against Elizabeth Molford, the defendant demanded judgment of the writ, for that the plaintiff was an earl of Scotland, but not of England; and that our sovereign lord the king had granted unto him safe conduct, not named by his name of dignity, judgment of the writ, &c. And there justice Littleton giveth the rule. The plaintiff (saith he) is an earl in Scotland, but not in England; and if our sovereign lord the king grant to a duke of France a safe conduct to merchandize, and enter into his realm, if the duke cometh and bringeth merchandize into this land, and is to sue an action here, he ought not to name himself duke, for he is not a duke in this land, but only in France. And these be the very words of that book-case; out of which I collect three things. First, that the plaintiff was named by the name of a knight, wherefore he received that degree of dignity. Vide (k) 7 H. 6. 14 b. accord. 2. That an earl of another kingdom or nation is no earl (to be so named in legal proceedings) within this realm: and herewith agreeth the book of (l) 11 Ed. 3. the earl of Richmond's case before recited. 3. That albeit the king by his letters patent of safe conduct do name him duke, yet that appellation maketh him no duke, to sue or to be sued by that name within England: so as the law in these points (apparent in our books) being observed, and rightly understood, it appeareth how causeless their fear was, that the adjudging of the plaintiff to be no alien should make a confusion of the nobilities of either kingdom.

Now are we in order come to the fourth noun (which is the fourth general part) alienigena; wherein six things did fall into consideration. 1. Who was alienigena, an alien born by the laws of England. 2. How many kinds of aliens born there were. 3. What incidents belonged to an alien born. 4. The reason why an alien is not capable of inheritance or freehold within England. 5. Examples, resolutions, and judgments reported in our books in all successions of ages, proving the plaintiff to be no alien. 6. Demonstrative conclusions upon the premises, approving the same.

1. An alien is a subject that is born out of the ligeance of the king, and under the ligeance of another, and can have no real or personal action for or concerning land; but in every such action the tenant or defendant may plead, that he was born in such a country which is not within the ligeance of the king, and demand judgment if he shall be answered. And this is in effect the description which Lit. himself maketh, lib. 2. cap. 14. Villen. fol. 43. Alienigena est alienæ gentis seu alienæ ligeantia, qui etiam dicitur peregrinus, alienus, exoticus, extraneus, &c. Extraneus est subditus, qui extra terram, i. e. potestatem regis, natus est. And the usual and right pleading of an alien born doth lively and truly describe and express what he is. And therein two things are to be observed. First, that the most usual and best pleading in this case is both exclusive and inclusive, viz. extra ligeantiam domini regis, &c. & infra ligeantiam alterius regis, as it appeareth in (m) 9 Ed. 4. 7. b. Book of Entries, fol. 244, &c. which cannot possibly be pleaded in this case, for two causes. 1. For that one king is sovereign of both kingdoms. 2. One ligeance is due by both to one sovereign, and in case of an alien there must of necessity be several kings and several ligeances. Secondly, no pleading was ever extra regnum, or extra legem, which are circumscribed to place; but extra ligeantiam, which (as it hath been said) is not local or tied to any place.

It appeareth by Bracton, lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 15. fol. 134. that (n) Canutus the Danish King, having settled himself in this kingdom in peace, kept notwithstanding (for the better continuance thereof) great armies within this realm. The peers and nobles of England distasting this government by arms and armies, odimus accipitrem quia semper vivit in armis, wisely and politically persuaded the king, that they would provide for the safety of him and his people, and yet his armies carrying with them many inconveniences should be withdrawn; and therefore offered, that they would consent to a law, that whosoever should kill an alien, and be apprehended, and could not acquit himself, he should be subject to justice: but if the manslayer fled, and could not be taken, then the town where the man was slain should forfeit sixty-six marks unto the king; and if the town were not able to pay it, then the hundred should forfeit and pay the same unto the king's treasure; whereunto the king assented. This law was penned quicunque occiderit Francigenam, &c. not excluding other aliens, but putting Francigena a Frenchman for example, that others must be like unto him, in owing several ligeance to a several sovereign, that is, to be extra ligeantiam regis Angli, and infra ligeantiam alterius regis. And it appears before out of Bracton and Fleta, that both of them use the same example (in describing of an alien) ad fidem regis Franciæ. And it was holden, that except it could be proved, that the party slain was an Englishman, that he should be taken for an alien; and this was called Englesherie, Englesheria, that is, a proof that the party slain was an Englishman. (Hereupon Canutus presently withdrew his armies, and within a while after lost his crown, and the same was restored to his right owner.) The said law of Englesherie continued until 14 Ed. 3. cap. 4. and then the same was by act of parliament ousted and abolished. So amongst the laws of William the first, (published by master Lambert, fol. 125.) omnis Francigena (there put, for example as before is said, to express what manner of person alienigena should be) qui tempore Edwardi propinqui nostri fuit particeps legum & consuetudinum Anglorum (that is made denizen) quod dicunt ad scot & lot persolvat secundum legem Anglorum.

Every man is either alienigena, an alien born, or subditus, a subject born. Every alien is either a friend that is in league, &c. or an enemy that is in open war, &c. Every alien enemy is either pro tempore, temporary for a time, or perpetuus, perpetual, or specialiter permissus, permitted especially. Every subject is either natus, born, or datus, given or made: and of these briefly in their order. An alien friend, as at this time, a German, a Frenchman, a Spaniard, &c. (all the kings and princes in Christendom being now in league with our sovereign; but a Scot being a subject, cannot be said to be a friend, nor Scotland to be solum amici) may by the common-law have, acquire, and get within this realm, by gift, trade, or other lawful means, any treasure, or (o) goods personal whatsoever, as well as an Englishman, and may maintain any (p) action for the same: but (q) lands within this realm, or houses (but for their necessary habitation only) alien friends cannot acquire, or get, nor maintain any action real or personal, for any land or house, unless the house be for their necessary habitation. For if they should be disabled to acquire and maintain these things, it were in effect to deny unto them trade and traffick, which is the life of every island. But if this alien become an enemy (as all alien friends may) then is he utterly disabled to maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. And this is to be understood of a temporary alien, that being an enemy, may be a friend, or being a friend may be an enemy. But a perpetual enemy (though there be no wars by fire and sword between them) cannot maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. All infidels are in law perpetui (r) inimici, perpetual enemies (for the law presumes not that they will be converted, that being remota potentia, a remote possibility) for between them, as with the devils, whose subjects they be, and the Christian, there is perpetual hostility, and can be no (s) peace; for as the apostle saith, 2 Cor. 6. 15. quæ autem conventio Christi ad Belial, aut quæ pars fidei cum infideli? And the law saith, Judæo Christianum nullum serviat mancipium, nefas enim est quem Christus redemit blasphemum Christi in servitutis vinculis detinere. Register 282. Infideles sunt Christi & Christianorum inimici. And herewith agreeth the book in 12 H. 8. fol. 4. where it is holden that a pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all. And upon this ground there is a diversity between a conquest of a kingdom of a Christian king, and the conquest of a kingdom of an infidel; for if a king come to a Christian kingdom by conquest, seeing that he hath vita & necis potestatem, he may at his pleasure alter and change the laws of that kingdom, but until he doth make an alteration of those laws, the ancient laws of that kingdom remain. But if a Christian king should conquer a kingdom of an infidel, and bring them under his subjection, there ipso facto the laws of the infidel are abrogated; for that they be not only against Christianity, but against the law of God and of nature, contained in the Decalogue: and in that case, until certain laws be established amongst them, the king by himself, and such judges as he shall appoint, shall judge them and their causes according to natural equity, in such sort as kings in ancient time did with their kingdoms, before any certain municipal laws were given, as before hath been said. But if a king hath a kingdom by title of descent, there seeing by the laws of that kingdom he doth inherit the kingdom, he cannot change those laws of himself, without consent of parliament. Also if a king hath a Christian kingdom by conquest, as king Henry the second had Ireland, after king John had given unto them, being under his obedience and subjection, the laws of England for the government of that country, no succeeding king could alter the same without parliament.

And in that case while the realm of England and that of Ireland were governed by several laws, any that was born in Ireland was no alien to the realm of England. In which precedent of Ireland three things are to be observed. 1. That then there had been two descents, one from Henry the second to king Richard the first, and from Richard to king John, before the alteration of the laws. 2. That albeit Ireland was a distinct dominion, yet, the title thereof being by conquest, the same by judgment of law might by express words be bound by act of the parliament of England. 3. That albeit no reservation were in king John's charter, yet by judgment of law a writ of error did lie in the King's Bench in England of an erroneous judgment in the King's Bench of Ireland. Furthermore, in the case of a conquest of a Christian kingdom, as well those that served in wars at the conquest, as those that remained at home for the safety and peace of their country, and other the king's subjects, as well antenati as postnati, are capable of lands in the kingdom or country conquered, and may maintain any real action, and have the like privileges and benefits there, as they may have in England.

The third kind of enemy is, inimicus permissus, an enemy that cometh into the realm by the king's safe-conduct, of which you may read in the Register, fol. 25. Book of Entries, ejectione firmæ, 7, 32 H. 6. 27. b. &c.

Now what a subject born is, appeareth at large by that which hath been said de ligeantia: and so likewise de subdito nato, of a donatison: for that is the right name, so called, because his legitimation is given unto him; for if you derive denizen from deins nes, one born within the obedience or ligeance of the king, then such a one should be all one with a natural-born subject. And it appeareth before out of the laws of king W. 1. of what antiquity the making of denizens by the king of England hath been.

3. There be regularly (unless it be in special cases) three incidents to a subject born. 1. That the parents be under the actual obedience of the king. 2. That the place of his birth be within the king's dominion. And 3. The time of his birth is chiefly to be considered; for he cannot be a subject born of one kingdom that was born under the ligeance of a king of another kingdom, albeit afterwards one kingdom descend to the king of the other. 1. For the first, it is termed actual obedience, because though the king of England hath absolute right to other kingdoms or dominions, as France, Aquitaine, Normandy, &c. yet seeing the king is not in actual possession thereof, none born there since the crown of England was out of actual possession thereof, are subjects to the king of England. 2. The place is observable, but so as many times ligeance or obedience, without any place within the king's dominions, may make a subject born; but any place within the king's dominions without obedience can never produce a natural subject. And therefore if any of the king's ambassadors in foreign nations have children there of their wives, being English women, by the common laws of England they are natural-born subjects, and yet they are born out of the king's dominions. But if enemies should come into any of the king's dominions, and surprise any castle or fort, and possess the same by hostility, and have issue there, that issue is no subject to the king, though he be born within his dominions; for that he was not born under the king's ligeance or obedience. But 3. the time of his (a) birth is of the essence of a subject born; for he cannot be a subject to the king of England, unless at the time of his (a) birth he was under the ligeance and obedience of the king. And that is the reason that antenati in Scotland (for that at the time of their birth they were under the ligeance and obedience of another king) are aliens born, in respect of the time of their birth.

4. It followeth next in course to set down the reasons, wherefore an alien born is not capable of inheritance within England; and that he is not for three reasons: 1. The secrets of the realm might thereby be discovered. 2. The revenues of the realm (the sinews of war, and ornament of peace) should be taken and enjoyed by strangers born. 3. It should tend to the destruction of the realm. Which three reasons do appear in the statute of 2 H. 5. cap. 4. and 4 H. 5. cap. ult. But it may be demanded, wherein doth that destruction consist? Whereunto it is answered: first, it tends to destruction tempore belli; for then strangers might fortify themselves in the heart of the realm, and be ready to set fire on the commonwealth, as was excellently shadowed by the Trojan horse in Virgil's second book of his Æneid, where a very few men in the heart of the city did more mischief in a few hours, than ten thousand men without the walls in ten years. Secondly, tempore pacis, for so might many aliens born get a great part of the inheritance and freehold of the realm, whereof there should follow a failure of justice (the supporter of the commonwealth), for that aliens born cannot be returned of juries (b) for the trial of issues between the king and the subject, or between subject and subject. And for this purpose, and many other, see a charter (worthy of observation) of king Ed. 3. written to pope Clement, datum apud Westm. 26. die Sept. ann. regni nostri Franciæ 4. regni vero Angliæ 17.

5. Now are we come to the examples, resolutions, and judgments of former times; wherein two things are to be observed. First, how many cases in our books do over-rule this case in question; for ubi (c) eadem ratio ibi idem jus, & de similibus idem est iudicium. 2. That for want of an express text of law in terminis terminantibus, and of examples and precedents in like cases (as was objected by some), we are driven to determine the question by natural reason: for it was said, si cesset lex scripta, id custodiri oportet, quod moribus & consuetudine inductum est; & si qua in re hoc defecerit, recurrendum est ad rationem. But that receiveth a threefold answer. First, that there is no such rule in the common or civil law; but the true rule of the civil law is, lex scripta si cesset, id custodiri oportet quod moribus et consuetudine inductum est; & si qua in re hoc defecerit, tunc id quod proximum & consequens ei est; & si id non appareat, tunc jus, quo urbs Romana utitur, servari oportet. Secondly, if the said imaginative rule be rightly and legally understood, it may stand for truth: for if you intend ratio for the legal and profound reason of such, as by diligent study and long experience and observation are so learned in the laws of this realm, as out of the reason of the same they can rule the case in question, in that sense the said rule is true: but if it be intended of the reason of the wisest man that professeth not the laws of England, then (I say) the rule is absurd and dangerous; for (d) cuiuslibet in sua arte perito est credendum, & quod quisque (e) norit in hoc se exerceat. Et omnes prudentes illa admittunt solent, quæ probantur iis, qui in sua arte bene versati sunt. Arist. 1. Topicorum, cap. 6. Thirdly, there be multitudes of examples, precedents, judgments, and resolutions in the laws of England; the true and unstrained reason whereof doth decide this question. For example,

The dukedom of Aquitaine, whereof Gascon was parcel, and the earldom of Poitiers, came to king Henry the second by the marriage of Eleanor, daughter and heir of William duke of Aquitaine, and earl of Poitiers, which descended to Rich. 1. Hen. 3. Ed. 1. Ed. 2. Ed. 3. &c. In 27. lib.

(f) Aff. pl. 48. in one case there appear two judgments and one resolution to be given by the judges of both benches in this case following. The possessions of the prior of Chelsey in the time of war were seized into the king's hands, for that the prior was an alien born. The prior by petition of right sued to the king; and the effect of his petition was, that before he became prior of Chelsey, he was prior of Andover; and whilst he was prior there, his possessions of that priory were likewise seized for the same cause, supposing that he was an alien born; whereupon he sued a former petition, and alledged that he was born in Gascon within the ligeance of the king: which point being put in issue, and found by jury to be true, it was adjudged that he should have restitution of his possessions generally without mentioning of advowsons. After which restitution, one of the said advowsons became void, the prior presented, against whom the king brought a quare impedit, wherein the king was barred; and all this was contained in the latter petition. And the book saith, that the earl of Arundel, and sir Guy of B. came into the court of Common Pleas, and demanded the opinion of the judges of that court concerning the said case, who resolved, that upon the matter aforesaid the king had no right to seize. In which case amongst many notable points, this one appeareth to be adjudged and resolved, that a man born in Gascon under the king's ligeance, was no alien born, as to lands and possessions within the realm of England, and yet England and Gascon were, 1. Several and distinct countries. 2. Inherited by several and distinct titles. 3. Governed by several and distinct municipal laws, as it appeareth amongst the records in the Tower, Rot. Vase. 10. Ed. 1. num. 7. 4. Out of the extent of the great seal of England, and the jurisdiction of the Chancery of England. 5. The like objection might be made for default of trial, as hath been made against the plaintiff. And where it was said that Gascon was no kingdom, and therefore it was not to be matched to the case in hand, it was answered, that this difference was without a diversity, as to the case in question; for if the plea in the case at the bar be good, then without question the prior had been an alien; for it might have been said (as it is in the case at the bar) that he was born extra ligeantiam regis regni sui Angliæ, & infra ligeantiam domini sui Vasconiz, and that they were several dominions, and governed by several laws: but then such a conceit was not hatched, that a king having several dominions should have several ligeances of his subjects. Secondly, it was answered, that Gascon was sometime a kingdom, and likewise Milan, Burgundy, Bavaria, Bretagne, and others, were, and now are become dukedoms, Castile, Arragon, Portugal, Barcelona, &c. were sometime earldoms; afterwards dukedoms, and now kingdoms. Bohemia and Poland were sometimes dukedoms, and now kingdoms; and (omitting many other, and coming nearer home) Ireland was before 22 H. 8. a lordship, and now is a kingdom, and yet the king of England was as absolute a prince and sovereign when he was lord of Ireland, as now, when he is styled king of the same. 6. Ed. 3. 41. an exchange was made between an Englishman and a Gascon, of lands in England and in Gascon; ergo, the Gascon was no alien; for then had he not been capable of lands in England. 1 H. 4. 1. the king brought a writ of right of ward against one Sybil, whose husband was exiled into Gascon; ergo, Gascon is no parcel or member of England, for exilium est patria privatio, natalis soli mutatio, legum naturarum amissio. 4 Ed. 3. 10. b. the king directed his writ out of Chancery under the great seal of England to the mayor of (g) Burdeaux (a city in Gascon), then being under the king's obedience, to certify, whether one that was outlawed here in England, was at that time in the king's service under him in obsequio regis: whereby it appeareth, that the king's writ did run into Gascon, for it is the trial that the common law hath appointed in that case. But as to other cases, it is to be understood, that there be two kinds of writs, brevia mandatoria & remedialia, & brevia mandatoria & non remedialia. Brevia mandatoria & remedialia, as writs of right, of formedon, &c. of debt, trespass, &c. and shortly, all writs real and personal, whereby the party wronged is to recover somewhat, and to be remedied for that wrong was offered unto him, are returnable or determinable in some court of justice within England, and to be served and executed by the sheriffs, or other ministers of justice within England; and these cannot by any means extend into any other kingdom, country, or nation, though that it be under the king's actual ligeance and obedience. But the other kind of writs, that are mandatory, and not remedial, are not tied to any place, but do follow subjection and ligeance, in what country or nation so ever the subject is, as the king's writ to command any of his subjects residing in any foreign country to return into any of the king's own dominions, sub fide et ligeantia quibus nobis tenemini. And so are the aforesaid mandatory writs cited out of the Register of protection for safety of body and goods, and requiring, that if any injury be offered, that the same be redressed according to the laws and customs of that place. Vide le Reg. fol. 26. Stamford Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39. faith, that men born in Gascon are inheritable to lands in England. This doth also appear by divers acts of parliament: for by the whole parliament, 39 E. 3. cap. 16. it is agreed, that the Gascons are of the ligeance and subjection of the king. Vide 42 Ed. 3. cap. 2. & 28 H. 6. cap. 5. &c.

Guienne was another part of Aquitain, and came by the same title: and those of Guienne were by act of parliament in 13 H. 4. not imprinted, ex rot parliament. eodem anno, adjudged and declared to be no aliens, but able to possess and purchase, &c. lands within this realm. And so doth Stamford take the law. Prærog. c. 12. f. 39.

And thus much of the dukedom of Aquitain, which (together with the earldom of Poitiers) came to king Henry the second (as hath been said) by marriage, and continued in the actual possession of the kings of England by ten descents, viz. from the first year of king Henry the second, unto the two and thirtieth year of king Henry the sixth, which was upon the very point of three hundred years, within which duchy there were (as some write) 4 archbishopricks, 24 bishopricks, 15 earldoms, 202 baronies, and above a thousand captainships and bailiwicks: and in all this long time neither book-case nor record can be found wherein any plea was offered to disfigure any of them that were born there, by foreign birth, but the contrary hereof directly appeareth by the said book-case of (a) 27 lib. Ass. 48.

The kings of England had sometimes Normandy under actual ligeance and obedience. The question is then, whether men born in Normandy, after one king had them both, were inheritable to lands in England; and it is evident by our books that they were: for so it appeareth by the declaratory act of 17 E. 2. de Prærog. Reg. c. 12. that they were inheritable to, and capable of lands in England; for the purview of that statute is, quod rex habeat escaetas de terris Normannorum, &c. Ergo, Normans might have lands in England: et hoc similiter intelligendum est, si aliqua hereditas descendat alicui nato in partibus transmarinis, &c. Whereby it appeareth, that they were capable of lands within England by descent. And that this act of 17 E. 2. was but a declaration of the common law, it appeareth both by Bracton, who (as it hath been said) wrote in the reign of Henry the third, lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 1. f. 116. and by Britton who wrote in 5 E. 1. c. 18. that all such lands as any Norman had either by descent or purchase, escheated to the king for their treason, in revolting from their natural liege lord and sovereign. And therefore Stamford Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39. expounding the said statute of 17 E. 2. cap. 12. concludeth, that by that chapter it should appear (as if he had said, it is apparent without question) that all men born in Normandy, Gascon, Guienne, Anjou, and Britain, (whilst they were under actual obedience) were inheritable within this realm as well as Englishmen. And the reason thereof was, for that they were under one ligeance due to one sovereign. And so much (omitting many other authorities) for Normandy: saving I cannot let pass the isles of Guernsey and Jersey, parts and parcels of the dukedom of Normandy, yet remaining under the actual ligeance and obedience of the king. I think no man will doubt, but those that are born in Guernsey and Jersey (though those isles are no parcel of the realm of England, but several dominions enjoyed by several titles, governed by several laws) are inheritable and capable of any lands within the realm of England, 1 E. 3. fol. 7. Commission to determine the title of lands within the said isles, according to the laws of the isles; and Mich. 41 E. 3. in the treasury, quia negotium præd' nec aliqua alia negotia de insula præd' emergentia non debent terminari, nisi secundum legem insulae præd', &c. And the Register, fol. 22. rex fidelibus suis de Guernsey & Jersey. King William the first brought this dukedom of Normandy with him, which by five descents continued under the actual obedience of the kings of England; and in or about the 6th year of king John, the crown of England lost the actual possession thereof, until king Henry the fifth recovered it again, and left it to king Henry the sixth, who lost it in the 28th of his reign; wherein were (as some write) one archbishoprick and six bishopricks, and an hundred strong towns and fortresses, besides those that were wasted in war.

Maud the empress, the only daughter and heir of Henry the first, took to her second husband Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, Tourain, and Mayne, who had issue king H. 2. to whom the said earldom by just title descended, who, and the kings that succeeded him, styled themselves by the name of comes Andegavi, &c. until king E. 3. became king of all France; and such as were born within that earldom, so long as it was under the actual obedience of the king of England, were no aliens, but natural-born subjects, and never any offer made, that we can find, to disfigure them for foreign birth.

But leave we Normandy and Anjou, and speak we of the little, but yet ancient and absolute kingdom of the Isle of Man, as it appeareth by divers ancient and authentic records; as taking one for many. Artold king of Man sued to king H. 3. to come into England to confer with him, and to perform certain things which were due to king H. 3. thereupon king H. 3. 21 Decemb. ann. regni sui 34, at Winchester, by his letters patent gave licence to Artold king of Man as followeth. Rex omnibus salutem. Sciatis, quod licentiam dedimus, &c. Artoldo regi de Man veniendo ad nos in Angli' ad loquend' nobisc' & ad faciend' nobis quod facere debet; & ideo vobis mandamus, quod ei regi in veniendo ad nos in Angli', vel ibi morando, vel inde redeundo, nullum faciat aut fieri permittatis damnum, injuriam, molestiam, aut gravamen, vel etiam hominib' suis quos secum ducet; & si aliquid eis forisfact' fuerit, id eis sine dilat' faciat emendari. In cujus, &c. duratur' usque ad fest' S. Mich. Wherein two things are to be observed; 1. That seeing that Artold king of Man sued for a licence in this case to the king, it proveth him an absolute king, for that a monarch or an absolute prince cannot come into England without licence of the king; but any subject being in league, may come into this realm without licence. 2. That the king in his licence doth style him by the name of a king. It was resolved in 11 H. 8. that where an office was found after the decease of Thomas earl of Derby, and that he died seised, &c. of the Isle of Man, that the said office was utterly void; for that the Isle of Man, Normandy, Gascon, &c. were out of the power of the Chancery, and governed by several laws; and yet none will doubt, but those that are born within that isle, are capable and inheritable of lands within the realm of England.

Wales was sometime a kingdom, as it appeareth by 19 H. 6. fol. 6. and by the act of parliament of 2 H. 5. c. 6. but whilst it was a kingdom, the same was holden, and within the fee, of the king of England; and this appeareth by our books, Flota, lib. 1. cap. 16. 1 E. 3. 14. 8 E. 3. 59. 13 E. 3. tit. Jurisdic. 10 H. 4. 6. Plow. Com. 368. And in this respect, in divers ancient charters, kings of old time styled themselves in several manners, as king Edgar, Britanniarum, Etheldredus, totius Albion' Dei providentia imperator; Edredus Magn' Britann' monarcha; which among many other of like nature I have seen. But by the statute of 12 E. 1. Wales was united and incorporated into England, and made parcel of England in possession; and therefore it is ruled in 7 H. 4. f. 13. a. that no protection doth lie quia moratur in Wallia, because Wales is within the realm of England. And where it is recited in the act of 27 H. 8. that Wales was ever parcel of the realm of England, it is true in this sense, viz. that before 12 E. 1. it was parcel in tenure, and since it is parcel of the body of the realm. And whosoever is born within the fee of the king of England, though it be in another kingdom, is a natural-born subject, and capable and inheritable of lands in England, as it appeareth in Plow. Com. 126. And therefore those that were born in Wales before 12 E. 1. whilst it was only holden of England, were capable and inheritable of lands in England.

Now come we to France and the members thereof, as Calice, Guynes, Tournay, &c. which descended to king Edw. the third as son and heir to Isabel, daughter and heir to Philip le Beau, king of France. Certain it is, whilst king Henry the sixth had both England, and the heart and greatest part of France under his actual ligeance and obedience (for he was crowned king of France in Paris) that they that were then born in those parts of France that were under actual ligeance and obedience, were no aliens, but capable of, and inheritable to lands in England. And that is proved by the writs in the Register, fol. 26. cited before. But the inrollment of letters patent of denization in the Exchequer int' originalia, ann. 11 H. 6. with the lord treasurer's remembrancer was strongly urged and objected; for (it was said) thereby it appeareth, that king H. 6. in anno 11 of his reign, did make denizen one Reynel born in France. Whereunto it was answered, that it is proved by the said letters patent, that he was born in France, before king Henry the sixth had the actual possession of the crown of France, so as he was antenatus; and this appeareth by the said letters patent, whereby the king granteth, that magister Johannes Reynel serviens noster, &c. infra regnum nostrum Franc' oriundus pro termino vite sue sit ligens noster, & eodem modo teneatur sicut verus & fidelis noster infra regnum Angli' oriundus, ac quod ipse terras infra regnum nostrum Angli' seu alia dominia nostra perquirere possit & valeat. Now if that Reynel had been born since Henry the sixth had the quiet possession of France (the king being crowned king of France about one year before) of necessity he must be an infant of very tender age, and then the king would never have called him his servant, nor made the patent (as thereby may be collected) for his service, nor have called him by the name of magister Johannes Reynel: but without question he was antenatus, born before the king had the actual and real possession of that crown.

Calice is a part of the kingdom of France, and never was parcel of the kingdom of England, and the kings of England enjoyed Calice in and from the reign of king Edw. the third, until the loss thereof in queen Mary's time, by the same title that they had to France. And it is evident by our books, that those that were born in Calice, were capable and inheritable to lands in England, 42 E. 3. c. 10. Vide 21 H. 7. 33. b. 19 H. 6. 2 E. 4. 1. a. b. 39 H. 6. 39. a. 21 E. 4. 18. a. 28 H. 6. 3. b. By all which it is manifest, that Calice being parcel of France was under the actual obedience and commandment of the king; and by consequent, those that were born there, were natural-born subjects, and no aliens. Calice from the reign of king Edw. 3. until the fifth year of queen Mary, remained under the actual obedience of the king of England.

Guines also, another part of France, was under the like obedience to king Henry the sixth, as appeareth by 31 H. 6. fol. 4. And Tournay was under the obedience of Henry the eighth, as it appeareth by 5 El. Dyer, fol. 224. for there it is resolved, that a bastard born at Tournay, whilst it was under the obedience of Henry the eighth, was a natural subject, as an issue born within this realm by aliens. If then those that were born at Tournay, Calais, &c. whilst they were under the obedience of the king, were natural subjects, and no aliens, it followeth, that when the kingdom of France (whereof those were parcels) was under the king's obedience, that those that were then born there, were natural subjects, and no aliens.

Next followeth Ireland, which originally came to the kings of England by conquest; but who was the first conqueror thereof, hath been a question. I have seen a charter made by king Edgar in these words. Ego Edgarus Anglorum Basilius, omniumque insularum oceanis, quæ Britanniam circumjacent, imperator & dominus, gratias ago ipsi Deo omnipotenti regi meo, qui meum imperium sic ampliorit & exaltavit super regnum patrum meorum, &c. Mihi concessit propitia divinitas, cum Anglorum imperio, omnia regna insularum oceanis, &c. cum suis ferocissimis regibus usque Norvegiæ, maximamque partem Hiberniæ, cum sua nobilissima civitate de Dublinâ, Anglorum regno subjugare, quapropter & ego Christi gloriam & laudem in regno meo exaltare, & ejus servitium amplificare devotus disposui, &c. Yet for that it was wholly conquered in the reign of Henry the second, the honour of the conquest of Ireland is attributed to him; and his style was, rex Angl', dominus Hibern', dux Normann', dux Aquitan', & comes Andegav', king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, duke of Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou. That Ireland is a dominion separate and divided from England, it is evident from our books, 20 H. 6. 8. fir John Pilkington's case. 32 H. 6. 25. 20 Eliz. Dyer 360. Plow. Com. 360. And 2 R. 3. 12. a. Hibernia habet parlamentum, & faciunt leges, & nostra statuta non ligant eos, quia non mittunt milites ad parlamentum (which is to be understood, unless they be especially named) sed persone eorum sunt subjecti regis, sicut inhabitantes in Calesiâ, Gasconiâ, & Guyan. Wherein it is to be observed, that the Irishman (as to his subjection) is compared to men born in Calais, Gascon, and Guienne. Concerning their laws, ex rotulis patentium de anno 11 regis H. 3. there is a charter which that king made, beginning in these words. Rex, &c. baronibus, militibus, & omnibus libere tenentibus L. salutem. Satis ut credimus vestra audivit discretio, quod, quando bonæ memoriæ (a) Johannes quondam rex Angl' pater noster venit in Hiberniam, ipse duxit secum viros discretos & legis peritos, quorum communi consilio & ad instantiam Hibernensium statuit & præcepit leges Anglicanas in Hibern' ita quod leges easdem in scripturas redactas reliquit sub sigillo suo ad Scaccarium Dublin'. So as now the laws of England became the proper laws of Ireland; and therefore, because they have parliaments holden there, whereat they have made divers particular laws concerning that dominion, as it appeareth in 20 H. 6. 8. and 20 El. (b) Dyer 360. and for that they retain unto this day divers of their ancient customs, the book in 20 H. 6. 8. holdeth, that Ireland is governed by laws and customs separate and diverse from the laws of England. A voyage royal may be made into Ireland. Vide (c) 11 H. 4. 7. a. and 7 (d) E. 4. 27. a. which proveth it a distinct dominion. And in anno 33 reg. El. it was resolved by all the judges of England in the case of (e) Orurke an Irishman, who had committed high treason in Ireland, that he by the statute of 23 H. 8. c. 33. might be indicted, arraigned, and tried for the same in England, according to the purview of that statute; the words of which statute be, 'that all treasons, &c. committed by any (f) person out of the realm of England shall be from henceforth enquired of, &c.' and they all resolved (as afterward they did also in fir John Perrot's case) that Ireland was out of the realm of England, and that treasons committed there were to be tried within England by that statute. In the statute of 4 H. 7. cap. 24. of (g) fines, provision is made for them that be out of this land, and it is holden in Plow. Com. in Stowell's case 375, that he that is in Ireland is out of this land, and consequently within that proviso. Might not then the like plea be devised as well against any person born in Ireland, as (this is against Calvin that is a postnatus) in Scotland? for the Irishman is born extra ligeantiam regis regni sui Angl', &c. which be verba operativa in the plea: but all men know, that they are natural-born subjects, and capable of and inheritable to laws in England.

Lastly, to conclude this part with (h) Scotland itself. In ancient time part of (i) Scotland (besides Berwick) was within the power and ligeance of the king of England, as appeareth by our books (j) 42 E. 3. 2. b. the lord Beaumont's case, 11 E. 3. c. 2, &c. and by precedents hereafter mentioned; and that part (though it were under the king of England's ligeance and obedience) yet was it governed by the laws of Scotland. Ex rotulis Scotiæ, anno 11 Ed. 3. amongst the records in the Tower of London. Rex, &c. Constitimus Rich. Talebot justiciarium nostrum villæ Berwici super Twedam, ac omnium aliarum terrarum nostrarum in partibus Scot', ad faciend' omnia & singula que ad officium justiciarii pertinent, secundum legem & consuetudinem regni Scot'. And after anno 26 E. 3. ex eodem rot. Rex Henrico de Percy, Ricardo de Nevil, &c. Volumus & vobis & alteri vestrum tenore presentium committimus & mandamus, quod homines nostri de Scot' ad pacem & obedientiam nostram existentes, legibus, libertatibus, & liberis consuetudinibus, quibus ipsi & antecessores sui tempore celeberrimi Alexandri quondam regis Scot' rationabiliter usi fuerunt, uti & gaudere debeant, prout in quibusdam indenturis, &c. plenius dicitur contineri. And there is a writ in the Register 295. a. Dedimus potestatem recipiendi ad pacem & pacem nostram homines de Galloway. Now the case in (l) 42 Ed. 3. 2. b. (which was within sixteen years of the said grant, concerning the laws in 26 E. 3.) ruleth it, that so many as were born in that part of Scotland, that was under the ligeance of the king, were no aliens, but inheritable to lands in England; yet was that part of Scotland in another kingdom governed by several laws, &c. And if they were natural subjects in that case, when the king of England had but part of Scotland, what reason should there be, why those that are born there, when the king hath all Scotland, should not be natural subjects; and no aliens? So likewise (m) Berwick is no part of England, nor governed by the laws of England, and yet they that have been born there, since they were Berwick, under the obedience of one king, are natural-born subjects, and no aliens, as it appeareth in 15 R. 2. cap. 7, &c. Vide (n) 19 H. 6. 35. b. and 39 H. 6. 39. a. And yet, in all these cases and examples, if this new devised plea had been sufficient, they should have been all aliens against so many judgments, resolutions, authorities, and judicial precedents in all successions of ages. There were sometimes in England, whilst the heptarchy lasted, seven several crowned kings of seven several and distinct kingdoms, but in the end the West Saxons got the monarchy, and all the other kings melted (as it were) the crowns to make one imperial diadem, for the king of the West Saxons over all. Now when the whole was under the actual and real ligeance and obedience of one king, were any, that were born in any of those several and distinct kingdoms, aliens one to another? Certainly they, being born under the obedience of one king and sovereign, were all natural-born subjects, and capable of and inheritable unto any lands in any of the said kingdoms.

In the holy history reported by St. Luke, ex dictamine Spiritus Sancti, cap. 21 & 22 Act. Apostolorum, it is certain, that St. Paul was a Jew, born in Tarsus, a famous city of Cilicia; for it appeareth in the said 21st chapter, ver. 39. by his own words, ego homo sum quidem Judæus a Tarso Ciliciæ, non ignota civitatis municeps. And in the 22d chapter, ver. 3. ego sum vir Judæus natus Tarso Ciliciæ, &c. and then made that excellent sermon there recorded; which when the Jews heard, the text saith, ver. 22. levaverunt vocem suam, dicentes, tolle de terra hujusmodi, non enim fas est eum vivere; speciferantibus autem eis et projicientibus vestimenta sua, & pulverem jactantibus in aerem. Claudius Lysias the popular tribune, to please this turbulent and prophane multitude (though it were utterly against justice and common reason) the text saith, justi tribuni 1. induci eum in castra, 2. flagellis cædi, and 3. torqueri eum (quid ita?) ut sciret propter quam causam sic acclarent; and when they had bound Paul with cords, ready to execute the tribune's unjust commandment, the blessed apostle (to avoid unlawful and sharp punishment) took hold of the law of a heathen emperor, and said to the centurion standing by him, si hominem Romanum et indemnatum licet vobis flagellare? Which when the centurion heard, he went to the tribune and said, quid acturus es? Hic enim homo civis Romanus est. Then came the tribune to Paul, and said unto him; dic mihi si tu Romanus es? At ille dixit, etiam. And the tribune answered, ego multa summa civitatem hanc consequutus sum. But Paul not meaning to conceal the dignity of his birth-right said, ego autem et natus sum: as if he should have said to the tribune, you have your freedom by purchase of money, and I (by a more noble means) by birth-right and inheritance. Protinus ergo (saith the text) decesserunt ab illo qui illum torturi erant: tribunus quoque timuit postquam rescivit, quia civis Romanus esset, et quia alligasset eum. So as hereby it is manifest, that Paul was a Jew, born at Tarsus in Cilicia in Asia Minor; and yet being born under the obedience of the Roman emperor, he was by birth a citizen of Rome in Italy in Europe, that is, capable of and inheritable to all privileges and immunities of that city. But such a plea as is now imagined against Calvin might have made St. Paul an alien to Rome. For if the emperor of Rome had several ligeances for every several kingdom and country under his obedience, then might it have been said against St. Paul, that he was extra ligeantiam imperatoris regni sui Italiæ, et infra ligeantiam imperatoris regni sui Ciliciæ, &c. But as St. Paul was Judæus patriæ et Romanus privilegio, Judæus natione et Romanus jure nationum; so may Calvin say, that he is Scotus patriæ & Anglus privilegio, Scotus natione & Anglus jure nationum.

Samaria in Syria was the chief city of the ten tribes; but it being usurped by the king of Syria, and the Jews taken prisoners, and carried away in captivity, was after inhabited by the Panyms. Now albeit Samaria of right belonged to Jewry, yet because the people of Samaria were not under actual obedience, by the judgment of the chief justice of the whole world they were adjudged alienigenæ, aliens: for in the Evangelist St. Luke, c. 17. when Christ had cleansed the ten lepers, unus autem ex illis (saith the text) ut vidit quia mundatus esset, regressus est cum magna voce magnificans Deum et cecidit in faciem ante pedes ejus gratias agens, & hic erat Samaritanus. Et Jesus respondens dixit, nonne decem mundati sunt, et novum ubi sunt? Non est inventus, qui rediret et daret gloriam Deo, nisi hic alienigena. So as by his judgment this Samaritan was alienigena, a stranger born, because he had the place, but wanted obedience. Et si desit obedientia non adjuvat locus. And this agreeth with the divine, who saith, si locus salvare potuisset, Satan de caelo pro sua inobedientia non cecidisset. Adam in Paradiso non cecidisset. Lot in monte non cecidisset, sed potius in Sodom.

6. Now resteth the sixth part of this division, that is to say, six demonstrative illations or conclusions, drawn plainly and expressly from the premises.

1. Every one that is an alien by birth, may be, or might have been an enemy by accident; but Calvin could never at any time be an enemy by any accident; ergo, he cannot be an alien by birth. Vide 33 H. 6. f. 1. a. b. the difference between an alien enemy, and a subject traitor. Hostes sunt, qui nobis, vel quibus nos bellum decernimus; ceteri proditores, prædones, &c. The major is apparent, and is proved by that which hath been said. Et vide magna charta, cap. 30. 19 E. 4. 6. 9 E. 3. c. 1. 27 E. 3. c. 2. 4 H. 5. c. 7. 14 E. 3. stat. 2. c. 2, &c.

2. Whosoever are born under one natural ligeance and obedience, due by the law of nature to one sovereign, are natural-born subjects: but

Calvin was born under one natural ligeance and obedience due by the law of nature to one sovereign; ergo he is a natural-born subject.

3. Whosoever is born within the king's power or protection, is no alien: but Calvin was born under the king's power and protection: ergo he is no alien.

4. Every stranger born must at his birth be either amicus, or inimicus: but Calvin at his birth could neither be amicus nor inimicus; ergo he is no stranger born. Inimicus he cannot be, because he is subditus; for that cause also he cannot be amicus; neither now can Scotia be said to be solum amicus, as hath been said.

5. Whatsoever is due by the law or constitution of man, may be altered; but natural ligeance or obedience of the subject to the sovereign cannot be altered; ergo natural ligeance or obedience to the sovereign is not due by the law or constitution of man. Again, whatsoever is due by the law of nature, cannot be altered; but ligeance and obedience of the subject to the sovereign is due by the law of nature; ergo it cannot be altered. It hath been proved before, that ligeance or obedience of the inferior to the superior, of the subject to the sovereign, was due by the law of nature many thousand years before any law of man was made; which ligeance or obedience (being the only mark to distinguish a subject from an alien) could not be altered; therefore it remaineth still due by the law of nature. For leges naturæ perfectissimæ sunt et immutabiles, humani vero juris conditio semper in infinitum decurrit, et nihil est in eo quod perpetuo stare possit. Leges humanae nascuntur, vivunt, & moriuntur.

Lastly, whosoever at his birth cannot be an alien to the king of England, cannot be an alien to any of his subjects of England; but the plaintiff at his birth could be no alien to the king of England; ergo the plaintiff cannot be an alien to any of the subjects of England. The major and minor both be propositiones perspicue veræ. For as to the major it is to be observed, that whosoever is an alien born, is so accounted in law in respect of the king. And that appeareth, 1. by the pleading so often before remembered, that he must be extra ligeantiam regis, without any mention making of the subject. 2. When an alien born purchaseth any lands, the king only shall have them, though they be holden of a subject, in which case the subject loseth his feignory. And as it is said in our books, an alien may purchase ad proficuum regis; but the act of law giveth the alien nothing: and therefore if a woman alien marrieth a subject, she shall not be endowed, neither shall an alien be tenant by the curtesy. Vide 3 H. 6. 55. a. 4 H. 3. 179.

3. The subject shall plead, that the defendant is an alien born, for the benefit of the king, that he upon office found may seize; and that the tenant may yield to the king the land, and not to the alien, because the king hath best right thereunto. 4. Leagues between our sovereign and others are the only means to make aliens friends; et fœdera percutere, to make leagues, only and wholly pertaineth to the king. 5. Wars do make aliens enemies, and bellum indicere belongeth only and wholly to the king, and not to the subject, as appeareth in 19 Ed. 4. fol. 6. b. 6. The king only without the subject may make, not only letters of safe-conduct, but letters patent of denization, to whom, and how many he will, and enable them at his pleasure to sue any of his subjects in any action whatsoever, real or personal, which the king could not do without the subject, if the subject had any interest given unto him by the law in any thing concerning an alien born. Nay, the law is more precise herein than in a number of other cases, of higher nature: for the king cannot grant to any other to make of strangers born, denizens; it is by the law itself so inseparably and individually annexed to his royal person (as the book is in 20 H. 7. fol. 8.). For the law esteemeth it a point of high prerogative, jus majestatis, et inter insignia summa potestatis, to make aliens born subjects of the realm, and capable of the lands and inheritances of England in such sort as any natural-born subject is. And therefore by the statute of 27 H. 8. c. 24. many of the most ancient prerogatives and royal powers of the crown, as authority to pardon treason, murder, manslaughter, and felony, power to make justices in eyre, justices of assize, justices of peace and gaol-delivery, and such like, having been severed and divided from the crown, were again reunited to the same: but authority to make letters of denization, was never mentioned therein to be resumed, for that never any claimed the same by any pretext whatsoever, being a matter of so high a point of prerogative. So as the pleading against an alien, the purchase by any alien, leagues, and wars between aliens, denizations, and safe-conducts of aliens, have aspect only and wholly unto the king. It followeth therefore, that no man can be alien to the subject that is not alien to the king. Non potest esse alienigena corpori, qui non est capiti, non græci qui non est regi.

Now we are come to consider of legal inconveniences: and first of such as have been objected against the plaintiff, and secondly of such as should follow, if it had been adjudged against the plaintiff.

Of such inconveniences as were objected against the plaintiff, there remain only four to be answered; for all the rest are clearly and fully satisfied before: 1. That if postnati should be inheritable to our laws and inheritances, it were reason they should be bound by our laws; but postnati are not bound by our statute or common laws; for they having (as it was objected) never so much freehold or inheritance, cannot be returned of juries, nor subject to scot or lot, nor chargeable to subsidies or quinzimes, nor bound by any act of parliament made in England. 2. Whether one be born within the kingdom of Scotland or no, is not triable in England; for that it is a thing done out of this realm, and no jury can be returned for the trial of any such issue: and what inconvenience should thereof follow, if such pleas that wanted trial should be allowed (for then all aliens might imagine the like plea) they, that objected it, left it to the consideration of others. 3. It was objected, that this innovation was so dangerous, that the certain event thereof no man could foresee; and therefore, some thought it fit, that things should stand and continue as they had been in former time, for fear of the worst. 4. If postnati were by law legitimated in England, it was objected what inconvenience and confusion should follow, if (for the punishment of us all) the king's royal issue should fail, &c. whereby those kingdoms might again be divided. All the other arguments and objections, that have been made, have been all answered before, and need not to be repeated again.

1. To the first it was resolved, that the cause of this doubt was the mistaking of the law: for if a postnatus do purchase any lands in England, he shall be subject in respect thereof, not only to the laws of this realm, but also to all services and contributions, and to the payment of subsidies, taxes, and public charges, as any denizen or Englishman shall be; nay, if he dwell in England, the king may command him, by a writ of ne exeat regnum, that he depart not out of England. But if a postnatus dwell in Scotland, and have lands in England, he shall be chargeable for the same to all intents and purposes, as if an Englishman were owner thereof, and dwell in Scotland, Ireland, in the isles of Man, Guernsey, or Jersey, or elsewhere. The same law is of an Irishman that dwells in Ireland, and hath land in England. But if postnati, or Irishmen, men of the isles of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, &c. have lands within England, and dwell here, they shall be subject to all services and public charges within this realm, as any Englishman shall be. So as to services and charges, the postnati and Englishmen born are all in one predicament.

2. Concerning the trial, a threefold answer was thereunto made and resolved: 1. That the like objection might be made against Irishmen, Gofcoins, Normans, men of the isles of Man, Guernsey, and Jersey, of Berwick, &c. all which appear by the rule of our books to be natural-born subjects; and yet no jury can come out of any of those countries and places, for trial of their births there. 2. If the demandant or plaintiff in any action concerning lands be born in Ireland, Guernsey, Jersey, &c. out of the realm of England, if the tenant or defendant plead, that he was born out of the ligeance of the king, &c. the demandant or plaintiff may reply, that he was born under the ligeance of the king at such place within England; and upon the evidence the place shall not be material, but only the issue shall be, whether the demandant or plaintiff were born under the ligeance of the king in any of his kingdoms or dominions whatsoever: and in that case the jury (if they will) may find the special matter, viz. the place where he was born, and leave it to the judgment of the court: and that jurors may take knowledge of things done out of the realm in this and like cases, vide 7 H. 7. 8. b. 20 Ed. 3. Averment 34. 5 Ric. 2. tit. Trial 54. 15 Ed. 4. 15. 32 H. 6. 25. Fitz. Nat. Br. 196. Vide Dowdale's case, in the sixth part of my Reports, fol. 47. and there divers other judgments be vouched. 3. Brown, in anno 32 H. 6. reporteth a judgment then lately given, that where the defendant pleaded, that the plaintiff was a Scot, born at St. John's town in Scotland, out of the ligeance of the king; whereupon they were at issue, and that issue was tried where the writ was brought, and that appeareth also by 27 Aff. pl. 24. that the jury did find the prior to be born in Gofcoins. (for so much is necessarily proved by the words trave fuit.) And 20 Ed. 3. tit. Averment 34. in a juris utrum, the death of one of the vouches was alledged at such a castle in Britain, and this was enquired of by the jury. And it is holden in 5 Ric. 2. tit. Trial 54. that if a man be adhering to the enemies of the king in France, his land is forfeitable, and his adherency shall be tried where the land is, as oftentimes hath been done, as there it is said by Belknap: and Fitz. Nat. Br. 196. in a mortdanc, if the ancestor died in itinere peregrinationis sue vers. Terram Sanctam, the jury shall enquire of it. But in the case at bar, seeing the defendant hath pleaded the truth of the case, and the plaintiff hath not denied it, but demurred upon the same, and thereby confessed all matters of fact, the court now ought to judge upon the special matter, even as if a jury upon an issue joined in England, as it is aforesaid, had found the special matter, and left it to the court.

3. To the third, it was answered and resolved, that this judgment was rather a renovation of the judgments and censures of the reverend judges and sages of the law in so many ages past, than any innovation, as appeareth by the book and book-cases before recited: neither have judges power to judge according to that which they think to be fit, but that which out of the laws they know to be right and consonant to law. Judex bonus nihil ex arbitrio suo faciat, nec proposito domestica voluntatis, sed juxta leges & jura pronuntiet. And as for timores, fears grounded upon no just cause, qui non cadunt in constantem virum, vani timores estimandi sunt.

4. And as to the fourth, it is less than a dream of a shadow, or a shadow of a dream: for it hath been often said, natural legitimation respecteth actual obedience to the sovereign at the time of the birth.

The general part concerning inconveniences.

birth: for as the antenati remain aliens as to the crown of England, because they were born when there were several kings of the several kingdoms, and the uniting of the kingdoms, by descent subsequent, cannot make him a subject to that crown to which he was alien at the time of his birth; so albeit the kingdoms (which Almighty God of his infinite goodness and mercy divert) should by descent be divided, and governed by several kings; yet it was resolved, that all those, that were born under one natural obedience, while the realms were united under one sovereign, should remain natural-born subjects, and no aliens; for that naturalization due and vested by birth-right, cannot by any separation of the crowns afterwards be taken away; nor he, that was by judgment of law a natural subject at the time of his birth, become an alien by such a matter ex post facto. And in that case, upon such an accident, our postnatus may be ad fidem utriusque regis, as Bracton saith in the afore-remembered place, fol. 427. Sicut Anglicus non auditur in placitando aliquem de terris & tenementis in Francia, ita nec debet Francigena & alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Francie, audiri placitando in Anglia: sed tamen sunt aliqui Francigenae in Francia, qui sunt ad fidem utriusque, et semper fuerunt ante Normanniam deperditam & postea, et qui placitant hic et ibi, ea ratione, quia sunt ad fidem utriusque, sicut fuit Willielmus comes marescallus et manens in Anglia, et M. de Gynes manens in Francia, et alii plures. Concerning the reason drawn from the (a) etymologies, it made against them, for that by their own derivation, alienae gentis and alienae ligeantiae is all one: but arguments drawn from etymologies, are too weak and too light for judges to build their judgments upon: for saepenumero ubi proprietas (b) verborum attenditur, sensus veritatis amittitur: and yet when they agree with the judgment of law, judges may use them for ornaments.

But on the other side, some inconveniences should follow, if the plea against the plaintiff should be allowed. For, first, it maketh ligeance local; videlicet, ligeantia regis regni sui Scotiae, and ligeantia regis regni sui Angliae: whereupon should follow, first, that faith or ligeance, which is universal, should be confined within local limits and bounds; secondly, that the subjects should not be bound to serve the king in peace or in war out of those limits; thirdly, it should illegitimate many, and some of noble blood, which were born in Gascain, Guienne, Normandy, Calais, Tournay, France, and divers other of his majesty's dominions, whilst the same were in actual obedience, and in Berwick, Ireland, Guernsey and Jersey, if this plea should have been admitted for good. And secondly, this strange and new-devised plea inclineth too much to countenance that dangerous and desperate error of the Spencers, touched before, to receive any allowance within Westminster-Hall.

In the proceeding of this case, these things were observed, and so did

Lord-chancellor Ellesmere's speech in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the case of the postnati (c).

MY lords, mine age, mine infirmities, and indisposition of health, my decay and weakeness of memorie, and desuetudo, and long discontinuance from this manner of legall exercise (about foureteene yeeres) haue bereaued mee of the meanes and helpes that should inhable me to speake in so great a case.

I feare therefore, that it will be deemed presumption (if not worse) that I adventure to speake heerein at all; specially after so many learned and iudicious arguments of so many graue, learned, and reuerend iudges.

To say the same that hath bene saied, must needs be vnpleasaunt, wearisome, and loathsome to the hearers; and not to say the same, is to speake little to the purpose: for, what more can bee saied than hath bene?

Yet, for that the case is depending in Chancerie, and adiourned hither for difficultie in law, and there I must giue iudgement according to the law, whether the complainant bee inhabled, by lawe, to maintaine his suit in that court, or not; I holde it more fitting to deliuer the reasons of my iudgement heere, where others haue bene heard, than there, before a few, which haue not heard that, which hath bene so learnedly argued and largely debated heere.

And therefore the case standing thus, I will speake what I thinke. And I must say, as one of the graue iudges saied, I can tell no newes; but some old things which I haue read and obserued, I will remember; but I can

(c) This argument was printed in 1609, with the following title:—The speech of the lord chancellor of England, in the Exchequer-Chamber, touching the post-nati. Before the speech there was the following address to the reader:

To the louing readers.

Before I presumed to speake in the Exchequer-Chamber in R. C. case (which is now commonly called, the case of post-nati), I considered mine age and infirmities; and how long I had discontinued from such legall exercises. I might hereupon haue iustly challenged the priuiledge of silence. But greater and weightier reasons ouer-ruled mee, and enforced mee to waieue the benefit of that priuiledge: for, looking into the nature of the question then in hand, and examining the circumstances, I found the case to bee rare, and the matter of great import and consequence, as being a speciall and principall part of the blessed and happy vnion of Great Britaine.

I heard many learned and iudicious arguments, made by the reuerend iudges: and finding that they did not all concur in opinion (though the number was indeede so few, of them that differed, that in Greece it would not make a plurall number) and that some things were by them omitted, which seemed to mee to be both pertinent to the matter, and necessary to bee knowne, and more proper and fit to bee spoken by me, respecting the place I should, than by them, that did wholly binde themselves to the forme and rule of legall argument and discourse: I thought that I could not, in due tie, sit as a dumbe and idle hearer onlie; the cause being iudicially depending in the high court of Chancerie, where I was to iudge of it according to lawe, following the rule of mine owne conscience, and the measure of mine owne vnderstanding, and not to bee swayed with the weight of other mens opinions.

I considered also, that although silentij tutum primum is often true in humane policie, yet sometime there is crimen reticentie; and therefore the prophet saied, ne mihi quia tacui. And Chrysostome obserueth, that, tribus modis in veritatem peccatur: 1. veritatem pro timore tacendo: 2. veritatem in mendacium commutando: 3. veritatem non defendendo. Remembering this, my conscience told me, that howsoeuer silence might in this case haue excused mee of the second, yet I could not haue escaped by silence, the chief iustice of the Common Pleas publicly deliver in the end of his argument in the Exchequer-Chamber. First, that no commandment or mes- sage by word or writing was sent or delivered from any whatsoever to any of the iudges to cause them to incline to any opinion in this case; which I remember, for that it is honourable for the state, and consonant to the laws and statutes of this realm. Secondly, there was observed, what a concurrence of judgments, resolutions, and rules, there be in our books in all ages concerning this case, as if they had been prepared for the deciding of the question of this point: and that (which never fell out in any doubtful case) no one opinion in all our books is against this judgment. Thirdly, that the five iudges of the King's Bench, who adjourned this case into the Exchequer-Chamber, rather adjourned it for weight than difficulty, for all they in their arguments una voce concurred with the judgment. Fourthly, that never any case was adjudged in the Exchequer-Chamber with greater concordance and less variety of opinions, the lord-chancellor and twelve of the iudges concurring in one opinion. Fifthly, that there was not in any remembrance so honourable, great, and intelligent an auditory at the hearing of the arguments of any Exchequer-Chamber case, as was at this case now adjudged. Sixthly, it appeareth, that iurisprudentia legis communis Angliae est scientia socialis & copiosa: sociable, in that it agreeth with the principles and rules of other excellent sciences, diuine and human: copious, for that quamvis ad ea quae frequentius accidunt iura adaptantur, yet in a case so rare, and of such a quality, that los is the assured end of the practice of it (for no alien can purchase lands, but he loseth them, and ipso facto the king is entitled thereunto, in respect whereof a man would think few men would attempt it) there should be such a multitude and sarrago of authorities in all successions of ages, in our books and book-cases, for the deciding of a point of so rare an accident. Et sic determinata & terminata est ista questio.

The judgment in the said case, as entered on record, &c.

Whereupon all and singular the premises being seen, and by the court of the lord the now king here diligently inspected and examined, and mature deliberation being had thereof; for that it appears to the court of the lord the now king here, that the aforesaid plea of the said Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith, above pleaded, is not sufficient in law to bar the said Robert Calvin from having an answer to his aforesaid writ: therefore it is considered by the court of the lord the now king here, that the aforesaid Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith to the writ of the said Robert do further answer.

[See now the statutes for the union of both kingdoms.]

not diuine, or prophesie de futuris, I leaue that as iustice Yelverton did.

I am free and at libertie, nullius addictus iurare in verba magistri, and therefore I will speake ingenuously and freely.

In the arguing of this case, some thinges, which are of great weight with mee, haue (in mine opinion) bene passed ouer too lightly; and some other thinges, which seeme to me but light, haue bene ouerweighed, as I thinke.

Halfe an howers time longer or shorter I meane not to strue for; and therefore I will presume on your patience, and assume to my selfe such conuenient time as others haue done; and yet I will husband time as well as I can.

I will not be abashed to strengthen my weake memory with helpe of some scribled papers, as others haue done: for I accompt it a point of wisdomie to followe wise mens examples.

Other exordium, insinuation, protestation, or preface for the matter it selfe, either to prepare attentue and beneuolent auditors, or to stirre offence or dislike against either partie, I meane not to vse. It is fit for orators; I neuer professed the art; I had neuer skill in it: and it is not decorum for iudges, that ought to respect the matter, and not the humours of the hearers.

The exordium the ciuilians vse in their sentences I like well; in Dei nomine amen, & Deo primum inuocato. Other exordium I care not for.

from offending in the first and last. And if Pellus thought it not reason, to send a prisoner, without shewing the causes which were layed against him, I might haue bene worthily & iustly censured, if vpon other mens arguments, and as it were sine implicata, I should haue pronounced my iudgement and sentence in so great a cause, without declaring the grounds and reasons whereupon I stood. Thus, due tie and necessity (for, ratio sapienti necessitas) were the causes that induced mee to speake in this rare and weightie cause, and the force of truth moued mee to speake that which I did speake, without respect of pleasing or displeasing any. And so, hauing the warrant of a sincere conscience, which is truly said to be, veluti comes, & testis, & huiusmodi; I haue in the Chancerie iudged and decreed the case for R. C. And the like iudgement is also giuen by the iudges of the King's Bench, in the assise depending in that court. The decree and iudgement being thus passed, diuerse vnperfect reports, and seuerall patches and pieces of my speech haue bin put in writing, and dispersed into many hands, and some offered to the presse. The kings maiestie, hauing knowledge thereof, misliked it; and thereupon commanded me to deliuer to him in writing, the whole discourse of that which I said in that cause.

Thus I was put to an vnexpected new labour, to reuiue my scribled & broken papers. Out of which (according to the charge imposed vpon me) I gathered all which I had before spoken, and so set it downe faithfully & plainly, and (as neare as I could) in the same words I vitered it. It pleased his sacred maiestie to take some view of it; and taking occasion thereby, to remember the diligence of the lord chiefe iustice of the Common Pleas, for the summary report he had published of the iudges arguments, he gaue mee in charge to cause this to be likewise put in print, to prevent the printing of such mistaken and vnperfect reports of it, as were already scattered abroad.

Whatsoeuer it is, it was first conceived & spoken out of conscience & duty; and is now published in humble obedience to my most gracious soueraigne. And so I offer and commend it to your good acceptance and fauourable interpretation.

T. Ellesmere, Canc.
Tha

The case now depending in Chancery, which is adjourned to the 10th of the month of June, is thus:

Robert Caluine, sonne and heire apparant of James lord Caluine of Coltross in the realme of Scotland, an infant of three yeares of age, borne in the said realme of Scotland, maketh title by his bill to a messuage and garden with the appurtenances in the parish of St. Buttolph without Bishops-gate in the cite of London; and complaineth against John Bingley, and Richard Griffin, for detaining the evidences concerning the same messuage and lands, and taking the profits thereof.

The defendants pleade, that the plaintife is an alien; and that in the third yeere of his maiesties raigne of England, and in the nine and thirtieth yeere of his maiesties raigne of Scotland, hee was borne in the realme of Scotland, within the ligeance of his said maiestie, of his realme of Scotland, and out of the ligeance of our foueraigne lord the king of his realme of England.

And the defendants say further, that at the time of the birth of the complainant, and long before, and ever sithence, the said kingdome of Scotland was, and still is, ruled and governed by the proper lawes and statutes of the said kingdome of Scotland, and not by the lawes and statutes of this realme of England; and therefore the defendants demaund iudgement, whether the complainant ought to bee answered to his said bill, or shall be received to prosecute the said suite against the defendants, being for, and concerning the title of inheritance, and evidence touching the same.

Heereupon the complainant hath demurred in law.

This is the speciall case now depending in the Chancery; in which, and touching all like cases in generall, mine opinion is, and since the question was first mooued hath bene, that these post-nati are not aliens to the king, nor to his kingdome of England, but by their birth-right are liege subiects to the king, and capable of estates of inheritance and freehold of landes in England; and may haue and maintaine as wel reall as personall actions for the same: and that therefore the now complainant Robert Caluine ought to bee answered.

This opinion I did first conceiue vpon those rules and reasons in lawe (as well the common law of England, as the ciuile law) which heereafter in the course of my speech I will remember. And in this opinion I haue bene since confirmed by many great and weighty reasons.

First, in the statute made in the first yeare of his maiesties raigne of England, authorizing the treatie betweene the commissioners for both the kingdomes, it is said (as iustice Warburton noted well) that both the famous & ancient realmes of England and Scotland are now vnited in allegiance and loyall subiection in his royall person, to his maiestie, and his posteritie for euer.

Heere wee haue the iudgement of the parliament, that there is a vnite in allegiance to one royall person; and therefore I see not how wee may out of imaginarie conceits, and by subtile distinctions straine our wittes to frame seuerall allegiances to one and the same royall person, contrary to so plaine a declaration made by parliament.

Next followeth his maiesties proclamation 20 Octobris 1604, by which hee assumed to himselfe the name and stile of king of Great Brittain: in which proclamation, among many other weighty reasons, this is added for one, we haue receiued from those that be skilful in the lawes of the land, that immediately vpon our succession, diuerse of our auncient lawes of this realme are ipso facto expired; as namely, that of feudge, and of the naturalization of the subiects. This was not done sodainely, nor lightly; but vpon graue and serious deliberation, and aduise: and therefore seemeth to mee to be a matter of great importance, and not to be lightly regarded.

The same twentieth of October, these commissioners beganne their treatie. Of the graue and iudicious course which they held, in debating of the matter then propounded, I will forbear to speake: but for this point of naturalization now in question, their resolution in the end was thus: That it shall be propounded to both the parliaments at the next sessions, that an act be made containing a declaration, as followeth: that all the subiects of both the realmes, borne since the decease of Elizabeth the late queen of England of happie memory, and all, that shal be born hereafter vnder the obedience of his maiestie and his royall progeny, are by the common lawes of both the realmes, and shall be for euer, inhabed to obtaine, succede, inherite, and possesse all lands, goods, and chattels, &c. as fully and amply as the subiects of either realme respectiue might haue done, or may doe in any sort within the kingdome where they were borne. This, after long debating, and graue and deliberate consideration, was, in the end, the resolution of the greater part of the commissioners, not one openly gainesaying it. And diuerse of the principall iudges of the realme were present at all times when the point was debated. And herein I note the wise and iudicious forme of that resolution, which was not to propound to the parliament the making of a new lawe, but a declaration of the common lawes of both the realmes in this question.

Now, if wee consider who these commissioners were, what lords of the higher house, and what persons of the common house, selected of all degrees, most eminent for their learning and iudgement, as well in ciuile and common law, as in knowledge, and experience other waies, beeing assisted by the graue iudges of the realme: if this, I say, be well considered, then this resolution must be accounted and esteemed as a matter of great and weighty importance, and much to be regarded in the deciding of this question.

According to this act of the commissioners, the case was propounded in the next session of parliament. In the higher house, the iudges were required to deliuer their opinions. There were then eleauen iudges present; whereof tenne did with one vniforme consent affirme the law to be, that the post-nati were not aliens, but natural subiects (one onely dissenting). After this, the question was debated in a solemne conference betweene both the houses of parliament at seuerall times, and at great length, and with much libertie; nothing was omitted that wit or art could inuent to object against this opinion; and that was done by men of great learning, and singular iudgement in the common lawe, and ciuile lawe, and by some other gentlemen of the common house, of rare gifts for their learning, knowledge, elocution and experience.

At this conference the iudges were present; who, after they had heard all that was, or could be said, did confirme their former opinions, which they had before deliuered in the higher house: three of the chiefe of them declaring their reasons, and all the rest (saueing one alone) concurring in the same. So, here was now a generall resolution by all the iudges of the realme (one excepted) and that deliuered, not priuately, but in parliament; which without more adoe had bene sufficient to haue decided and determined this question.

Touching the proclamation, it was discretely and modestly said by a learned gentleman of the lower house, that it was of great respect, and much to bee regarded; but yet it was not binding, nor concluding: for, proclamations can neither make, nor declare lawes: and besides, that this proclamation was not grounded vpon any resolution of the reuerend iudges; but vpon the opinion of some skilfull in the lawes of this land.

Of the strength of proclamations, being made by the king, by the aduise of his counsell and iudges, I will not discoure; yet I will admonish those that bee learned and studious in the lawes, and by their profession are to giue counsell, and to direct themselues, and others, to take heede that they doe not contemne, or lightly regard such proclamations.

And to induce them thereunto, I desire them to looke vpon, and consider aduisedly these few proclamations, prouisions, or ordinaunces, which I will point out vnto them; and of what validitie and force they haue bene houlden to bee in construction of lawe, albeit they be neither statutes, nor acts of parliament.

M. 4. H. 3. in Dower, the defendant pleaded, quod petens est de potestate regis Francie, & residens in Francia; et prouisum est a consilio regis, quod nullus de potestate regis Francie respondeatur in Anglia, antequam Angli respondeantur de iure suo in Francia. This the plaintifes attorney could not denie; and thereupon the iudgement was, ideo sine die.

Anno 20 Hen. 3. certaine prouisions and ordinaunces were made which were called prouisiones Merton, where the king assembled his archbishops, bishops, earles, and barons for the coronation of the king, and his wife queene Elenor; and the words be, prouisum est in curia dom. regis apud Merton coram Willihelmo Cantuariensi archiepiscopo, & coepiscopis, suffraganeis suis, et coram maiori parte comitum & baronum Anglie ibidem existentium pro coronatione ipsius domini regis & Elionore regine, pro qua omnes vocati fuerunt, cum tractatum esset de communi utilitate regni super articulis subscriptis, ita prouisum fuit & concessum, tam a predictis archiepiscopis, episcopis, comitibus, & baronibus, & alijs. De viduis primis, &c.

Fitzherbert citeth a prouision made anno 19 H. 3. in these words, et prouisum fuit coram domino rege, archiepiscopis, episcopis, comitibus, & baronibus, quod nulla offisa ultimæ, presentationis de cætero capiatur de ecclesiis, præbendis nec de præbendis. This prouision was allowed and continued for lawe, vntill W. 2. anno 13 Edw. 1. cap. 5. which prouides the contrary by expresse words.

Anno 6 Ed. 1. the king and his iudges made certaine explanations of the statute of Gloucester, which are called explanations statuti Gloucestræ; and these be the words, Postmodum per dominum regem & iusticiarios suos factæ sunt quedam explanationes quorundam articulorum superius positorum. Which explanations haue euer since bene received as a law.

There is a proclamation by king Ed. 3. bearing teste at Westminster anno 15 Ed. 3. And iudge Thorpes opinion pa. 39 Ed. 3. 7. both which I will now forbear to report, and wish the students to reade the same in the printed bookes, where they shall see both the effect, and the reason, and the cause thereof; they are worth their reading, and may informe and direct them what iudgement to make of proclamations.

Touching the opinion of the iudges, some haue objected (yet modestly, and I suppose, according to their conscience and vnderstanding) that there is not like regarde to be had of iudges opinions giuen in parliament, as ought to bee of their iudgements in their proper courts and seates of iustice: for, in those places their oath bindeth them; but not so in the other.

1. To this I answer: the reuerence, and woorthinesse of the men is such, as is not to bee quarrelled and doubted of, if there were no oathe at all: for, if men of so great and eminent places feare not God and his iudgements, euen out of a religious conscience, which is fructum ante peccatum, & flagrum post peccatum, it may be doubted that the externall ceremonie of adding a booke will little auale.

2. Their oath doth bind them as much in the court of parliament, as in their proper courts: for, that is the supreme court of all; and they are called thither by the kings writ, not to sit as tell-clocks, or idle hearers; but, quod personaliter intersint nobiscum, ac cum cæteris de consilio nostro super dictis negotiis tractaturi, vestrumque consilium impensuri; and those negotia be ardua & vrgentia negotia regni, &c. And their oath, amongst other things, is, that they shall counsell the king truly in his businesse.

3. This exception may serue against the iudges, as well in cases when they sit and giue iudgement, as iustices of assises, nisi prius, oyer and terminer, and gaole deliuerie, as in this case of parliament: for, there they haue none other oath but their generall oath.

4. It becomes vs to esteeme of iudges now, as our forefathers esteemed them in times past; for, as they succede them in time and place (I thanke God, and the king, I haue neither cause to feare any for displeasure, pleasure, nor to flatter any for fauour: wherefore I will neither be affraid, nor abashed to speake what I thinke:) I say therefore, that as our iudges now succede the former iudges, in time and place; so they succede them, and are not inferior to them in wisedome, learning, integrity, and all other iudicious and religious vertues.

The force and strength of the kings proclamations.

Then let vs see what the wisedome of parliaments in times past attributed to the iudges opinions declared in parliament; of which there bee many examples; but I will trouble you but with two or three.

I wil not remember Richard the seconds time (of which some of our chroniclers doe talke idely, and vnderstand little) where power and might of some potent persons oppressed iustice, and faithfull iudges, for expounding the law soundly, and truly.

1. The first, that I will remember, is this, in the parliament 28 H. 6. 16 Ianuarij, the commons made suite, that W. de la Poole duke of Suffolke should bee committed to prifon for many treasons and other hainous crimes committed by him. The lordes in parliament were in doubt what answer to giue; they demaunded the opinion of the iudges. Their opinion was, that hee ought not to bee committed; and their reason was, for that the commons did not charge him with anie particular offence, but with generall flanders and reports; and therefore because the specialties were not shewed, hee was not to bee committed. This opinion was allowed; and thereupon 28 Ianuarij, the commons exhibited certaine speciall articles against him, viz. that hee conspired with the French king to inuade the realme, &c. And thereupon hee was committed to the Tower.

2. In the parliament anno 31 H. 6. in the vacation (the parliament being continued by prorogation) Thomas Thorpe the speaker was condemned in a thousand pounds dammages in an action of trespassse, brought against him by the duke of Yorke, and was committed to prifon in execution for the same. After, when the parliament was re-assembled, the commons made suite to the king and the lords, to haue Thorpe the speaker deliuered, for the good exploite of the parliament; whereupon the duke of Yorke counsell declared the whole case at large. The lords demaunded the opinion of the iudges, whether, in that case, Thorpe ought to bee deliuered out of prifon by priuiledge of parliament. The iudges made this answer, that they ought not to determine the priuiledge of that high court of parliament; but for the declaration of proceeding in lower courts, in cases where writtes of superfedeas for the priuiledge of the parliament be brought vnto them, they answered, that if any person that is a member of the parliament bee arrested in such cases as bee not for treason or felonie, or for furetie of peace, or condemnation had before the parliament, it is vsed that such persons be released, and may make attorney, so as they may haue their freedome and libertie, freely to intend the parliament. Hereupon it was concluded, that Thorpe should still remaine in prifon according to the lawe, notwithstanding the priuiledge of parliament, and that hee was the speaker. Which resolution was declared to the commons by Walter Moyle, one of the kings sericants at lawe. And then the commons were commaunded in the kings name, by the bishop of Lincolne (in the absence of the archbishop of Canterbury then chanceller) to choose another speaker.

3. In the parliament an. 7 H. 8. a question was moued, whether spirituall persons might bee conuicted before temporall iudges for criminall causes. There sir Iohn Fineux and the other iudges deliuered their opinion, that they might and ought to bee so. And their opinion was allowed, and maintained by the king and the lords: and D. Standish, who before had houlden the same opinion, was deliuered from the bishops. And it is worth the noting, what wordes passed in that case betweene the archbishop of Canterbury and that worthy iudge Fineux.

4. If a writ of error bee brought in parliament vpon a iudgement giuen in the King's Bench, the lords of the higher house alone (without the commons) are to examine the errors; but that is by the aduise and counsell of the iudges, who are to informe them what the lawe is, and so to direct them in their iudgement. And if the iudgement bee reuerfed, then commaundment is to bee giuen to the lord chancellour to doe execution accordingly. And so it was in anno 17 R. 2. in a writte of error brought in parliament by the deane and chapter of Lichfield, against the prior and conuent of Newport-Panell, as appeareth by the record. But if the iudgement bee affirmed, then the court of the King's Bench are to proceede to execution of the iudgement, as it appeareth in Flowerdewes case P. 1 H. 7. fol. 19. But it is to bee noted, that in all such writtes of error, the lords are to proceede according to the lawe; and for their iudgement therein they are informed and guided by the iudges, and doe not follow their owne opinions or discretions otherwise.

This extrauagant discourse touching proclamations, and iudges opinions deliuered in parliament, and how they ought to bee regarded, I haue thought materiall and necessarie, both in respect of the time wherein wee liue, and the matter which we haue in hand. And these bee thinges which I thinke haue bene too lightly passed ouer. But if you condemne it as impertinent, I must then confesse I haue presumed too much vpon your patience; I pray you beare with mee, it is but my labour lost, and a little time mis-spent, if it seeme so vnto you: you are wont to pardon greater faultes; call it either a passe-time, or waste-time, as pleaseth you. Now, to returne to the case we haue in hand.

The generall question hauing had this passage (by proclamation, by commission, and by debating in parliament) remaineth yet without conclusion or iudgement: and as euerie man abounds in his owne fence, so euerie one is left to his owne opinion; specially those that were not satisfied with the graue resolution of the iudges in parliament, which (although some may tearme and accompt as bare opinions) I must alwayes valew, and esteeme as a reall and absolute iudgement. Now, I say, this generall question is reduced to two particular cases, and is iudicially depending in two the highest courts of iustice in this realme; and that is by one complainant against seuerall defendants for the freehoulde and inheritance of seuerall parcells of land: and (as M. Solicitor said well) is a case, not fained, nor surmised, but a true case betweene true parties: and being questio iuris, non facti, is by both these courts adiourned hither to bee decided, and determined by all the iudges of England, as the rarenesse of the case, and the weight and importaunce of it, both for the present and the future, doth require.

And the case being of this nature and qualitie, it is not amisse to obserue the proceeding in it: for, it is woorth the obseruing, and not to bee forgotten. The defendants counsell, men of great learning, and in their profession inferiour to none of their qualitie and degree, men conuersant and well exercised in the question, and such as in the great conference in parliament, most of them were specially selected and chosen (for so they wel deserued) as most sufficient, able, and fit, as well for learning and knowledge, as for all other giftes of witte and nature, to handle so great and rare a question. And although it hath pleased them of their good discretion to vse the paines but of a few in the debating and arguing of the case at the barre: yet no doubt that was done vpon mature deliberation and conference with all the residue: and whatsoever the spirites, the learning, the wisedome, and knowledge of all the others, vpon long study could affoorde, was put into the mouth of those few to serue as organs and instruments to deliuer it vnto vs; which they haue so well and sufficiently performed, that they deserue great praise and commendation: for, in my poore opinion, the witte of man could not deuise to say more touching this question in lawe than they haue saied. And whatsoever hath bene fithence spoken for that part, it is for the matter but the same in substance, which the counsell at the barre did deliuer; though it hath bene varied in forme, and amplified with other wordes and phrases, and furnished with shew of some other strained cases and authorities.

The handling of it by the learned and reuerend iudges hath bene such, as it may appeare to the world, that euerie one hath spoken his owne heart and conscience; and hath laboured by long studie to search out the lawe and the true reason of the lawe in this rare case; and so they haue spoken, as coram Deo & angelis: none, with desire to seeme popular; for nothing ought to bee tam popolare quam veritas: none to seeme to be time-seruers, or men-pleasers; for the king (whome vnder God they serue) being pater patrie, and soueraigne head of both these great vnited kingdomes, is to them both, like as the head of a naturall body is to all the members of the same, and is not, nor can not bee partiall more to one than to another. Hee deliteth in truth, and desireth it; and without truth hee can not bee pleased. Hee ruleth by his lawe, and commaundeth his iudges to minister to all his subjects lawe and iustice sincerely, and truly; and equally and indifferently, without any partiall respect.

It was neuer scene, but that in all rare and difficult cases, there haue bene diuersitie of opinions; but yet without breach of charitie, which is the bond of vnitie. So it hath happened in this case. The case hath bene argued at large by foureteene learned iudges; twelue of them haue concurred in iudgement, but vpon seuerall reasons: for, as many wayes may leade to one end of the iourney; so diuerse and seuerall reasons may conduce to one true and certaine conclusion.

And here I may not omit the woorthie memorie of the late graue and reuerend iudge, sir Iohn Popham, chiefe iustice of the King's Bench deceased (a man of great wisedome, and of singular learning and iudgement in the lawe) who was absolutely of the same opinion, as he often declared, as well in open parliament, as otherwise.

The apostle Thomas doubted of the resurrection of our Sauour Iesus Christ, when all the rest of the apostles did firmly beleue it: but that his doubting confirmed, in the whole church, the faith of the resurrection.

The two woorthie and learned iudges that haue doubted in this case, as they beare his name, so I doubt not but their doubting hath giuen occasion to cleare the doubt in others; and so to confirme in both the kingdomes, both for the present and the future, the truth of the iudgement in this case.

Thus, my lords, haue you hitherto nothing from mee but Amen, to that which all the iudges (sauiug two) haue saied; and much more you cannot expect from mee: yet, since I must giue iudgement in this case; and I saied in the beginning, that I would render the reasons of my iudgement (for that is the course of argument I must houlde); I will now deliuer vnto you, what are the speciall and principall reasons that first haue induced mee, and still moue mee to houlde the opinion that I doe: and as I goe, I will indeuour to cleere some doubts and questions, that partly in the conference in parliament, and partly otherwise, I haue heard made; not onely touching this case it selfe, but also touching the forme and manner how it is to be decided and iudged.

The case is rare, and new (as it hath bene often saied); it was neuer decided terminis terminantibus; it was neuer iudged by any statute lawe, which is a positieue lawe; nor by iudgement of the iudges of the common lawe.

Now, the first question is (as some would haue it) how it is to be iudged, and by what lawe; and haue wished that it might haue stayed vntill the parliament, and so bee decided by parliament. They that make this doubt, I will let them demurre, and die in their doubts: for, the case being adiourned hither before all the iudges of England, is now to be iudged by them according to the common lawe of England; and not tarrise for a parliament: for, it is no transcendent question; but that the common lawe can and ought to rule it, and ouer-rule it, as iustice Williams said well.

But then this question produceth another; that is, what is the common lawe of England? whether it be ius scriptum, or non scriptum? and such other like niceties: for, wee haue in this age so many questionists; and quo modo and quare, are so common in most mens mouthes, that they leaue neither religion, nor lawe, nor king, nor counsell, nor policie, nor gouernment out of question.

And the end they haue in this question, what is the common lawe, is to shake and weaken the ground and principles of all gouernment: and in this particular question of the law of England, to ouerthrow that law whereby this realme hath many hundred yeares bene gouerned in all honour honour and happinesse: or at least to cast an aspersiō vpon it, as though it were weake and vncertaine. I will therefore declare mine opinion in this point plainly and confidently, as I thinke in my conscience, and as I finde to be sufficiently warranted by ancient writers, and good authorities voide of all exception.

The ground of the common law. The common law of England is grounded vpon the law of God, and extends itselfe to the originall lawe of nature, and the vniuersall lawe of nations.

When it respectes the church, it is called lex ecclesie Anglicanæ, as magna charta, ca. 1. Ecclesia Anglicana habeat omnia sua iura integra & illa sua.

When it respectes the crowne, and the king, it is sometimes called lex coronæ, as in stat. 25 Edw. 3. cap. 1. Lex coronæ Angliæ est & semper fuit, &c. And it is sometimes called lex regia, as in Registro fo. 61. Ad iura regia spectat: and, ad conseruationem iurium coronæ nostræ, & ad iura regia ne deperant, &c.

When it respectes the common subiects, it is called, lex terræ; as in magna charta ca. 29. Nisi per legale iudicium parium, vel per legem terræ.

Yet, in all these cases, whether it respectes the church, the crowne, or the subiects, it is comprehended vnder this generall tearme, the common lawes of England: which, although they bee for a great parte thereof reduced into writing; yet they are not originally leges scriptæ.

This I first learned of the late lord treasurer Burleigh (whose honourable memorie England can neuer forget) and hearing it from him, I indeouored by my priuate studie to satisfie my selfe thorowlie in it. And, whosoever shall well consider the lawes of England, which were before the Conquest (whereof wee haue some remnants and patches) or since the Conquest vntill magna charta, anno 9 H. 3. will make little doubt of it.

In H. 2. time Glanuile writeth thus; leges Anglicanas licet non scriptas, leges appellari non videtur absurdum.

And in Hen. 3. time Bracton writeth thus; cum autem ferè in omnibus regionibus vntur legibus & iure scripto, sola Anglia vsa est in suis finibus, iure non scripto & consuetudine; in ea quidem, ex non scripto ius venit quod vsus comprobauit.

But I may not agree with Bracton, that sola Anglia vsa est iure non scripto: for I find that the grauest, and the greatest learned writers of the ciuile lawe, both auncient and of this our time, doe hold the same opinion, touching the ciuile lawe it selfe, for thus they write: ex non scripto ius venit quod vsus approbavit. And thus; ius ciuile dictum ex non scripto natum est. And, ius non scriptum dicitur consuetudo, non quod scripto perpetuo careat, hoc enim falsum est: nam & consuetudines in memoriam constantiorem reducantur in scripturam, ut cætera quoq. quæ sine scriptura perficiuntur: sed non scriptum ius est: id est, quod à scriptura vis eius non capiat nec pendeat. So, hereby it may appeare how in this wee concur with the ciuile lawe.

But hereupon these questionists moue an other question, viz. If the common lawe be not written, how then shall it be knowne?

To this I aunswer; it is the common custome of the realme (as Bracton saith, ius venit quod vsus comprobauit): and it standeth vpon two maine pillars and principall parts, by which it is to bee learned and knowne.

1. The first is, certaine knowne principles and maxims, and ancient customes, against which there neuer hath beene, nor ought to bee any dispute. As in cases of subiects; an estate in fee-simple, for life, for yeeres, dower, curtesie, &c. In cases of the crowne, the female to inherite: the eldest sole to bee preferred: no respect of halfe blood: no tenant in dower, or by the curtesie of the crowne: no disability of the king's person by infancie, &c.

2. The second is, where there be no such principles, then, former iudgements giuen in like cases: and these be but arbitria iudicium, & responsa prudentum, receiued, allowed, and put in practise and execution by the king's authoritie.

Of these Bracton speaketh; ego H. de Bracton animus erexi ad vetera iudicia iustorum perscrutanda; facta ipsorum, consilia, & responsa in unam summam redigendo compilauit.

And before the Conquest, king Ethelbert caused a booke to bee made, which was called Decreta Iudiciorum: and king Alfred did the like, as master Lambard, a iudicious and learned obseruer of antiquities, doth remember.

Of these also the iudges speake H. 33. H. 6. Moyle, fo. 8. we rule the law according to the auncient course. Ashton, fol. 9. all our lawe is guided by vs, and by statute. And Pryset saith, fol. 9. there cannot be a positive law, but such as was iudged or made by statute. Wherein I note also that hee equalleth a iudgement with a statute.

In 36 H. 6. fol. 25. Fortescue reasoneth thus; the lawe is as I haue saide, and so hath beene alwaies since the lawe beganne.

In 37 H. 6. f. 22. Ascue reasons thus; such a charter hath bin allowable in the time of our predecessours, which were as sage and learned as wee bee.

In H. 4. Edw. 4. fol. 41. Markham reasoneth thus; it is good for vs to doe as it hath bin vsed before this time, and not to keepe one way one day for one party, and another day the contrary for the other party: and so the former precedents be sufficient for vs to follow: and iudgement was giuen accordingly.

And in the former case 36 H. 6. Fortescue saith further; wee haue many courses and formes which be bounden for lawe.

Also euerie one of these foure principall courts, the Chancery, King's Bench, Common-Pleas, and Eschequer, haue in many things seuerall courtes and formes which are obserued for law, and that not onely in that proper court, but also in all courtes through the realme; whereof many examples bee remembered in the case of the Mines in Plowden's Commentaries.

3. The third: but if there be no such former iudgements, nor direct examples or precedents, then this rule hath a further extension, which is this.

There is a rule in the common lawe, that in nouo casu nouum remedium est apponendum. Et concordent clerici de breue faciendo, ita quod nullus recedat à Cancellaria sine remedio: for the Chancery is properly officina iustitiæ & equitatis; where all original writs (which in ancient times were the grounds of all suites) are deuised and framed. And these clerici were graue and auncient men; skilfull, and long experienced in the course of the Chancery; and called clerici de prima forma: and of late time magistri Cancellariæ; who in new and strange cases, besides their owne knowledge and experience, had oftentimes conference with the graue iudges for the deuising and framing of new writs when neede required. And this I take to bee the same which is in the statute W. 2.

cap. 24. Et quotiescunque de cætero euenerit in Cancellaria, quod in vno casu reperitur breue, & in consimili casu, cadente sub eodem iure & simili indigente remedio, non reperitur, concordent clerici de Cancellaria in breui faciendo, vel atterminent querentes in proximum parlamentum: et scribantur casus in quibus concordare non possunt, & referant eos ad proximum parlamentum: et de consensu iurisperitorum fiat breue, ne contingat de cætero, quod curia regis deficiat conuerentibus in iusticia perquirenda.

Wherein I note these three things. First, the clerkes are to agree; and if they agree, that is an end, and standes for lawe, and then no reference to the parliament. Second, if the clerkes agree not, and so the case be referred to the parliament; then de consensu iurisperitorum fiat breue: so consensus iurisperitorum is the rule, and not the multitude of vulgar opinions. The third is, that iustice faile not them which complaine; which will often faile, if you stay vntill a parliament; for parliaments are not to be called for the wrong of a few priuate subiects, but for the great and vrgent affaires of the king and the realme.

I finde also a like rule in the ciuile lawe; ubi non est directæ lex standum est arbitrio iudicis, vel producendum ad similia. And another faith, de similibus ad similia iudicium & argumentatio recipiuntur.

4. Besides these, there is an other generall and certaine rule in the ciuile lawe, which I referue to the last parte of that which I meane to speake in this matter.

So, leauing that vnto a more proper place, I will hereupon conclude, that if there bee no former iudgements, nor examples, nor precedents to bee found, then concordia clericorum, & arbitrium iudicium is to seeke out the true and solide reason; and thereupon to ground their iudgements in all new cases: for it was truely saide by a learned gentleman of the lower house, deficiente lege recurrendum est ad consuetudinem: deficiente consuetudine recurrendum ad rationem. And so from the iudges we shall haue responsa prudentum to decide all such new cases and questions. And according to this rule, all such new doubts and questions haue beene resolved and decided by the graue iudges in former times.

But here, before I proceede further, I am to make a suite, which is this:

That whatsoever I haue spoken, or shall happen to speake of the ciuile lawe; or whatsoever I shall cite out of any writer of that law, I pray fauor of my masters that professe it. I acknowledge that lawe to be auncient and generall in many parts of the world; and I reuerence the professors of it, as men of great learning, wisdom, and iudgement. I professe it not; I haue learned little of it; but in that little I haue found that in the reall and essentiall partes of iustice, the ciuile and common lawe doe in many things concur, though they differ much in the forme and manner of proceeding. And that which I shall haue occasion to produce of that lawe, will bee to shew how the common law and ciuile doe agree in one reason and iudgement in those things which I shall speake of.

Yet I must take libertie to say, that neither in Spaine, nor in France (those two great monarchies) it is not generally receiued nor allowed as a concluding and binding law.

They take there the reason of it onely as a direction to their proceeding and iudgement: but to produce or alleadge it as a concluding or binding law, was no lesse than capitis pœna.

This I make not of my selfe; for, besides common practise and experience, I haue an honest and substantiall witnesse, master Adam Blackwood a Scottishman, a man of singular learning in the ciuile lawe, who defendeth in like manner the lawes of Scotland, as appeareth in his learned booke intituled, Pro Regibus Apologia, written by him against a seditious dialogue or libell made by George Buchanan, de iure regni apud Scotos, where he tells him, aliud sceptrum, aliud pleetrum. But it is not amisse to recite his owne words, which are thus; Philippus cognomento Pulcher, cum Lutetia: supremæ iurisdictionis curiam institueret, eam Romano iure solutam esse declarauit: in eamq. sententiam vetus extat eius curiæ decretum, ne causarum patroni Romanarum legum auctoritatem patriæ legibus opponant. Sed cum illæ bono & æquo niti videntur & probabilem utilitatis publicæ causam continere, nos earum vitium haud imperio, sed ratione, cui omnes homines naturæ præscripto subiiciuntur. Quin etsi quid aduersus rationem legum Romanarum perperam ac temerè iudicatum est, id earum multis pœnis haud æstimatur, sed vel principis, vel superioris magistratus arbitratu. Nam cum in publici muneris partem admittimur, & conceptis verbis inauguramur, solemnī sacramento regiarum & municipalium legum atq. morum obseruationem, nulla Romani iuris mentione, spondemus. Apud Hispanos capitis pœnam ijs indictam legimus, qui Romanarum legum auctoritatem vel in foro laudarent, vel in puluere scholastico profiterentur. Sed si quid occurreret patrijs legibus ac moribus indefinitum quod iudicanti religionem adferret, unicui erat eximendo scrupulo regis consulendi remedium. Alaricus Tolosæ regnans, idem Gothis imperauit, ut si quis aduersus ipsius leges ciuile Romanorum ius citaret, temerè factum morte lueretur.

Now to returne to that which I haue touched before, I say, that when there is no direct lawe, nor precise example, we must recurrere ad rationem, & ad responsa prudentum: for, although quod non lego, non credo, may bee a true and certaine rule in diuinitie; yet for interpretation of lawes, it is not alwaies so: for wee must distinguish betweene fidem moralem, and fidem diuinam, or else wee shall confound many things in the ciuile and polittike gouernement of kingdoms and states. For, the first precedent, which wee haue now, had no precedent when it began; but as Tacitus saith, quæ nunc vetustissima creduntur noua fuerunt; & quod hodie exemplis tuemur, inter exempla futurum est. And to those that hold, that nothing is to bee done but by former examples, Horace speaketh thus; O imitatores seruum pecus: and Cicero saith, non exempla maiorum querenda, sed consilium est eorum à quibus exempla nata sunt explicandum.

Thus hath iustice beene duely administred in England, and thereby the kings haue ruled, the people haue beene gouerned, and the kingdome hath flourished for many hundred yeeres; and then no such busie questionists moued any quarrell against it.

Thus haue all doubts growing vpon magna charta, and charta de foresta, made in king Henry the thirds time, and vpon the statutes of Westm. 1. Westm. 2. Westm. 3. and many other statutes made in Ed. 1. time: and vpon prærogatiua regis, and many other statutes made in Ed. 2. time, beene from time to time expounded; and so of later times, the statutes of fines, of vses, of willes, and many more.

Thus also haue all doubts and cafes, whereof there was no statute or positue lawe, beene alwaies expounded: for such are most of the cafes which wee haue in our yeere-bookes, and bookes of reports, which are in effect nothing but responsa prudentum, as iustice Crooke did truly say.

Vpon this reason it is, that some lawes, as well statute lawe as common lawe, are obsolete and worne out of vse: for, all humane lawes are but leges temporis: and the wisdom of the iudges found them to bee vnmeet for the time they liued in, although very good and necessarie for the time wherein they were made. And therefore it is saide, leges humane nascuntur, vigent, & moriuntur, & habent ortum, statum, & occasum.

By this rule also, and vpon this reason it is, that oftentimes auncient lawes are changed by interpretation of the iudges, as well in cafes criminall as ciuile.

In criminall cafes the law was voluntas reputabitur pro facto; but it is not so now, sauing in treason onely.

In an appeale of maieme Britton, fol. 48. saith, soit le iudgement, que il perde auuel member, come il auer tolle a le plaintife; but it is not so now.

In auncient time, one present, aiding, comforting, and assisting to a murder, was taken to bee no principall, but an accessorie, as it appeareth M. 40 Edw. 3. fol. 42. & 40. Li. Aff. p. 8. & p. 25. But now in that case hee is iudged a principall. And so it was ruled by all the iustices M. 4 H. 7. 18. and so Plowden affirmeth the lawe to be, in his Commentaries fol. 99. & 100.

In ciuile causes in auncient time, the lawe was houlden, that hee in remainder in taile could not haue an action of waste, nor be receiued vpon default of tenant for life: but afterwards, the lawe was often iudged otherwise; and so is the common experience and practise at this day.

In anno 40 Ed. 3. 28. Fynchden, chiefe iustice of the Common Place, saith, that in auncient time the vicar could not haue an action against the parson; but hee saith the contrarie is vsed at this day, which is the better.

In auncient time a disseisee could not enter vpon the feoffee of the disseisor, for sauing of the warranty; but for many yeeres the lawe hath beene houlden otherwise, and so the common practise yet remaineth.

By this rule it is also, that words are taken and construed, sometimes by extension; sometimes by restriction; sometimes by implication; sometimes a disjunctiue for a copulatiue; a copulatiue for a disjunctiue; the present tense for the future; the future for the present; sometimes by equity out of the reach of the wordes; sometime wordes taken in a contrary sence; sometime figuratiuely, as contineus pro contento, and many other like: and of all these, examples be infinite, as well in the ciuile lawe as common lawe.

And oftentimes the reuerend iudges haue had a graue regarde in their proceeding, that before they would resolue, or giue iudgement in such new cafes, they desired to consult with the kings priuie counsell; as appeareth in diuerse cafes in king Edward the third his time.

R. W. assaulted Adam Brabson in prefence of the iustices of assise at Winchester, for which A. B. complained by bill before the said iustices, alledging this offence to bee in despite of the king and his iustices, to his damage of an hundred pounds. R. W. pleaded, not guiltie; and was found guiltie, and damages taxed to tenne pounds. Thereupon the iudges awarded him to prison in the sherifes keeping. And for the fine, and that which should be further done for the king, for the assault done in the prefence of the iudges, they would haue the aduise of the kings counsell: for in a like case, because R. C. did strike a iurour at Westminster, which passed in an enquest against one of his friends; it was adiudged by all the counsell, that his right hand should be cut off, and his lands and goods forfeited to the king. These be the wordes in the booke.

In this case I note three things.

1. The iudges consulted with the counsell.
2. They haue a like case before when the counsell was also consulted with, viz. anno 19 Ed. 3. and yet they would not proceede in this case before they had againe consulted with the counsell.
3. That before anno 19 Edw. 3. there was no like case nor precedent for such a iudgement; and therefore the iudges would not of themselves pronounce that heauy iudgement before they had conferred with the counsell touching the same. And after they had the opinion and aduise of the kings counsell, they proceeded to that iudgement.

Thomas Vghired knight brought a forme-done against a poore man and his wife; they came and yellected to the demaundant, which seemed suspicious to the court: whereupon they examined the matter, and staied iudgement, because it was suspicious. And Thorpe saide, that in the like case of Giles Blacket it was spoken of in parliament: and wee were commaunded, that when any like case should come, we should not go to iudgement without good aduise. Wherefore sue to the counsell, and as they will haue vs to doe, wee will; and otherwise not, in this case.

Greene and Thorpe were sent by the iudges to the kings counsell (where there were 24 bishops and earles) to demand of them, whether by the statute 14 Ed. 3. ca. 6. a word may be amended in a writ, aswell as a letter or a fillable; for, the statute speakes but of a letter or a fillable: and it was answered, that it may well be amended: for, there cannot be a word without a fillable; and that it was a nice question of so sage men.

Thus arbitria iudicum and responsa prudentum haue beene receiued, allowed, and reuerenced in all times as positue lawe; and so it must be still; for, otherwise much mischiefe and great inconuenience will ensue. For new cafes happen euery day: no lawe euer was, or euer can be made, that can prouide remedie for all future cafes, or comprehend all circumstances of humane actions which iudges are to determine. Therefore, when such happen, and complaint is made; what shall iudges doe? Shall they giue no remedie to the partie grieved? Shall they stay for a parliament? Interim patitur iustus. They must therefore follow dictamen rationis; and so giue speedie iustice. And in many matters of materiall circumstances they must guide themselves by discretion.

As in iudging vpon presumptions; to discerne which be presumptiones temerarie, which probabiles, which violente.

So for time; what is a conuenient time, and what not.

So for waste; what is waste punishable, and what not.

So for tenders of money; what is a conuenient place for tender of money, and what not: and what is a lawfull tender, and what not.

So for disparagement; what is a disparagement, and what not: and so of other the like cafes, which are infinite.

If it be said (for so some haue said) that if this be thus, then the common lawe of England is vncerten; and so the rule of iustice, by which the people are gouerned, is too pliable, and too weake, and vncerten.

By the same reason it may be said, that all the lawes of all nations are vncerten: for, in the ciuile lawe, which is taken to be the most vniuersall and generall lawe in the world, they hould the same rule and order in all cafes which be out of the direct wordes of the lawe; and such cafes be infinite: for as I saide, new cafes spring euery day, as malice and fraude increaseth. And since the Roman empire beganne, most of their lawes bee either edicta principum, or arbitria iudicum, or responsa prudentum. And in their iudgements they are guided by arrests and former iudgements, as may appeare in the booke of many that haue collected such arrests. And they attribute so much to such former iudgements, that as Pryor equalleth them to a positue lawe, so they hould, that sententia facit ius, & res iudicata pro veritate accipitur, & legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet.

Nay (which is more vncerten) sometimes they relie vpon doctours opinions deliuered in their prelections and treatises. And when they finde them varying, and differing one from another (as sometimes they doe) then they preferre that which is communior opinio: and so in good reason they may: for, pluralitas idem sentientium semper superat; quia facilius inuenitur quod à pluribus queritur.

But to conclude this point, I would aske of these nouelists, what they would haue done in Sibill Belknappes case, if they had liued in Henry the fourths time?

Sir Robert Belknappe, that reuerend and learned iudge, of whom fundrie noble and worthy persons, and some now of great and eminent place in England, are descended, was banished out of the realme, (relegatus in Vasconiam) not for any desert or offence of his, but by the might of his potent enemies, and malice of the time. The lady his wife continued in England; she was wronged; she brought a writ in her owne name alone, not naming her husband. Exception was taken against it, because her husband was liuing; and it was adiudged good, and shee recouered; and the iudge Markeham said;

Ecce modo mirum quod femina fert breuis regis, Non nominando virum coniunctum robore legis.

Here was a rare and a new case, yet it was not deferred vntill a parliament: it was iudged, and her wrong was righted by the common law of England, and that ex arbitrio iudicum, & ex responsis prudentum; and yet it was counted mirum with an ecce.

Now to apply this to R. Caluines case. His case is rare and new: so was that. There is no direct law for him in precise and expresse termes; there was neuer iudgement before touching any borne in Scotland, since king James beganne his happie raigne in England; hee is the first that is brought in question: so there was no direct lawe for Sibill Belknapp to sue in her owne name without her husband, who was then liuing; nay rather there was direct lawe against it. Yet by the lawe of England shee had iudgement to recouer with an ecce modo mirum: so by the lawe of England iudgement ought to bee giuen for Robert Caluine, but not with an ecce modo mirum; but vpon strong arguments deduced à similibus, and ex dictamine rationis.

But before I come to those arguments, I wil vse a few words more touching some rules which I haue read for the interpretation of lawes.

There is a graue and learned writer in the ciuile law that setteth downe foure waies and formes of interpretation of lawes: that is, first, interpretatio historica; secondly, etymologica; thirdly, analogica; fourthly, practica.

In the argument of this case all these formes haue beene vsed, and largely handled: and the two first be those that seeme but light to me, and therefore in mine opinion haue beene too much stooode vpon, and overweighed.

For the historicall interpretation, it is alwaies darke, obscure, and vncerten, of what kingdome, countrey, or place soeuer you speake; I doe alwaies and onely except the diuine histories written in the Bible.

Livy saith, in tanta rerum vtriusque multi temporis errores implicantur. Saint Augustine speaking of the supposed booke of Henoch saith, libri isti ob nimiam antiquitatem reijciuntur.

Wherefore, for this parte let this suffice, whether in the beginning there were one or seuerall kingdomes in Great Britaine; or one or seuerall monarches

Fergus. Inat. monarches and kings of these two great and famous kingdoms in Great Britaine. The king our soueraigne is lawfully and lineally descended of the first great monarchs and kings of both the kingdoms; and that by so long a continued line of lawfull descent, as therein he exceedeth all the kings that the world now knoweth; and therefore to inquire further of historical knowledge in this case, I should it neede lesse.

Etymologica. For the etymological interpretation, there hath beene very much said, euen as much as wit and art could deuise. There haue beene alleadged manie definitions, descriptions, distinctions, differences, diuisions, subdiuisions, allusion of wordes, extension of wordes, construction of wordes; and nothing left vnsearched to finde what is ligeantia, allegiantia, fides, obedientia, subiectio, subditi; and who bee aborigines, indigenæ, alienigenæ, aduenticij, denizati, &c. And much of this hath beene drawne out of some writers of the ciuile lawe; amongst whome the etymological interpretation of the words ligeus, and ligeantia, is as vnclert and doubtfull, as it is with our common lawyers; and so vpon any of these there cannot be any certain rule found for iudges to iudge by, especially in new and rare cases.

As for definition, Vlpian teacheth vs, omnis definitio in iure ciuili est periculosa: and it is said, that definitio est duplex: propria, quæ constat ex genere, & differentia: impropria, quæ & descriptio vocatur, & est quælibet rei designatio: so definition and description are often confounded, and both vnclert. Then, since both be vnclert and dangerous, I will leaue both, and seeke a more certain rule to iudge by.

As for etymologie of words, I agree with him which saith, it is leuis & fallax, & plerumque ridicula. It is a pedant grammarians fault. Marcus Varro and others haue beene noted for it. And if you examine the examples which some doe bring, you will perceiue how ridiculous and vaine it is. So this rule will not serue to finde out that which wee seeke for. These bee but tendicula verborum, & aucupationes syllabarum, as one calleth them: it may haue some vse, and serue a turne in schooles, but it is too light for iudgements in lawe, and for the seates of iustice.

Aquinas setteth downe a more certain rule, in vocibus videndum, non tam à quo, quam ad quid sumantur. And words should be taken sensu currenti: for vse and custome is the best expositor both of lawes and wordes, quem penes arbitrium & ius & norma loquendi.

Wherefore, of the many and diuerse distinctions, diuisions, and subdiuisions, that haue beene made in this case, I will say no more but, confusum est quicquid in puluerem sectum est: and will conclude with bishop Juel; a man may wander and misse his way in mists of distinctions.

Ligeantia sensu currenti est vinculum fidei &c. Then leauing these historical and etymological interpretations, and these curious and subtile distinctions and diuisions, I say, ligeantia, or allegiantia, vnderstood sensu currenti, is vinculum fidei & obedientiæ, as iustice Daniel said well. And hee that is borne in any of the kings dominions, and vnder the kings obedience, is the kings liege subiect, and borne ad fidem regis (for that is the proper and ancient word which the lawe of England hath vsed; ad fidem regis Angliæ, ad fidem regis Franciæ) and therefore hee cannot bee a stranger or alien to the king, or in any of his kingdoms; and by consequence, is inhabilit to haue lands in England, and to sue, and be sued in any real action for the same.

And ligeantia hath sometimes a more large extension: for, hee that is an alien borne out of the kings dominions, vnder the obedience of another king, if hee dwell in England, and be protected by the king and his lawes, hee oweth to the king the duetie of allegiance; and so hee is ligatus regi, and ligeus regis: and if hee commit treason, the indictment shall bee contra ligeantiam suæ debitum, as it was in Shirley the Frenchmans case: yet is hee not the kings subiect: for, hee was not borne ad fidem regis. But, this is not that ligeance which wee must finde: for, in a true and lawfull subiect, there must bee subiectio, fides, & obedientia; and those cannot bee seuered, no more than true faith and charitie in a true Christian. And hee that hath these three à natiuitate, is ligeus regis, and cannot bee a stranger or alien to the king, or in his kingdoms. And that it is so, may be proued by the rule of the other two interpretations of lawe; that is, analogica, & practica.

Analogica. King James hath now the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the isles of Gernesey and Iersey by descent; all these bee his dominions, and vnder his subiectio and obedience.

King Henry the second had England and Normandy by descent from his mother Maud the emperesse; and Aniow and Maine by descent from his father Geffrey Plantagenet; and Ireland by conquest.

Henry the third had England and Ireland by descent from his grandfather Henry the second; and Aquitany by descent from his grand-mother queene Eleanor, wife to king Henry the second, and daughter to the duke of Aquitany.

Edward the first had all the same by descent; and parte of Scotland by conquest.

Edward the second and Edward the third had all the same by descent also: and besides, Edward the third claimed all France by descent from his mother queene Isabell, and had the most part of it in possession; and so had Henry the fift and Henry the sixt also.

Now if in these kings times, subiectes borne in those countries, being then vnder their obedience, were no aliens, but capable of landes in England: and if at this time subiectes borne in Ireland, or Gernesey and Iersey, be no aliens, but capable of lands in England; then, by an analogicall interpretation, why should not subiectes borne in Scotland be at this time in like degree? For, in proportion, and in likenesse, and conueniencie, there can bee no difference at all.

But whether the subiectes borne in those countries in the time of those kings were then capable of lands in England as naturall subiects; or were deemed aliens, is the question: and therein interpretatio practica is to bee considered; and so the case is brought to be examined per similia. And in diuinitie praxis sanctorum est interpretis preceptorum.

Now then the question is, whether the kings subiects of England and Scotland, that be post-nati, may be resembled to the kings subiects of Ireland, and the isles of Gernesey, &c. as now they bee; and to the subiectes of Normandie, Aniow, and Gascogne, and parte of Scotland in former times, when the same were the dominions, and vnder the obedience of the king of England: for I speake alwaies, and would be vnderstoode of kingdoms and dominions in possession, and vnder obedience, and not of those whereunto the king hath right, but hath no possession or obedience. I houlde, that in all points materiall concerning this question they are alike, though not in all things: (for, then it were idem, and not simile;) and this can not bee better vnderstoode, than by examining the obiections to the contrary: which in substance may bee reduced to foure in number.

First for Ireland, it was gotten by conquest, and the conquerour may impose what lawes hee will vpon them: but it is otherwise of kingdoms coming by descent. Ireland. Obiect. 1.

This is a conceived difference, and lacks the foundation of reason, and hath not the true parts of a difference: for those that are borne in Ireland, and those that are borne in Scotland, are all alike for their birth within the kings dominions, and are borne vnder the like subiectio and obedience to the king, and haue the like bond; nay, euen the same bond of allegiance; that is, they are borne ad fidem regis. Respons.

Besides, where it is said, the conquerour may impose what lawes hee will: then consider how it was in the interim before king Iohn gaue lawes to Ireland.

Nay, which is more, I aske whether the conquerour of Ireland can giue new lawes to England, and make Irishmen to bee as naturall borne subiectes in England (if their birth-right doe not giue it them) which before the Conquest they were not? For, that is properly the question. But if any difference bee, the case of descent is the stronger: for, (as iustice Yelverton saide) that is by an vndoubted title made by lawe; the other by a doubtfull title wonne by the sword.

But leaue Ireland gotten by conquest; what say you to the great kingdome of France, which Edward the third had first in right by lawfull descent, and after in possession by triumphant conquest; and which Henry the sixt held after in possession by descent? Was euer doubt made, whether the subiects borne there so long as it was in subiectio and obedience to the king, were capable of landes in England? France.

I will now turne the case, and aske another question; if king James our soueraigne had first beene king of England by lawfull descent (as now hee is) and after Scotland had descended vnto him, should not the subiects of Scotland (I speake still of post-nati) haue beene iudged as naturall subiects in England, as those of France were in Edward the thirds time?

Then, he hauing now both kingdoms by lineall, true, and lawfull descent, it can make no difference touching the capacite of subiects, which kingdome descended to him first, and which second; but both are to him alike. And it is cleere, post-nati in England are now capable and inheritable in Scotland, though some haue made a causelesse and needelesse doubt of it: and so on the other side those of Scotland are in England.

It is said, Normandie and Aquitany were no monarchies or kingdoms, but dukedomes or seignories in France, and holden of the crowne of France, and therefore not to bee resembled to Scotland, which is an ancient and absolute kingdome. Normandy and Aquitany. Obiect. 2.

This obiection reacheth not to the reason of our question: for, bee they kingdoms, bee they seignories, yet the subiectes borne there, were borne out of the kingdome of England, and so in that respect aliens: but in that they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his subiectio and obedience, they were no aliens, but liege and naturall borne subiectes to the king; and so capable and inheritable in England. Respons.

I say besides, the dukes of Normandie and Aquitany were absolute princes, and had soueraigne power in those countries, although they did not beare the name of kings; as at this time the duke of Sauoy; the duke of Florence; the duke and state of Venice; and of late, the great duke of Russia; the duke of Burgundy; the archduke of Austria, &c.

So the difference in stile and name makes no difference in souerainty: for, king Henry the eight had as absolute soueraintie in Ireland, when his stile was lord of Ireland, as when hee changed his stile, and was called, king of Ireland.

And, to say, that the tenure of the crowne of France should giue any priuiledge to them of Normandie and Aquitany in England is a strange concepit; it might rather bee obiected against them. But, as I said before, they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his obedience, and therefore as subiects borne in England.

And if men may beleue some auncient stories, Aquitany and Normandy had sometimes kings, and were kingdoms of themselves: and not depending nor subiect to the crowne of France: and the kingdome of France was then a small portion of Gallia, and but a little one, in comparison of that which it is at this day. And some say, that there were foure and twentie kings in Gaul: but as the kings of France increased in power and strength, they subdued their neighbor-princes, and so that kingdome grew to that greatnesse that now it is at; euen as the heptarchie in England was dissolued, and made an intire kingdome, when one of the kings mightier than the rest subdued his neighbors.

It is said further, that Normandy and Aquitany were subiects to the crowne of England; and to the great scale of England; but so is not Scotland: ergo &c. The crowne and great scale of England. Obiect. 3.

This standeth not wel with that which was obiected before; that they were but seignories holden of the crowne of France. And it is true, that before Edward the thirds time, those kings of England, that held those great seignories, did acknowledge, that they held the same of the crowne of France. Respons.

But these obiections be light, and not worth the time that hath beene spent spent about them. The soueraignie is in the person of the king; the crowne is but an ensigne of soueraignie; the inuesture and coronation are but ceremonies of honour, and maiestie; the king is an absolute and perfect king before he be crowned, and without those ceremonies.

The seale is to be altered and changed at the will and pleasure of the king: hee may haue one, he may haue many, as pleaseth him. The king did vse queene Elizabeths seale, for diuerse moneths after his coming into England; queene Elizabeth vsed king Philips & queene Maries seale for a time; and queene Marie vsed king Edwards seale. And all that was so done, was well and lawfully done. Many things were done by auncient kings of England before the Conquest by their signature, and signe manuell without anie seale at all; and some such since the Conquest also: as graunts made by Maude the emperesse to Albericke de Vere, and others.

The king may by his great seale commaund all his subiectes that bee vnder his obedience, wherfoeuer they bee in the world: so hee did in Normandie; so hee did in Aquitany; so hee did in that part of Scotland that hee had in possession. And in 24 Edw. 1. his iudges kept ordinary courts of iustice there: and I haue seene the records of placita exercitus regis apud Edinburgh, apud Roxburgh, apud S. Iohns-towne, &c. in Scotia. So hee may commaund his subiects, if they be in France, Spaine, Rome, or Turkie, or the Indies. And for seuerall seales the earle of Chester had a speciall seale for that his auncient county palatine. The duke of Lancaster had a speciall seale for his new countie palatine. And after, when these counties came to the kinges possession, the kinges continued seuerall seales in them both for the administration of iustice; but as subordinate to the great seale of England.

And I make little doubt, but if the king shall now commaund any of his subiects of Scotland vnder his great seale of England, they will (as they ought) dutifully obey him. As in king Edward the 1. Edward the 2. and Edward the 3. times, they commanded many of the lordes of that parte of Scotland which then was vnder their obedience.

I finde, that in 13 Edw. 2. quarto die Iunii, the king constituit Adomarum de Valentia comitem Pembrochiae custodem regni sui; ac locum suum tenentem quamdiu rex in partibus transmarinis moram fecerit. And the next day, viz. die Iouis quinto die Iunii, rex ordinavit, quod magnum sigillum suum remaneret clausum in aliquo loco securo, dum rex esset in partibus transmarinis: et ordinavit quoddam aliud paruum sigillum interim pro regimine regni, ad breuia, &c. consignanda, sub teste Adonari de Valentia comitis Pembroch. Nota, heere was a petty seale pro regimine regni, wherein are comprised commissions for iustice, mandatoria, & ad breuia consignanda; which is for remedialia, as they are termed.

It is saide, that Scotland hath lawes that are proper for that kingdome, and that they are not subiect to the lawes of England, and so contra.

And lastly it was saide, that in England euery person was within the iurisdiction of some leete, and at the age of twelue yeeres euery one is to bee sworn in the leete to bee foiall and loiall to the king of England; that is, to the lawes of England (for so hee vnderstoode loiall): but post-nati in Scotland can not be so; and that they haue an other forme of oathe in Scotland: ergo, &c.

For this last parte, of the oathe in the leete, the lord chiefe baron did cleere it so plainly, as more needes not to be said. This is legalis ligeantia, it is not alta ligeantia by birth, which is that which we haue now in question.

The historicall discourse that hath bin made of leetes, of law-dayes, of decenna, decennarij, of the tenne-mens tale, and the oathe of all male children of twelue yeeres, &c. taken at the leete, is no newes indeede, it is very olde.

Master Lambard hath it all, and more too, at large in explicatione verborum in the word centuria; it was before the Conquest.

But it maketh nothing to this naturall allegiance and subiection of birth; it is not alta ligeantia by birth-right; it is but legalis ligeantia by policie: and Fitzherbert calleth it swearing to the lawe.

And if that were the onely bond and marke of allegiance, many are out of it, and so at libertie. As, children vnder twelue yeeres; yet sometimes they may commit treason and felony; where, malitia supplet aetatem. So women of all sortes; yet they may bee shrewd and dangerous traitours; and if they bee women nobly borne, or widowes that were wiues to noble men, they shall be tried per pares.

Also noble men of all sortes, who are neither bound to attend the leete, nor to take that oathe, as appeereth by Britton cap. 29. treating of the court called the shirifs turne, out of which the leete seemeth to be extracted: for, whatsoeuer is not presented in the leete may be presented and punished in the shirifs turne. And M. Kitchin citeth Britton in this point for the leete; and alleadgeth also the statute of Marlebridge cap. 10. to the same purpose.

And at this day the view of francke-pleges, and the putting in of francke-pleges, and the decennarij, are but bare names of things past, the vse and substance is obsolete and gone.

And, as it was saide, few in this place haue put in such pleges, or taken that oath, and yet I trust wee are good subiects, and beare true faith and allegiance.

But this hath bene so fully answered and cleared by the lord chiefe baron, and the lord Coke, chiefe iustice of the Common Pleas, as I doe wrong to spend time in it.

But touching the seuerall lawes; I say, that seuerall lawes can make no difference in matter of soueraignie; and in the bond of allegiance and obedience to one king: and so it concludeth nothing for the point in question.

Normandy and Aquitany had seuerall lawes differing from the lawes of England: so had Fraunce in king Edward the 3. and Henry the 6. his time.

Ireland, before king Iohns time, continued their auncient lawes, and so, for the most part, haue done euer since.

Gernesey and Iersey haue yet at this day seuerall lawes, which, for the most part, were the auncient lawes and customes of Normandie.

Wales had, and in many things yet haue seuerall lawes: so for the county palatine of Chester also.

Yet these neuer were, nor must not be cancelled and cut off from their allegiance and obedience to the king; nor the kings subiects borne there be incapable of lands and inheritance in England: for where there is but one soueraigne, all his subiects borne in all his dominions bee borne ad fidem regis; and are bound to him by one bond of faith and allegiance: and in that, one is not greater nor lesser than another: nor one to bee preferred before another: but all to bee obedient alike; and to be ruled alike; yet under seuerall lawes and customes. And as Saint Gregorie sayeth of the church, in una fide nihil offit ecclesiae sanctae diuersa consuetudo. So I will conclude for this point, that diuersitie of lawes and customes makes no breach of that vnitie of obedience, faith, and allegiance which all liege subiects owe to their liege king and soueraigne lord. And as none of them can be aliens to the king, so none of them can bee aliens or strangers in any of his kingdomes or dominions; nor aliens or strangers one to another, no more than a Kentish-man to a Cheshire-man; or e contra.

And therefore all, that haue bin borne in any of the kinges dominions since hee was king of England, are capable and inheritable in all his dominions without exception.

And as to the other parte of the obiection, that there will be defect of triall; for, things done in Scotland, cannot bee tried in England; I say, that that maketh little to our present question, whether post-nati in Scotland be aliens in England, and not capable of landes in England: but it trencheth to cast some aspersiō vpon the common lawe of England; that it is not sufficient to giue iustice to the kinges subiects for lacke of sufficient meanes of triall of questions of fact. But to this baron Altham gaue so full an aunswere, as more cannot bee said: and so hee did both cleare the doubt, and did vphould the sufficiencie of the lawe of England in that behalfe. And it seemeth strange, that this should now bee found out to bee objected against Scotland, since it was neuer heeretofore objected for France, Normandie, Aquitany, nor is at this day for Ireland, Gernesey, and Iersey, &c. whereas all stand vpon the same reason for the point of triall. But the wisdome of the lawe of England hath bene such, as there neuer failed certen rules for triall of all questions in fact; and those were fitted and adapted to the matter which was to bee tried. And therefore, whosoever doth diligently obserue it, hee shall finde in the course and practise of the lawes of England about twenty seuerall formes of trialls: as by battell; by iurie, and that in diuerse kindes; by wager of lawe; by proofes; by examination; by inspection; by certificates of diuerse kindes; and by manie other wayes: and lest there should bee any defect in that behalfe, the law hath provided seuerall formes of ioyning of issues; and in that, hath speciall regard of things done out of the realme, as euerie student may see in the bookes of reports.

Thus I haue passed these foure obiections, and therefore for this part I conclude, that if argumentum à simili were euer good and concludent in lawe, my lords the iudges haue prooued this case by so many plaine and direct examples, and like cases, and by so manie strong arguments and solide reasons drawne out of booke cases, out of statutes, out of the true rules and forme of pleading, and out of ancient records and precedents, some produced by M. Attorney, and many more remembred by the iudges, as no one thing can bee more plainely exemplified, nor appeare more like to an other, than this case is to those cases which they haue remembred.

But if examples and arguments à simili doe faile, then it remaineth recurrere ad rationem; and what reason that ought to bee, and how to bee vnderstoode, is to be considered: for, it is said, that lex est ratio summa, iubens ea quae facienda sunt, & prohibens contraria. So it must be the depth of reason, not the light and shallow distempered reasons of common discourfers walking in Protes, or at ordinaries, in their feasting and drinking, drowned with drinke, or blowne away with a whiffe of tobacco. Lucretius noteth, that in many there is rationis egestas: and Saint Gregory saith, qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans cur non videat, rationem videt: for, although reason and knowledge bee infinite, yet no man can haue more of it than hee is capable of: euery man must receiue it, and keepe it in his owne vessell; he cannot borrow his neighbours braine-pan to put it in. And therefore it is not without cause, that one of the grauest and best learned lawyers of our age, and a priue counsellor to one of the greatest monarches of Europe, describeth those that should bee interpreters of lawes by foure speciall qualities, that is, 1. Aetate graues, 2. Eruditione praestantes, 3. Vsu rerum prudentes, 4. Publica autoritate constituti: so, there must be grauitie, there must be learning, there must be experience, and there must be authoritie: and if any one of these want, they are not to be allowed to be interpreters of the lawe.

How all these qualities concur in these reuerend iudges, whom wee haue heard in this present case, I will spare to speake what I thinke: for, Chrysostome teacheth mee, qui laudatur in facie, flagellatur in corde.

In seeking out this depth of reason, the same author giueth a caution, which is this: vitium quod in hoc genere fugi debet est, ne, si rationem non inuenias, mox legem sine ratione esse clames. And in 36 H. 6. Fortescue saith the same in effect, which is thus; we haue many courses and formes which bee boulden for lawe, and haue bene boulden and used because of reason; and notwithstanding the reason be not ready in memory, yet by study and labour a man may finde it.

Now when wee come to examine by reason, whether post-nati in Scotland shall be disabled as aliens, or shall be capable of landes in England, as naturall borne subiects there; wee are first to consider what is the reason whie aliens in the dominions, and vnder the obedience of other forraigne princes, are not capable of landes in England. And surely, the true reason is, that which was noted by baron Altham; and hath since bene ofte remembred, viz. the danger that might thereby come to the king and the common-weale: specially by drawing hither too great multitudes of them:

them: for so the treasure of the realme might bee transported by them into other forraigne kingdomes and countries; whereby it might bee vsed against the king, and to the preiudice of the state: and besides, they might vnder-hand practise sedition and rebellion in the kingdome, and cause many other daungers and inconueniences. But that reason cannot serue against post-nati in Scotland, now that there is but one king of both the kingdomes, no more than it can serue against those that are borne in Ireland, or Gernesey, or Iersey: and therefore in reason they are as capable of landes in England, as the kings subiects of Ireland, and Gernesey, and Iersey are.

Against this, there haue also bene many obiections made, and reasons deuised, that seeme witty, and haue some shew of probability to proue, that post-nati in Scotland are aliens, and ought not in reason to bee capable of landes in England; videlicet.

1. That England and Scotland were two ancient feuerall kingdomes vnder feuerall kings, and feuerall crownes.

2. That they continue yet feuerall kingdomes.

3. That they haue yet feuerall lawes, feuerall seales, feuerall crownes, and feuerall kings: for, it is said, though king James be king of both, and hath but one naturall body, yet in iudgement of law, he is in respect of his two feuerall kingdomes, as two feuerall kings, and the subiects of each feuerall kingdome are bound to him by distinct allegiance, according to the feuerall lawes of the kingdome where they were borne.

And all this is grounded vpon this rule or fiction in lawe: quando duo iura concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diuersis.

And vpon this ground is this new form of pleading deuised, which the defendants haue vsed in this case, such as cannot be found in any record, euer to haue bene pleaded before; and may as well serue against the kinges subiectes of Ireland, as against the post-nati of Scotland. And sithence in former times the like forme of pleading was neuer seene against any of the kings of Englandes subiects, which were borne in any of his dominions out of England, as in Normandie or Aquitanie, or in France (I meane such part of it as was in the kinges possession, and in subiection and obedience to him, and not in that parte of France which his enemies helde) it may be probably inferred, that it was then generally houlden, that neither such a forme of pleading, nor the matter it selfe was sufficient in lawe to disable anie such plaintife: for, against French-men that were not vnder the kings obedience wee finde it often pleaded. And as those that were not subiects to the king, nor borne vnder his obedience, did then presume to bring suites and actions in England; so it can not bee thought, but that the king hauing then so large and ample dominions beyond the seas, as Normandy and Aquitany, and many other partes of France, some of his subiects borne there, had cause to haue, and did bring the like suites in England. And sithence no such plea is found to haue bene then vsed against them, it can not in lawe and reason bee now allowed against the post-nati in Scotland: for, I may say as Ascue saied in 37 H. 6. Our predecessors were as sage and learned as we be.

And I see not, but that in this case a good argument may bee reasonably deduced from the negative, as it was in the case reported by the great learned, and most graue and reuerend iudge sir James Dyer, chiefe iustice of the Common Pleas, anno 23 Elizab. The question there, was, whether an erroneous iudgement giuen in Rie, which is a member of the cinque-portes, might bee reuerfed in the Kinges Bench, or Common Place at Westminster; and it was thus resolued; sed pro eo quod nullum tale breue in Registro, nec in aliquibus præcedentibus curiarum prædictarum inueniri potuerat, dominus cancellarius Bromley per opinionem capitalium iudicialiorum utriusque banci denegauit tale breue concedere. And so iustice Fenners argument houldeth well, viz. there is in this case no lawe to exclude the complainant, ergo hee is a liege and a naturall borne subiect.

But the forme of pleading in the time of king Ed. 1. in Cobledickes case, which was cited out of Hengham, (and the booke shewed heere by the lord chiefe iustice Coke) is so direct and plaine for this our question, as nothing can be more plaine: and therefore I thinke it not amisse to report it againe.

That case was in effect and substance, thus:

A woman brought a writte of ayel against Roger Cobledicke, and declared of the seisin of Roger her grand-father, and conueied the discent to Gilbert her father; and from him to the demaundant, as his daughter and heire. The tenant pleaded, that the demaundant was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance nor of the fidelitie of England; and demaunded iudgement if shee ought to haue the action against him. This plea was houlden to bee insufficient; and thereupon the tenant amended his plea, and pleaded further, that the demaundant was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king; and demaunded iudgement, &c. And against that plea none exception was taken, but thereupon the demaundant prayed licence to depart from her writ. By this it appeareth plainly, that the first plea, alledging that she was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance, nor of the fidelitie of England, was insufficient (and so declared by Berreford the chiefe iustice); for, there can bee no fidelitie nor allegiance due to England, respecting the land and soile without a soueraigne and king. But the second plea alledging, that shee was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king, was good and sufficient: for, to the king fidelitie and allegiance is due; and therefore, since shee failed in that, she was not to be answered: and thereupon shee praied licence to depart from her writte, and so she left her suite.

Now, for the reasons which haue bene drawne and strained out of the statute an. 14 Edw. 3. if they bee well examined, they serue little for this point which we haue in hand.

It is to be considered, at what time, and vpon what occasion that statute was made. King Edward the third being right heire to the crowne and kingdome of France by descent from his mother, and hauing spent many yeeres for the recouering of the same, resolued to take vpon him the name and stile of king of France; being aduised thereunto by them of Flaunders. Hereupon he did take the stile of king of France; and altered his seale and his armes; and after a while, placed the armes of France before the ancient armes of England, as they are borne at this day. This gaue occasion for the making of this statute: for some people (asun gentes, saith the statute) seeing this change, and considering the large and ample extent, and the magnificence of that great kingdome, beganne to doubt that the king would make his imperiall seate there; and conceiued thereby, that the kingdome of England, being the lesser, should bee in subiection of the king and kingdome of France, being the greater, and to bee gouerned and ruled by a vice roy, or deputy, as they saw Ireland was. And though in the kings stile, England was placed before France, yet they sawe the armes of France marshalled before the armes of England; though at the first bearing thereof some say it was not so.

To cleere this doubt, and to take away this feare from the subiects of England, was this statute made, as doth plainly appeare by the wordes of the statute it selfe.

Now if you will make an apt and proper application of that case then betwene England and France, to this our case now, betwene Scotland and England, it must be thus:

1. Edw. 3. then king of England (being the lesser) had afterwarde the kingdome of France (being the greater) by descent, and tooke the stile of king of France.

King James king of Scotland (being the lesser) hath afterward the kingdome of England (being the greater) by descent, and taketh the stile of king of England.

2. King Ed. 3. altered his seale, and his armes, and placed the armes of France before the armes of England.

King James hath changed his seale, and his armes in England, and hath placed the armes of England before the armes of Scotland.

3. It was then doubted, that king Edw. 3. would remoue his court out of England, the lesser, and keepe his imperiall seate and state in France, the greater.

King James hath indeede remoued his court out of Scotland, the lesser, and doth in his royall person (with the queene and prince, and all his children) keepe his imperiall seate in England, the greater.

4. In all these cases agree; but yet one difference there is, and that is in the stile: for king Ed. 3. in his stile placed England, the lesser, being his ancient kingdome, before France, the greater, being newly descended vnto him.

But king James in his stile placeth England, the greater, though newly descended vnto him, before Scotland, the lesser, being his ancient kingdome.

5. Now, this being thus; perhappes Scotland might out of this example haue conceiued the like doubt against England, as England did then against France: but as there was then no doubt made, whether the kings subiects borne in England should be capable of lands in France; so, out of this statute, and vpon this example no doubt can bee inferred, whether the kings subiects now borne in Scotland, shall be capable of lands in England.

But, all these obiections, and the ground whereupon they are framed, viz. quando duo iura &c. haue bene so thorowly and profoundly examined, and so learnedly and fully answered and cleered by the iudges, as I make no doubt but all wise and indifferent hearers be well satisfied therein.

And if there bee any so possessed with a preiudicate opinion against trueth, and reason, that will say in their owne heartes, licet persuaseris non persuadebis; and so, either serpent-like stop their eares, or else wilfully absent themselves, because they would not heare the weaknesse and absurdities of their owne conceits laied open and confuted: if there bee any such I say (as I trust there bee but few, and yet I feare there bee some) I would they had learned of Tertullian, that veritas docendo suadet, non suadendo docet. And I wish that they bee not found among the number of those to whome Saint Paul saith, si quis ignorat, ignoret: and Saint John in the Apocalips, qui sordidus est, sordescat adhuc. And I will exhort with Saint Paul: qui tenet, teneat, and not wauer or doubt by such weake arguments and obiections.

But in this new learning, there is one part of it so strange, and of so daungerous consequent, as I may not let it passe, viz. that the king is as a king diuided in himselfe; and so as two kings of two feuerall kingdomes; and that there be feuerall allegiances, and feuerall subiections due vnto him respectively in regarde of his feuerall kingdomes, the one not participating with the other.

This is a daungerous distinction betwene the king and the crowne, and betwene the king and the kingdome: it reacheth too farre; I wish euery good subiect to beware of it. It was neuer taught, but either by traitours, as in Spencers bill in Edward the seconds time (which baron Snig, and the lord chiefe baron, and lord Coke remembred) or by treasonable papists, as Harding in his confutation of the apologie maintaineth, that kings haue their authority by the positue lawe of nations, and haue no more power, than the people hath, of whome they take their temporall iurisdiction; and so Fidelius Simanca, and others of that crew. Or by seditious sectaries and puritans, as Buchanan de iure regni apud Scotos, Penry, Knox, and such like. For, by these, and those that are their followers, and of their faction, there is in their pamphlets too much such traitorous seede sowne.

But leauing this, I will adde a little more, to prooue, that in reason Robert Caluine, and other like post-nati in Scotland, ought by lawe to be capable of landes in England: and for that, I wil remember one rule more which is certain and faileth not, and ought to bee obserued in all interpretation of lawes; and that is, ne quid absurdum, ne quid illusorium admittatur.

But, vpon this subtile and daungerous distinction of faith and allegiance due to the king, and of faith and allegiance due to the crowne, and to the kingdome (which is the onely basis and fundamentall maine reason to disable the plaintife, and all post-nati) there follow too many grosse, and fowle absurdities, whereof I will touch some few, and so conclude, that

That the realme of England shall not be subiect to France.

A dangerous distinction betwene the king and the crowne.

Absurdities in this dangerous distinction.

In lawe and reason this subtil, but absurd and dangerous distinction, ought not to be allowed.

This bond of allegiance, whereof wee dispute, is vinculum fidei; it bindeth the soule and conscience of euery subiect feuerally and respectiue, to be faithfull and obedient to the king: and as a soule or conscience cannot bee framed by policie; so faith and allegiance cannot bee framed by policie, nor put into a politike bodie. An oath must be sworne by a naturall bodie; homage and fealtie must be done by a naturall bodie, a politike body cannot doe it.

Now then, since there is but one king, and soueraigne, to whome this faith and allegiance is due by all his subiects of England and Scotland, can any humane policie diuide this one king, and make him two kings? Can rex regis Angliæ be in manu Domini, and cor regis Scotiæ not so? Can there bee warres betwene the king of England and the king of Scotland, or betwene the kingdome of England and the kingdome of Scotland, so long as there is but one king? Can the king of England now send an army roial into Scotland against the king of Scotland? Can there bee any letters of marke or reprisall now graunted by the king of England, against the subiects of the king of Scotland? Can there bee any protections now, quia profecturus in exercitu Iacobi regis Angliæ in Scotiam? Nay shortly, can any man bee a true subiect to king James as king of England, and a traitor or rebell to king James as king of Scotland? Shall a foote breadth, or an inch breadth of ground, make a difference of birth-right of subiects borne vnder one king; nay, where there are not any certain bounds or limites knowne at all, but an imaginarie partition wall, by a conceived fiction in lawe? It is enough to propound these and such like questions, whereof many more might be remembred: they carry a sufficient and plaine answere in themselves: magis docet qui prudenter interrogat.

As the king nor his heart cannot bee diuided, for hee is one entire king ouer all his subiectes, in which focuer of his kingdomes or dominions they were borne, so hee must not bee serued nor obeyed by halues; he must haue intire and perfect obedience of his subiects: for, ligentia (as baron Heron saied well) must haue foure qualities; it must bee 1. pura & simplex: 2. integra & solida: 3. uniuersalis non localis: 4. permanens, continua, & illæsa. Diuide a man's heart, and you lose both parts of it, and make no heart at all; so hee that is not an intire subiect, but halfe faced, is no subiect at all; and hee, that is borne an intire and perfect subiect, ought by reason and lawe to haue all the freedoms, priuiledges, and benefites pertaining to his birth-right in all the kinges dominions; and such are all the post-nati in England and Scotland. And the inconuenience of this imaginarie local allegiance hath beene so lately, and so fully declared by the lorde chiefe iustice Coke, as more needes not bee saied in it.

In some speciall cases there sometime may bee a king of subiects without land in possession, as iustice Fenner noted in the gouernement which Moses had ouer the people of Israel in the wilderneffe; and as in the case which sir John Popham the late lord chiefe iustice did put in the parliament. If a king and his subiects bee driuen out of his kingdome by his enemies, yet notwithstanding hee continueth still king ouer those subiects, and they are still bound vnto him by their bond of allegiance, wherefoeuer he and they bee. But there can not bee a king of land without subiects: for, that were but imperium in belluas, and, rex & subditi sunt relatiua.

I saied there was an other generall rule for expounding of lawes, which I referred to bee last spoken of. I will now but touch it; for, I will not stand to examine by humane reasons, whether kings were before lawes, or lawes before kings; nor how kings were first ordained; nor whether the kings or the people did first make lawes; nor the feuerall constitutions and frames of states and common-weales; nor what Plato or Aristotle haue written of this argument. They were men of singuler learning and wisdom; but wee must consider the time, and the countrie, in which they liued, and in all their great learning they lacked the true learning of the knowledge of God. They were borne and liued in Greece, and in popular itates: they were enemies, or at least mislikers of all monarchies; yet one of them disdained not to bee a seruant or mercenarie hireling to a monarch. They accepted all the world barbarous, but their owne country of Greece: their opinions therefore are no canons to giue lawes to kinges and kingdomes, no more than sir Thomas Moores Vtopia, or such pamphlets as wee haue at euerie marte.

I beleue him that saith, per me reges regnant, & principes iusta decernunt; and I make no doubt, but that as God ordained kinges, and hath giuen lawes to kinges themselves, so hee hath authorized and giuen power to kinges to giue lawes to their subiects; and so kinges did first make lawes, and then ruled by their lawes, and altered and changed their lawes from time to time, as they sawe occasion, for the good of themselves, and their subiects.

And this power they haue from God Almighty; for, as Saint Augustine saith, in hoc reges Deo seruiunt sicut eis diuinitus præcipitur, in quantum sunt reges, si in suo regno bona iubent, mala prohibent, non solum quæ pertinent ad humanam societatem, verumetiam quæ ad diuinam religionem.

And I heuld Thomas Aquinas his opinion to be good, rex solutus à legibus quodad vim coactiuam, subditus est legibus quodad vim directiuam propria voluntate. And for this opinion there is a stronger authoritie, euen from God himselfe in Ecclesiastes, c. 8. ver. 2. ego os regis obseruo; et præcepta iuramenti Dei: and ver. 4. sermo illius potestate plenus est: nec dicere ei quisquam potest, quare ita facias?

Now being led a little from the common lawe to the ciuile lawe, I finde in the ciuile lawe a direct text, warranting that generall rule which I referred to this place, which is this; inter equitatem ius quo interpretatum interpretationem nobis solis licet & oportet inspicere.

And another like text in these words, sententia principis ius dubium declarans, ius facit quodad omnis. And some graue and notable writers in the ciuile lawe say, rex est lex animata: some say, rex est lex loquens: some others say, interpretantur legem consuetudo & principis: another saith, rex solus iudicat de causa à iure non definita.

And as I may not forget Saint Augustines words, which are these; generale potestum est subditis humane regibus suis obtemperare: so I may not wrong the iudges of the common lawe of England so much as to suffer an imputation to bee cast vpon them, that they, or the common lawe doe not attribute as great power and authoritie to their soueraignes the kinges of England, as the Romane lawes did to their emperours: (a) for, Bracton; the chiefe iustice in the time of king Henry the third, hath these direct wordes, de chartis regijs & factis regum, non debent, nec possunt iusticiarij nec priuata persone disputare. Nec etiam, si in illa dubitatio oriatur, possunt eam interpretari. Et in dubijs & obscuris, vel si aliqua dictio duos contineat intellectus, domini regis erit expectanda interpretatio & voluntas; cum eius sit interpretari cuius est condere. And Britton in the time of king Ed. 1. writeth as much in effect.

So as now if this question seem difficult, that neither direct law, nor examples and precedents, nor application of like cases, nor discourse of reason, nor the graue opinion of the learned and reuerend iudges, can resolue it, here is a true and certain rule, how both by the ciuile lawe, and the ancient common lawe of England it may and ought to be decided: that is, by sentence of the most religious, learned, and iudicious king that euer this kingdome or island had.

But this case is so cleare as this needeth not at all.

And in this I would not be mis-vnderstoode, as though I spake of making of new lawes, or of altering the lawes now standing; I meane not so, but I speake only of interpretation of the lawe in new questions and doubts, as now in this present case: neither doe I meane hereby to derogate any thing from the high court of parliament; (farre be it from my thought) it is the great councill of the kingdome, wherein euery subiect hath interest. And to speake of the constitution or forme of it, or how, or when it was first begunne, is for busie questionists; it ought to bee obeyed and reuerenced, but not disputed; and it is at this time impertinent to this question.

But certain it is, it hath beene the wisdom of the kinges of this realme to referre in themselves that supream power to call their nobles, clergie, and commons together, when they sawe great and vrgent causes; and by that great councill to make edicts and statutes for the weale of their people, and safetie of the kingdome and state, as in anno 10 Edw. 3. the assembly at Nottingham for the great wars in France: and in anno 20 H. 3. Prouisiones Merton, which I remembred before.

There haue beene made some obiections of inconueniencie, as for bearing of scot and lot, and such other charges; and some out of frugalitie, that the king shall lose his profit of making denizens, and such like. These are so light as I leaue them to the winde; they are neither fit for parliament, nor councill, nor court.

Another argument and reason against the post-nati hath beene lately made out of diffidence and mistrust, that they will come into England sans number, and so as it were to surcharge our common; and that this may be in secula seculorum. I know not well what this meanes. The nation is ancient, noble, and famous; they haue many honourable and woorthie noblemen and gentlemen, and many wise and woorthie men of all degrees and qualities; they haue lands and faire possessions in Scotland. Is it therefore to bee supposed, or can it in reason bee imagined, that such multitude sans number will leaue their native soile, and all transport themselves hither? Hath the Irish done so, or those of Wales, or of the isles of Man, Gernesey, and Iersey? Whie should we then suspect it now more for Scotland?

Nay, doe you suppose that the kinge of England will euer suffer so great a parte of his dominions, and so great and famous a kingdome as Scotland is to be dispeopled? It is a doubt imagined without any foundation or ground of reason. But if it were to bee doubted, the twelue iudges that haue concurred in opinion, and that late worthy iudge Popham, had as great cause to feare it as any others. They are wise; they are learned; they haue faire possessions and good estates; they haue posteritie to care for as others haue.

Yet, admit it bee a matter worth the doubting of, what is that to the young post-nati that are not like in many yeares to come hither in such number? Shall we vpon this causelless feare depriue them of their lawfull birth-right?

Haue wee seene in these fiue yeeres past anie more of them than this one alone that haue gotten any lands in England? And this little that he hath is so small and poore a portion, that his purchase is not great, and therefore no iust cause of offence to any.

Nay, if you looke vpon the ante-nati, you shall find no such confluence hither, but some few (and very few in respect of that great and populous kingdome) that haue done long and woorthie seruice to his maiestie, haue, and still doe attend him, which I trust no man mislikes: for, there can bee none so simple, or childish (if they haue but common sense) as to thinke that his maiesty should haue come hither alone amongst vs, and haue left behinde him in Scotland, and as it were caste off, all his ould and woorthie seruants.

And if these noble and woorthie gentlemen of Scotland, I meane the ante-nati be lovingly and brotherly entertained amongst vs, with mutuall loue and beneuolence, that so we may coalescere, and be vnited together, by marriage, and otherwise (as in some particular cases wee see it already happily begunne) no doubt God will blesse this vnion of both these nations, and make them, and the king, and Great Brittain to be famous through the world; and feared and redoubted of our enemies, and of all that with vs ill: for, vis unita fortior, & concordia multos facit unum. But what may follow vpon such arguments of diffidence and suspition, which seeme but to hinder vnion, and to breede discord and dissention I will not speake. Let euery wise man consider it well: for, humana consilia custigantur ubi celestibus se præferunt. And remember Saint Pauls caution, si inuicem mordetis, videte ne ab inuicem consumamini.

And for the resemblance that hath bin made of this case of post-nati (but indeed for the vnion of both kingdomes) with the housewives cutting of her cloth by a threede, I will say but this, that if shee cut her peece of cloth in length aswell as in breadth, all the threeds will bee cutte, and the cloth marred. And this cutting in this our case, is, to cutte all aswell in length as in breadth, euen through all the kinges dominions; and so will rent asunder the whole frame of the vnion, and cut in peeeces all the threeds of allegiance.

(a) This language is surely very unguarded. EDITOR.

A question, how long this suspicion and dis-vnion shall continue?

But now I wil aske this question: how long shall this sus-pition and doubt continue? Shall there bee a dis-vnion for euer? If it bee saied, no, but vntill the lawes and customes of both kingdomes bee made one and the same: then I aske; how, and when shall that be done? And it may bee, that the constitutions of the countries bee such as there can hardly in all things bee such an absolute and perfect reconciling or vniting of lawes as is fancied. Is it yet so betweene England and Wales, or betweene Kent and Cornwall, or betweene many other parts of this kingdome? I say no; and I speake it confidently and truly, it is not so, nor well can be so. Therefore let England and Scotland be in like degree now, as England and Wales were for many hundred yeeres, and in many things are yet still; and yet let vnion and loue increase amongst vs, euen in secula seculorum. Let vs not be such as St. Bernard noteth, amant quod non decet, timent quod non oportet, dolent vanè, gaudent vaniùs. And let vs no longer make question, whether seuerall lawes and customes bee markes of seperation and dis-vnion, or of seuerall allegiances; for certainly they are not.

Objection
vpon diuination.

One other reason remaines against these post-nati, and that is out of a prouident foresight, or as it were a prophesying:
what if a seperation of these kingdomes fall hereafter?

Respons.

Of this I can say but absit omen. It is potentia remota (as iustice Williams saied) and I trust in God remotissima: and I will euer pray to God that it neuer fall so, vntill the king of all kinges resume all scepters and kingdomes into his owne hands. And let vs take heede of sinnes of ingratitude and disobedience; and remember, that Adam and Eue were punished, non propter pomum, sed propter vetitum. And for such prophets, let the prophet Ezechiel ca. 13. answer them, va pro-phetis insipientibus, qui sequuntur spiritum suum, & nihil vident. And the prophet Esay speaketh to all such with an other va, va illis qui dispergunt.

Now then, as M. Solicitor beganne with seeking out the truth; so I will conclude with Esdras words, magna est veritas & praeualeat: and with this further, eatenus rationandum donec veritas inueniatur: cum inuenta est veritas, figendum ibi iudicium: et in victoria veritatis, soli veritatis inimici pereunt.

The conclusion.

Thus I haue heere deliuered my concurrence in opinion with my lordes the iudges, and the reasons that induce and satisfie my conscience, that Ro. Caluine, and all the post-nati in Scotland, are in reason, and by the common lawe of England, naturall-borne subiects within the allegiance of the king of England; and inhabited to purchase and haue free-hould and inheritance of lands in England; and to bring reall actions for the same in England.

For, if they haue not this benefit by this blessed and happie vnion, then are they in no better case in England, than the king of Spaines subiects borne in Spaine, &c. And so by this vnion they haue gotten nothing:
what they haue lost iustice Yeluerton did well note.

And therefore I must giue iudgement in the Chancerie, that the defendants there ought to make direct answer to Ro. Caluines bill for the lands and euidences for which he complains.

XVII. Proceedings against Mr. JAMES WHITELOCKE, in the Star-Chamber, in June, 10 Jam. I. 1613. for a Contempt of the King's Prerogative.

12 July 1793.
He certainly was the gentleman afterwards made a judge. In a very curious book by him, which is intituled Liber Samilicus, & which now lies in the British Museum
under the name of Lieuten. Col. White-locke, an account of these proceedings is given at length.
See p. 38. to 50.

[Mr. Whitelocke, the subject of this prosecution, is supposed to have been the same gentleman, as afterwards became sir James Whitelocke, the judge of that name, and father of Mr. Bulstrode Whitelocke, the famous writer of the Memorials. See the note in vol. 3. of lord Bacon's works, last 4to ed. p. 471. He appears to have been prosecuted simply for giving a private verbal opinion as a barrister, on a point of prerogative, against the crown, to sir Robert Mansell; who, being treasurer of the navy and vice-admiral, had consulted Mr. Whitelocke, on the legality of a commission issued by king James for examining into and reforming the disorders and abuses of the navy. Ibid. At the same time, sir Robert Mansell was himself charged, for questioning the prerogative of the crown, and animating the lord-admiral against the commission. Ibid. same page, and the note in page 472. The bearing was at Whitehall before the lords of the council, with the intervention of lord chief justice Coke, lord chief baron Tanfield, and the master of the rolls; the king's attorney and solicitor speaking against Mr. Whitelocke, and Mr. Henry Montagu the king's serjeant against sir Robert Mansell. Ibid. Both humiliated themselves; in consequence of which they were recommended to the crown as proper objects of pardon, and were accordingly enlarged on the terms of subscribing a submission. Ibid. & Reliq. Wotton, p. 421. 3d ed. there cited. The following speech of lord Bacon, who was at this time attorney-general, is the only remnant we meet with of the proceedings in the case, exclusive of the circumstances before-mentioned. The speech seems imperfect, it ending abruptly. What there is of it, though not without passages characteristic of lord Bacon's nervous eloquence and curiosity of argument, is in our opinion far from stating any thing like a just ground of prosecution. In the present age it would be deemed a monstrous doctrine to assert, that lawyers were not at liberty to give opinions to their clients on questions of prerogative. Little apology can be made for such a doctrine even in lord Bacon's time; for it was ever lawful for the subject to contest questions of prerogative in the king's courts; and if it was so, how could it be contrary to law to take the advice of council on such subjects? Indeed lord Bacon professes not to controvert the right of asking and giving counsel in law. But then he qualifies this right by a distinction; for he exempts and gives a privilege to high commissions of regimen and cases of state; a description so large and indefinite, that, if it should be acquiesced in, it would leave few acts of the crown, on which a lawyer could safely give an opinion. Particular delicacy and caution certainly ought to be used, where the prerogative of the crown is drawn into question; and it may be possible for a lawyer to exercise the right of giving opinions so indecently and licentiously, as to render himself responsible criminally. But then the crime arises from the abuse, not from the want of the right.
It may also be possible to put a case so strong, as to be beyond the line of a professional opinion. Thus if a private lawyer should be consulted, whether the king had a right to the crown, who can doubt that he would answer such a question at his peril? But the question, on which Mr. Whitelocke gave his opinion, was not of this kind, being on a commission from the crown, the legality of which it was competent to the subject to controvert, and consequently to take legal advice about. On the whole, the true rule seems to be, that a barrister may give his opinion on every question, however relative to the king or his prerogative, which the subject may contest with the crown in a court of justice; but that in exercising this right he must keep so within the bounds of an opinion, as not under the color of it to obtrude either private or public scandal. In respect to Mr. Whitelocke's particular case, the subject of the opinion he gave seems perfectly unexceptionable; nor could it be an offence, that his opinion was against the extent of the prerogative, or that it was erroneous. The only ground then, on which he could be criminally responsible, was for some licentious and extraneous matter introduced into the opinion, in respect to which no judgment can now be decisively formed, as the words of the opinion do not appear; though as far as a conjecture may be made from lord Bacon's manner of observing on the opinion, it was equally innocent both in subject and language.]

Speech of the attorney-general sir Francis Bacon, from the 3d volume of the last 4to edition of his works, page 471.

My lords,

THE offence wherewith Mr. Whitelocke is charged, (for as to sir Robert Mansell, I take it to my part only to be sorry for his error) is a contempt of a high nature, and resting upon two parts:
on the one, a presumptuous and licentious censure and defying of his majesty's prerogative in general; the other, a slander and traducement of one act or emanation hereof, containing a commission of survey and reformation of abuses in the office of the navy.

This offence is fit to be opened and set before your Lordships, as it hath been well begun, both in the true state and in the true weight of it. For as I desire, that the nature of the offence may appear in its true colours; so, on

on the other side, I desire, that the shadow of it may not darken or involve any thing that is lawful, or agreeable with the just and reasonable liberty of the subject.

First, we must and do agree, that the asking and taking, and giving of counsel in law is an essential part of justice; and to deny that, is to shut the gate of justice, which in the Hebrews commonwealth was therefore held in the gate, to shew all passage to justice must be open: and certainly counsel in law is one of the passages. But yet, for all that, this liberty is not infinite and without limits.

If a jesuited papist should come, and ask counsel (I put a case not altogether feigned) whether all the acts of parliament made in the time of queen Elizabeth and king James are void or no; because there are no lawful bishops sitting in the upper house, and a parliament must consist of lords spiritual and temporal and commons; and a lawyer will set it under his hand, that they be all void, I will touch him for high treason upon this his counsel.

So, if a puritan preacher will ask counsel, whether he may stile the king defender of the faith, because he receives not the discipline and presbytery; and the lawyer will tell him, it is no part of the king's stile, it will go hard with such a lawyer.

Or if a tribunitious popular spirit will go and ask a lawyer, whether the oath and band of allegiance be to the kingdom and crown only, and not to the king, as was Hugh Spenser's case, and he deliver his opinion as Hugh Spenser did; he will be in Hugh Spenser's danger.

So as the privilege of giving counsel proveth not all opinions: and as some opinions given are traitorous; so are there others of a much inferior nature, which are contemptuous. And among these I reckon Mr. Whitelocke's; for as for his loyalty and true heart to the king, God forbid I should doubt it.

Therefore let no man mistake so far, as to conceive, that any lawful and due liberty of the subject for asking counsel in law is called in question, when points of disloyalty or of contempt are restrained. Nay, we see it is the grace and favour of the king and his courts, that if the case be tender, and a wise lawyer in modesty and discretion refuseth to be of council, for you have lawyers sometimes too nice as well as too bold, they are then ruled and assigned to be of council. For certainly counsel is the blind man's guide; and sorry I am with all my heart, that in this case the blind did lead the blind.

For the offence, for which Mr. Whitelocke is charged, I hold it great, and to have, as I said at first, two parts; the one a censure, and, as much as in him is, a circling, nay a clipping, of the king's prerogative in general: the other, a slander and depravation of the king's power and honour in this commission.

And for the first of these, I consider it again in three degrees: first, that he presumed to censure the king's prerogative at all. Secondly, that he runneth into the generality of it more than was pertinent to the present question. And lastly, that he hath erroneously, and falsely, and dangerously given opinion in derogation of it.

First, I make a great difference between the king's grants and ordinary omissions of justice, and the king's high commissions of regiment, or mixed with causes of state.

For the former, there is no doubt but they may be freely questioned and disputed, and any defect in matter or form stood upon, though the king be many times the adverse party.

But for the latter sort, they are rather to be dealt with, if at all, by a modest, and humble intimation or remonstrance to his majesty, and his council, than by bravery of dispute or peremptory opposition.

Of this kind is that properly to be understood, which is said in Bracton, de chartis et factis regis non debent, aut possunt, iustitii aut private persone disputare; sed tutius est, ut expectetur sententia regis.

And the king's courts themselves have been exceeding tender and sparing in it; so that there is in all our law, not three cases of it. And in that very case of 24 Ed. 3 Ass. pl. 5. which Mr. Whitelocke vouched, where as it was a commission to arrest a man, and to carry him to prison, and to seize his goods without any form of justice or examination preceding; and that the judges saw it was obtained by surreption; yet the judges said they would keep it by them, and shew it to the king's council.

But Mr. Whitelocke did not advise his client to acquaint the king's council with it, but presumptuously giveth opinion, that it is void. Nay, not so much as a clause or passage of modesty, as that he submits his opinion to censure: that it is too great a matter for him to deal in; or this is my opinion, which is nothing, &c. But illotis manibus, he takes it into his hands, and pronounceth of it, as a man would scarcely do of a warrant of a justice of peace, and speaks like a dictator, that this is law, and this is against law, &c.

Arabella
[The occasion, of examining lady Shrewsbury before the privy council, was her conduct in respect to the marriage of lady Stuart. This latter lady was first-cousin to James the first; for she was the daughter of Charles earl of Lenox, the younger brother of James's father lord Darnley. Her mother was Elizabeth daughter of sir William Cavendish. The countess of Shrewsbury was aunt to lady Arabella, being sister to her mother. A marriage took place between lady Arabella and sir William Seymour, who at the Restoration recovered the dukedom of Somerset for his family. Being a marriage with one so nearly related in blood to the king, and without his consent, it was deemed an offence against the royal prerogative, on which account lady Arabella and her husband were imprisoned; the former in a private house at Lambeth, the latter in the Tower. But both escaped from their confinement with a view to retire abroad; and the countess of Shrewsbury was taken into custody as privy and accessory to the escape of lady Arabella. On being examined by the privy-council, the countess refused to discover what she knew of the affair of the marriage and escape, or to subscribe her examination; and for this refusal she was brought before a select council, whose proceedings on the occasion are the subject of the following case.—What we shall first lay before the reader is lord Coke's account of the case, from his twelfth Report. Lord Bacon's speech, which is next given, was first printed in the Cabala, but is here taken from the last edition of his works, vol. 3. p. 265. For further particulars, relative to the marriage of lady Arabella Stuart, and the proceedings against her, sir William Seymour her husband, and lady Shrewsbury, the curious reader may consult Winwood's Memorials of State. IN this term, before a select council at York-house; scil. the lord chancellor, the archbishop, the duke of Lenox, the earl of Northampton, lord privy seal, the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, the earl of Worcester, the earl of Pembroke, viscount Erskin, viscount Rochford, the lord Zouch, the lord Knolls, the lord Wootton, the chancellor of the Exchequer, the chancellor of the duchy, Fleming chief justice of the King's Bench, Philips master of the rolls, Coke chief justice of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield chief baron.

The countess of Shrewsbury (the wife of Gilbert earl of Shrewsbury) then prisoner in the Tower, was brought before the said lords, and by the attorney and solicitor of the king was charged with a high and great contempt of dangerous consequence; for they declared that the lady Arbella, being of the blood royal, had married Seymour, second son of the earl of Hertford, without privy or assent of the king, for which contempt the said Seymour was committed to the Tower, and had escaped and fled beyond the seas; the lady Arbella being under restraint escaped also, and embarked herself upon the sea, and was taken before she got over; of which flight of the said lady Arbella, the said countess, being her aunt, very well knew and abetted, as is directly proved by Crompton, and not denied by the lady Arbella: and admit it, that the lady Arbella had no evil intent against the king (who had always a great and special care of her, and was very bountiful unto her, until her marriage with the said Seymour, which was the pomum vetitum;) yet when she fled, and when she should be environed with evil spirits, cum perversis perverti possit, and when she shall be in another sphere, she will not move within the same orb.

And the lords of the privy council, knowing the arcana imperii, did shew divers perilous consequences, and the rather for this, that the said countess is an obstinate popish recusant, and as was said, perverted also the lady Arbella.

Now the charge was in two points.

1. That the said countess of Shrewsbury, by commandment of the king, being called to the council-table, before the lords of the council at Whitehall, and there being required by the lords to declare her knowledge touching the said points, and to discover what she knew concerning them, for the safety of the king, and quiet of the realm; she answered, that she would not make any particular answer; and being again asked by the king's command by the council at Lambeth, and being charged again to answer to the said point, she refused for two causes.

1. For that she had made a rash vow that she would not declare any thing in particular touching the said points; and for that (as she said) it was better to obey God than man.

2. She stood upon her privilege of nobility, scil. to answer only when she was called judicially before her peers; for that such privilege was allowed (as she said) to William earl of Pembroke, and to the lord Lumley.

2. The second point of her charge was, that when such answer which she had made was put in writing, and read to her, yet she refused to subscribe to it.

Which denial to discover and discharge her conscience in a case which toucheth the safety of the king, and quiet of the realm, was urged by the king's council to be a great and high contempt, and that

(a) But in 1628, the house of lords came to a resolution, declaring it to be the ancient right of the nobility of this kingdom and the lords of the upper house of parliament, to answer in all courts as defendants upon protestation of honour only.

Journ. Dom. Proc. 6. Mar. 1628. This resolution was in consequence of an order, made about two years before by the Star-chamber against the earl of Lincoln, to answer a bill on oath; though this order had passed after great deliberation, and was founded on an unanimous opinion of the lords of the privy council, and of all the nobility hath not any such privilege as is alleged, nor any such allowance as was supposed; and that rash and illegal vows make not an excuse, and that this precedent being now upon the stage, was of very dangerous consequence: and the said countess hearing the charge, yet persisted in her obstinate refusal, for the same reasons and causes upon which she had insisted before: and the lord chancellor began, and the archbishop, and all the other lords began with the first, and adjudged it a great and high contempt, and the lord chancellor said, that that was against the law of England, with which all the lords agreed.

And that no such allowance was given to the said earl of Pembroke, or to the lord Lumley in respect of their privilege of nobility, but that they were voces populi, et ideo non audiende: and the lord archbishop principally proved, that as well the contempt, as the said rash vow was against the law of God, which he and the earl of Northampton principally proved by divers texts and examples in holy scripture.

And the effect of all that which the three justices said, was, that after the sentences of all the learned, prudent, and honourable personages and counsellors of estate, they might well be silent; but in regard that silentium in senatu est vitium, they would speak something briefly, viz.

That three things in this case are to be well considered.

1. Whether the refusals aforesaid of the said countess were offences in law against the king, his crown and dignity.

2. What manner of proceeding this is, and whether it was justifiable by precedent or reason.

3. What is the demerit of the offences, and how punishable.

As to the first, it was resolved by the justices and master of the rolls, that the denying to be examined was a high and great contempt in law, against the king, his crown and dignity; and that if it should be permitted, it would be an occasion of many high and dangerous designs against the king and the realm, which cannot be discovered: and upon hope of impunity it will be an encouragement to offenders, as Fleming justice said, to enterprize dangerous attempts.

And the master of the rolls said, that it was not any privilege of nobility, to refuse to be examined in this case, no more than of any subject.

Also, if one that is noble, and a peer of the realm, be sued in the Star-Chamber, or in Chancery, they ought to answer upon their oaths, (a) and may be examined in the Star-Chamber upon interrogatories upon their oaths: and if one who is noble be produced as a witness between party and party, he ought to be sworn, or otherwise his testimony is of no value; and so is the common experience in the said courts: and the chief justice said, that forasmuch as where order is neglected, confusion will follow, he would recite some of the honourable privileges which the law of England (more than any other law) attribute to the nobility of England in legal proceedings; and they will not be impertinent, but give a great light to the case now in hand.

(1.) If a baron, viscount, earl, or other lord of parliament and peer of the realm be plaintiff in any action, and the defendant will plead that the plaintiff is not a baron, viscount, earl, &c. as he is named in the writ, this shall not be tried at the common law by jury, who may be corrupted, nor by witnesses, as in the Star-Chamber, or Chancery, who may be suborned; but it shall be tried by the record in Chancery, which imports by itself solid truth; so great regard hath the law to the trial of their honour and dignity, &c.

(2.) Their persons have many honourable privileges in law.

At the suit of a subject their bodies shall not be arrested, neither capias nor exigent lieth against them.

Judges except Dodderidge who was absent. See the earl of Lincoln's case, W. Jo. 151. Hist. 87. Cro. Ch. 64. In 1620, the lords renewed the declaration of this privilege in answering as defendants without oath, with an explanation, that it extended to all answers and examinations on interrogatories, in all causes as well criminal as civil, and in all courts and commissions, and also to the widows and dowagers of temporal peers. Journ. Dom. Proc. 31. Dec. 1620. The present practice of our courts of equity conforms to this order of the lords. Enj. 102. See further 2. Black. 2. For

And per part. 200. See also 572. 1. Black. 2. 2. For

2. For the honour and reverence which the law gives to nobility, their bodies are not subject to torture in causa criminis læsæ majestatis (a).
3. They are not to be sworn in assises, juries, or other inquests.
4. If any servant of the king, named in the cheque-roll, compass or intend to kill any lord of parliament, or other lord of the king's council, this is felony.
5. In the Common Pleas, a lord of parliament shall have knights returned on his jury.
6. He shall have day of grace.
7. A lord of parliament shall not be tried in case of treason, felony, or misprison of them, but by those who are noble and peers of the realm.
8. In trial of a peer, the lords of parliament shall not swear, but they give their judgment super fidem et ligeantiam domino regi debitam, so that their faith and allegiance stands in equipoise with an oath in the case of a common person in trial of life: and the writs of parliament, directed to the lords of parliament, are sub fide & ligeantia, &c.

And the reason and cause, that the king gives them many other privileges, is for this, because all honour and nobility is derived from the king as the true fountain: and the king honours with nobility, for two causes.

1. Ad consulendum, and for that reason he gives them a robe.
2. Ad defendendum regem et regnum, and for that cause he gives them a sword.

And so far as they derive their dignities, accompanied with all those honourable privileges, from the king, to deny to answer, being required thereto by the king, to such points as concern the safety of the king and quiet of the realm, is a high contempt and disobedience, accompanied with great ingratitude.

This denial is contra ligeantiam suam debitam, against the faith and allegiance of a person noble, due to the king, and which the law greatly esteems.

And that this denying is against her faith and allegiance appears by the ancient oath of allegiance, which is imprinted in the heart of every subject, scilicet. ero verus & fidelis, et veritatem præstabo domino regi de vita et membro, et de terreno honore, ad vivendum et moriendum contra omnes gentes, &c. Et si cognosciam aut audiam de aliquo damno aut malo quod domino regi evenire poterit, quod non revelato, &c. And this oath of allegiance is common to all subjects, as well those of the nobility as commonalty. But the law hath greater account of the faith and allegiance of a nobleman, than

(a) It is surprising, that doctrine so reflecting on the law of England should escape from one of lord Coke's character. His language as attorney-general at the trials of the earls of Essex and Southampton implies the same obnoxious tenet. But in his third Institute he gives it as his opinion most decisively, that all tortures of accused persons are contrary to our law; and to prove it cites lord-chancellor Fortescue's famous book de laudibus legum Angliæ, where he argues for a preference of our law to the civil law from of one of the commons, for this, that the breach of their allegiance is more dangerous to the king and estate, for corruptio optimorum est pessima; and for this reason, the countess by her allegiance was bound, without being demanded, to reveal to the king what she knows concerning the premises, upon which great mischief may happen to the king and the realm. But being commanded by the king to declare her knowledge, the denying of it doth greatly aggravate the offence.

Qui contemnit præceptum, contemnit præcipientem.

Command and obedience are the ligament of government, and ligeantia est legis essentia; for without allegiance and obedience, the law cannot proceed.

As to the second point, viz. concerning the manner of this proceeding.

1. Privative, it is not to fine and imprison, or inflict corporal punishment upon the countess; for fine and imprisonment ought to be assessed in some court judicially.

Vide the earl of Essex's case, 42 & 43 Eliz. 4246

2. Positive, the fine is ad monendum, or at the most ad minandum; it is ad instruendum non ad destruendum.

This selected council is to express what punishment this offence justly deserved, if it be judicially proceeded within the Star-Chamber; for which reason this manner of proceeding is out of the mercy and grace of the king against this honourable lady, that she seeing her offence may submit herself to the king, without any punishment in any court judicially.

If sentence shall be given in the Star-Chamber according to justice, you the lords shall be agents in it: but in this manner according to the mercy of the king, the king is only agent; the law hath put rules and limits to the justice of the king, but not unto his mercy, that is transcendent and without any limits of the law; et ideo processus iste est regalis plane & rege dignus.

Also inasmuch as the allegiance and obedience of the subject, is the best flower in his imperial garland, to the intent, that it may neither be blasted, nor impaired by this dangerous example, to the prejudice of his royal prerogative and posterity, this proceeding hath been thought necessary: and this is fortified by the precedent of the earl of Essex, against whom such proceedings were in this very place, anno 42 and 43 Eliz. reg.

And as to the last point it was resolved by all quasi una voce, that if a sentence should be given in the Star-Chamber judicially, she should be fined twenty thousand pounds, and imprisoned during the king's pleasure. Vide 12 Co. 69, &c.

Hoc in terrorem, sed quere quid inde veniat?

the latter's allowance of torture. 3 Inst. 35. In the case of Felton, for the murder of the duke of Buckingham, the judges were unanimous, that Felton could not be tortured by the rack; for no such punishment, said they, is known or allowed by our law. 1 Rush. 638. 639. As to the instances of torture collected by a most respectable writer of the present time, they only prove an irregularity of practice. Barringt. Ant. Stat. 4th ed. 33. 88. 395. If torture was lawful, we should find rules to direct its application. EDITOR.

Speech of sir Francis Bacon, from vol. 3. of his works, last 4to edit. page 265.

YOUR lordships do observe the nature of this charge: my lady of Shrewsbury, a lady wife, and that ought to know what duty requireth, is charged to have refused, and to have persisted in refusal to answer, and to be examined in a high cause of state, being examined by the council-table, which is a representative body of the king. The nature of the cause, upon which she was examined, is an essential point, which doth aggravate and increase this contempt and presumption; and therefore of necessity with that we must begin.

How graciously and parent-like his majesty used the lady Arabella before he gave him cause of indignation, the world knoweth.

My lady notwithstanding, extremely ill-advised, transacted the most weighty and binding part and action of her life, which is her marriage, without acquainting his majesty; which had been a neglect even to a mean parent; but being to our sovereign, and she standing so near to his majesty as she doth, and then choosing such a condition as it pleased her to choose, all parties laid together, how dangerous it was, my lady might have read it in the fortune of that house wherewith she is matched; for it was not unlike the case of Mr. Seymour's grandmother. The 1. Eliz. 161.

The king nevertheless so remembered he was a king, as he forgot not he was a kinsman, and placed her only sub libera custodia.

But now did my lady accumulate and heap up this offence with a far greater than the former, by seeking to withdraw herself out of the king's power into foreign parts.

That this flight or escape into foreign parts might have been seed of trouble to this state, is a matter whereof the conceit of a vulgar person is not incapable.

For although my lady should have put on a mind to continue her loyalty, as nature and duty did bind her; yet when she was in another sphere, she must have moved in the motion of that orb, and not of the planet itself: and God forbid the king's felicity should be so little, as he should not have envy and enviers enough in foreign parts.

It is true, if any foreigner had wrought upon this occasion, I do not doubt but the intent would have been, as the prophet saith, they have conceived mischief, and brought forth a vain thing. But yet your lordships know that it is wisdom in princes, and it is a watch they owe to themselves and to their people, to stop the beginnings of evils, and not to despise them. Seneca saith well, non jam amplius levia sunt pericula, si levia videantur; dangers cease to be light, because by despising they grow and gather strength.

And accordingly hath been the practice both of the wisest and stoutest princes to hold for matter pregnant of peril, to have any near them in blood to fly into foreign parts. Wherein I will not wander; but take the example of king Henry the seventh, a prince not unfit to be paralleled with his majesty. I mean not the particular of Perkin Warbeck, for he was but an idol or a disguise; but the example I mean, is that of the earl of Suffolk, whom the king extorted from Philip of Austria. The story is memorable, that Philip, after the death of Isabella, coming to take possession of his kingdom of Castile, which was but matrimonial to his father-in-law Ferdinando of Aragon, was cast by weather upon the coast of Weymouth, where the Italian story saith, king Henry used him in all things else as a prince, but in one thing as a prisoner; for he forced upon him a promise to restore the earl of Suffolk that was fled into Flanders. And yet this I note was in the 21st year of his reign, when the king had a goodly prince at man's estate, besides his daughters, nay, and the whole line of Clarence nearer in title; for that earl of Suffolk was descended of a sister of Edward the fourth. So far off did that king take his aim. To this action of so deep consequence, it appeareth, you, my lady of Shrewsbury, were privy, not upon foreign suspicions or strained inferences, but upon vehement presumptions, now clear and particular testimony, as hath been opened to you; so as the king had not only reason to examine you upon it, but to have proceeded with you upon it as for a great contempt; which if it be reserved for the present, your ladyship is to understand it aright, that it is not defect of proof, but abundance of grace that is the cause of this proceeding; and your ladyship shall do well to see into what danger you have brought yourself. All offences consist of the fact which is open, and the intent which is secret. This fact of conspiring in the flight of this lady may bear a hard and gentler construction; if upon overmuch affection to your kinswoman, gentler; if upon practice or other end, harder. You must take heed how you enter into such actions; whereof if the hidden part be drawn unto that which is open, it may be your overthrow; which I speak not by way of charge, but by way of caution.

For that which you are properly charged with, you must know that all subjects, without distinction of degrees, owe to the king tribute and service, not only of their deed and hand, but of their knowledge and discovery.

If there be any thing that imports the king's service, they ought themselves undemand to impart it; much more if they be called and examined, whether it be of their own fact or of another's, they ought to make direct answer. Neither was there ever any subject brought in causes of estate to trial judicial, but first he passed examination; for examination is the entrance of justice in criminal causes; it is one of the eyes of the king's politic body; there are but two, information and examination; it may not be endured that one of the lights be put out by your example.

Your excuses are not worthy your own judgment; rash vows of lawful things are to be kept, but unlawful vows not; your own divines will tell you so. For your examples, they are some erroneous traditions. My lord of Pembroke spake somewhat that he was unlettered, and it was but when he was examined by one private counsellor, to whom he took exception. That of my lord Lumley is a fiction; the preeminences of nobility I would hold with to the last grain; but every day's experience is to the contrary. Nay, you may learn duty of lady Arabella herself, a lady of the blood, of an higher rank than yourself, who declining, and yet that but by request neither, to declare of your fact, yieldeth ingenuously to be examined of her own. I do not doubt but by this time you see both your own error, and the king's grace in proceeding with you in this manner.

XIX. The Case of Mr. OLIVER ST. JOHN, on an Information ore tenus, in the Star-Chamber, 15 April, 1615, for writing and publishing a Paper against a Benevolence, collected under Letters of the Privy-Council.

[All that we have in print of the proceedings on this case is lord Bacon's speech as attorney-general and prosecutor. See 2 Bacon's works, last 4to edit. 583. The paper which was the ground of the prosecution is in the Cabala. See page 332, of 2d part, 3d edit. The judgment of the court was that Mr. St. John should pay a fine of 5000 l. and be imprisoned during the king's pleasure. See the note in 3 Bacon, last 4to edit. 267. and the Introd. to Bac. Lett. by Stevens. p. xxiii. The case appears to have been prosecuted with great anxiety; for according to a letter from lord Bacon to the king, lord chancellor Egerton, who from the infirmities of age was then on the point of resigning the great seal, expressed a wish to attend the hearing, and so make it the conclusion of his services. 3 Bac. 264. The grand argument of lord Bacon in favour of the benevolence was, that it was without compulsion. If in the representation of the conduct of a rival and enemy, lord Bacon can be trusted, lord Coke, then chief justice of the King's Bench, at first gave it as his opinion, that the king could not so much as move any of his subjects for a benevolence, but afterwards retracted in the Star-Chamber, and there delivered the law in favour of it strongly. Ibid. 483. 274.

In our introductory note to the case of impositions, benevolences were enumerated as one of the devices of extra-parliamentary taxation. Ante, page 29. As such the statute of 1 R. 3. c. 2. styles them an unlawful invention, and annuls them for ever. But the benevolences, mentioned in this statute, are described to have been so in name only, and to have been taken by coercion. Still therefore it was insisted, that gifts to the crown out of parliament, if really voluntary, were lawful. So lord Bacon argued in the following case; so in the same sense lord Coke is stated to have declared the law; so lord Coke himself gives his opinion in his notes on benevolences in the 12th Report; and so according to him all the judges resolved in the 40th of Elizabeth. 12 Co. 119. Lord Coke lays a stress on the statute of 15 Hen. 7. c. 10. which, after reciting that many of the king's subjects had severally granted to him diverse sums of money of their free wills and benevolence, and that some of these were in arrear, provides a remedy for compelling the payment. See Rastall's edit. of the Statutes. This statute, it must be confessed, seems to give a legislative sanction to such benevolences as were really free offerings. But there is a later statute, with words strongly importing, that benevolences to the crown, though voluntary, cannot regularly be made out of parliament. The statute we mean is the 13 Cha. 2. c. 4. which authorises the king to issue commissions under the great seal, for receiving voluntary subscriptions for the supply of his occasions; but limits commoners to 200 l. and peers to 400 l. a-piece, and also the time for subscribing, and concludes with declaring, that no commissions or aids of this nature can be issued out or levied but by authority of parliament. This in effect concurs with lord Coke's first opinion in Mr. St. John's case, as represented by lord Bacon; the aim of the statute being to condemn benevolences by the solicitation of commissions from the crown, and so to supply the defect of the statute of Richard the third and of the Petition of Right, both of which point at compulsive benevolences. The inducement to such a declaration of the law probably was an idea, that a formal solicitation from the crown must necessarily operate, on the minds of those to whom it was addressed, with an influence almost equal to compulsion.—Thus at length it seems to be settled by the legislature, not only that compulsive benevolences are unlawful, but that all commissions from the crown to solicit and receive voluntary gifts are also unconstitutional.]

Letter from Mr. Oliver St. John to the Mayor of Marlborough, which was the subject of the prosecution; taken from the Cabala, 3d edition, part 2. page 332.

I think, this kind of benevolence is against law, reason and religion.

1. The law is in the statute called magna charta, 9 H. 3. cap. 29. that no free-man be any way destroy'd, but by laws of the land. Secondly, besides that the said statute of magna charta is by all princes since established and confirmed, it is, in the special case of voluntary or free grants, enacted and decreed 25 E. 1. cap. 5. that no such be drawn into custom: and cap. 6. that henceforth be taken no such aids, taxes, free grants, or prizes, but by assent of all the realm, and for the good of the same. And in primo R. 3. cap. 2. that the subjects and commons in this realm, from henceforth shall in no wise be charged by any charge or imposition called a benevolence, or any such like charge; and that such exactions, called a benevolence, shall be damned and annulled for ever.

First, it is not only without, but against reason, that the commons, in their several and particulars, should be relievers or suppliers of his majesty's wants, who neither know his wants, nor the sums that may be raised to supply the same.

Secondly, it is against reason, that the particular and several commons, distracted, should oppose their judgement and discretion to the judgement and discretion of the wisdom of their land assembled in parliament, who have there denied any such aid.

It argueth in us want of love and due respect of our sovereign lord and king, which ought to be in every of us towards each other, which is, to stay every one which we see falling, and reduce the current. What prosperity can be expected to befall either our king or nation, when the king shall, haply out of ignorance, or ('tis I hope) out of forgetfulness or headiness, commit so great a sin against his God, as is the violating of his great and solemn oath taken at his coronation, for the maintaining of his lawes, liberties and customs of this noble realm; and his subjects, some for fear, some in pride, some to please others, shall joyn hands to forward so unhappy an atchievement? Can he any way more highly offend the divine majesty (whom he then invoked?) As also, can he then give unto another Hen. 4. (if such an one should rise up, which God forbid) a greater advantage? Let those articles put up against R. 2. be looked on, it will appear, that the breach of laws, infringing the liberties, and failing in this oath, were the main blemishes wherewith he could distain and spot the honour of that good and gentle prince; who indeed was rather by others abused, than of himself mischievously any way disposed.

2. As very irreligiously and uncharitably, we help forward the king's majesty in that grievous sin of perjury; so into what an hellish danger we plunge ourselves, even so many of us as contribute, is to be learned out of the several curses and sentences of excommunication given out against all such givers, and, namely, the two following, viz. the great curse given out, the 36 H. 3. against all breakers of the liberties and customs of the realm of England, with their abettors, counsellours and executioners; wherein, by the sentence of Boniface archbishop of Canterbury, and the chief part of all the bishops of this land, are ipso facto excommunicated. And that of 24 Ed. 1. denounced immediately upon the acts made against such benevolence, free grants and impositions, had, and taken without common assent; which, because it is not so large as that former, I will set down as our books deliver the same.

"In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. Whereas our sovereign lord the king, to the honour of God, and of the holy church, and for the common profit of the realm, hath granted, for him and his heirs for ever, these articles above written: Robert archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, admonish'd all his province, once, twice, and thrice, because that shortness will not suffer so much delay, as to give knowledge to all the people of England of these presents in writing. We, therefore, enjoyn all persons, of what estate soever they be, that they, and every of them, as much as in them is, shall uphold and maintain those articles granted by our sovereign lord the king in all points; and all those that, in any point, do resist, or break those ordinances, or go about it by word or deed, openly or privately, by any manner of pretence or colour. We therefore, the said archbishop, by our authority in writing expressed, do excommunicate and accurse, and from the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and from all the company of Heaven, and from all the sacraments of the holy church, do sequester and exclude."

Sir, hearing that to-morrow the justices will be here about this busie work of benevolence, wherein you have both sent unto, and talked with me, and thinking that it may be, you would deliver up the names of the 'non-givers: soasmuch as, I think, I shall scarcely be at home to make my further answer, if I should be called for, I pray you, both hereby to understand my mind yourself, and if cause so require, to let the justices perceive as much. So leaving others to their own consciences, whereby in that last and dreadful day they shall stand or fall before him who will reward every man according to his deeds, I commend you to the grace of the Almighty, and rest

Your loving neighbour and friend,

Oliver St. John.

Speech of Sir Francis Bacon as attorney-general, addressed to the court of Star-Chamber, from his works, vol. 2. p. 583.

My lords,

I SHALL inform you ore tenus, against this gentleman Mr. I. S. a gentleman, as it seems, of an ancient house and name; but, for the present, I can think of him by no other name, than the name of a great offender. The nature and quality of his offence, in sum, is this. This gentleman hath, upon advice, not suddenly by his pen, nor by the slip of his tongue; not privately, or in a corner, but publicly, as it were, to the face of the king's ministers and justices, slandered and traduced the king our sovereign, the law of the land, the parliament, and infinite particulars of his majesty's worthy and loving subjects. Nay, the slander is of that nature, that it may seem to interest the people in grief and discontent against the state: whence might have ensued matter of murmur and sedition. So that it is not a simple slander, but a seditious slander, like to that the poet speaketh of, — calamosque armare veneno. A venomous dart that hath both iron and poison.

To open to your lordships the true state of this offence, I will set before you, first, the occasion whereupon Mr. I. S. wrought: then the offence itself in his own words: and lastly, the points of his charge.

My lords, you may remember that there was the last parliament an expectation to have had the king supplied with treasure, although the event failed. Herein it is not fit for me to give opinion of an house of parliament, but I will give testimony of truth in all places. I served in the lower house, and I observed somewhat. This I do affirm, that I never could perceive but that there was in that house a general disposition to give, and to give largely. The clocks in the house perchance might differ; some went too fast, some went too slow; but the disposition to give was general: so that I think I may truly say, solo tempore lapsus amor.

This accident happening thus besides expectation, it stirred up and awaked in divers of his majesty's worthy servants and subjects of the clergy, the nobility, the court, and others here near at hand, an affection loving and cheerful, to present the king some with plate, some with money, as free-will offerings, a thing that God Almighty loves, a cheerful giver: what an evil eye doth I know not. And, my lords, let me speak it plainly unto you: God forbid any body should be so wretched as to think that the obligation of love and duty, from the subject to the king, should be joint and not several. No, my lords, it is both. The subject petitioneth to the king in parliament. He petitioneth likewise out of parliament. The king on the other side gives graces to the subject in parliament: he gives them likewise, and poureth them upon his people out of parliament; and so no doubt the subject may give to the king in parliament, and out of parliament. It is true the parliament is intercurfus magnus, the great intercourse and main current of graces and donatives from the king to the people, from the people to the king: but parliaments are held but at certain times; whereas the passages are always open for particulars; even as you see great rivers have their tides, but particular springs and fountains run continually.

To proceed therefore: as the occasion, which was the failing of supply by parliament, did awake the love and benevolence of those that were at hand to give; so it was apprehended and thought fit by my lords of the council to make a proof whether the occasion and example both, would not awake those in the country of the better sort to follow. Whereupon, their lordships devised and directed letters unto the sheriffs and justices, which declared what was done here above, and wished that the country might be moved, especially men of value.

Now, my lords, I beseech you give me favour and attention to set forth and observe unto you five points. I will number them, because other men may note them; and I will but touch them, because they shall not be drowned or lost in discourse, which I hold worthy the observation, for the honour of the state and confusion of slanderers; whereby it will appear most evidently what care was taken, that that which was then done might not have the effect, no nor the shew, no nor so much as the shadow of a tax; and that it was so far from breeding or bringing in any ill precedent or example, as contrariwise it is a corrective that doth correct and allay the harshness and danger of former examples.

The first is, that what was done was done immediately after such a parliament, as made general profession to give, and was interrupted by accident: so as you may truly and justly esteem it, tantum posthuma proles parimenti, as an after-child of the parliament, and in pursuit, in some small measure, of the firm intent of a parliament past. You may take it also, if you will, as an advance or provisional help until a future parliament; or as a gratification simply without any relation to a parliament; you can no ways take it amiss.

The second is, that it wrought upon example, as a thing not devised or projected, or required; no nor so much as recommended, until many, that were never moved nor dealt with, ex mero motu, had freely and frankly sent in their presents. So that the letters were rather like letters of news, what was done at London, than otherwise: and we know exempla ducunt, non trahunt; examples they do but lead, they do not draw nor drive.

The third is, that it was not done by commission under the great seal; a thing warranted by a multitude of precedents, both ancient, and of late time, as you shall hear anon, and no doubt warranted by law: so that the commissions be of that stile and tenour, as that they be to move and not to levy: but this was done by letters of the council, and no higher hand or form.

The fourth is, that these letters had no manner of shew of any binding act of state: for they contain not any special frame or direction how the business should be managed; but were written as upon trust, leaving the matter wholly to the industry and confidence of those in the country; so that it was an absque compoto; such a form of letters as no man could fitly be called to account upon.

The fifth and last point is, that the whole carriage of the business had no circumstance compulsory. There was no proportion or rate set down, not so much as by way of a will; there was no menace of any that should deny; no reproof of any that did deny; no certifying of the names of any that had denied. Indeed, if men could not content themselves to deny, but that they must censure and inveigh, nor to excuse themselves; but they must accuse the state, that is another case. But I say, for denying, no man was apprehended, no nor noted. So that I verily think, that there is none so subtle a disputer in the controversy of liberum arbitrium, that can with all his distinctions fasten or carp upon the act, but that there was free-will in it.

I conclude therefore, my lords, that this was a true and pure benevolence; not an imposition called a benevolence, which the statute speaks of; as you shall hear by one of my fellows. There is a great difference, I tell you, though Pilate would not see it, between rex Judæorum, and se dicens regem Judæorum. And there is a great difference between a benevolence and an exaction called a benevolence, which the duke of Buckingham speaks of in his oration to the city; and defineth it to be not what the subject of his good-will would give, but what the king of his good-will would take. But this, I say, was a benevolence wherein every man had a prince's prerogative, a negative voice; and this word, excuse moy, was a plea peremptory. And therefore I do wonder how Mr. I. S. could foul or trouble so clear a fountain. Certainly it was but his own bitterness and unsound humours.

Now to the particular charge. Amongst other countries, these letters of the lords came to the justices of D-shire, who signified the contents thereof, and gave directions and appointments for meetings concerning the business, to several towns and places within that county: and amongst the rest, notice was given unto the town of A. The mayor of A, conceiving that this Mr. I. S. being a principal person, and a dweller in that town, was a man likely to give both money and good example, dealt with him to know his mind. He intending, as it seems, to play prizes, would give no answer to the mayor in private, but would take time. The next day then being an appointment of the justices to meet, he takes occasion, or pretends occasion to be absent, because he would bring his papers upon the stage: and thereupon takes pen in hand, and instead of excusing himself, sits down and contriveth a seditious and libellous accusation against the king and state, which your lordships shall now hear, and sends it to the mayor: and withal, because the feather of his quill might fly abroad, he gives authority to the mayor to impart it to the justices, if he so thought good. And now, my lords, because I will not mistake or mis-repeat, you shall hear the seditious libel in the proper terms and words thereof.

[Here the papers were read.]

My lords, I know this paper offends your ears much, and the ears of any good subject; and sorry I am that the times should produce offences of this nature: but since they do, I would be more sorry they should be passed without severe punishment: non tradite factum, as the verse says, altered a little, aut si traditis, facti quoque tradite poenam. If any man have a mind to discourse of the fact, let him likewise discourse of the punishment of the fact.

In this writing, my lords, there appears a monster with four heads, of the progeny of him that is the father of lyes, and takes his name from slander.

The first is a wicked and seditious slander; or, if I shall use the scripture phrase, a blaspheming of the king himself; setting him forth for a prince perjured in the great and solemn oath of his coronation, which is as it were the knot of the diadem; a prince that should be a violator and infringer of the liberties, laws, and customs of the kingdom; a mark for an Henry the fourth; a match for a Richard the second.

The second is a slander and falsification, and wresting of the law of the land gross and palpable: it is truly said by a civilian, tortura legum pessima, the torture of laws is worse than the torture of men.

The third is a slander and false charge of the parliament, that they had denied to give to the king; a point of notorious untruth.

And the last is a slander and taunting of an infinite number of the king's loving subjects, that have given towards this benevolence and free contribution; charging them as accessary and co-adjutors to the king's perjury. Nay, you leave us not there, but you take upon you a pontifical habit, and couple your slander with a curse; but thanks be to God we have learned sufficiently out of the scripture, that as the bird flies away, so the causeless curse shall not come.

For the first of these, which concerns the king, I have taken to myself the opening and aggravation thereof; the other three I have distributed to my fellows.

My lords, I cannot but enter into this part with some wonder and astonishment, how it should come into the heart of a subject of England to vapour forth such a wicked and venomous slander against the king, whose goodness and grace is comparable, if not incomparable, unto any of the kings his progenitors. This therefore gives me a just and necessary occasion to do two things: the one, to make some representation of his majesty; such as truly he is found to be in his government, which Mr. I. S. chargeth with violation of laws and liberties: the other, to search and open the depth of Mr. I. S. his offence. Both which I will do briefly; because the one, I cannot express sufficiently; and the other, I will not press too far.

My lords, I mean to make no panegyric or laudative; the king delights not in it, neither am I fit for it: but if it were but a counsellor or nobleman, whose name had suffered, and were to receive some kind of reparation in this high court, I would do him that duty as not to pass his merits and just attributes, especially such as are limited with the present case, in silence: for it is fit to burn incense where evil odours have been cast and raised. Is it so that king James shall be said to be a violator of the liberties, laws, and customs of his kingdoms? Or is he not rather a noble and constant protector and conservator of them all? I conceive this consisteth in maintaining religion and the true church; in maintaining the laws of the kingdom, which is the subject's birth-right; in temperate use of the prerogative; in due and free administration of justice, and conservation of the peace of the land.

For religion, we must ever acknowledge in the first place, that we have a king that is the principal conservator of true religion through the Christian world. He hath maintained it not only with sceptre and sword, but likewise by his pen; wherein also he is potent.

He hath awaked and re-authorized the whole party of the reformed religion throughout Europe; which through the insolvency and divers artifices and enchantments of the adverse part, was grown a little dull and dejected: he hath summoned the fraternity of kings to enfranchise themselves from the usurpation of the see of Rome: he hath made himself a mark of contradiction for it.

Neither can I omit, when I speak of religion, to remember that excellent act of his majesty, which though it were done in a foreign country, yet the church of God is one, and the contagion of these things will soon pass seas and lands: I mean, in his constant and holy proceeding against the heretic Vorsius, whom, being ready to enter into the chair, and there to have authorized one of the most pestilent and heathenish heresies that ever was begun, his majesty by his constant opposition dismounted and pulled down. And I am persuaded there sits in this court one whom God doth the rather bless for being his majesty's instrument in that service.

I cannot remember religion and the church, but I must think of the feed-plots of the same, which are the universities. His majesty, as for learning amongst kings, he is incomparable in his person; so likewise hath he been in his government a benign or benevolent planet towards learning: by whose influence those nurseries and gardens of learning, the universities, were never more in flower nor fruit.

For the maintaining of the laws, which is the hedge and fence about the liberty of the subject, I may truly affirm it was never in better repair. He doth concur with the votes of the nobles; nolumus leges Angliæ mutare. He is an enemy of innovation. Neither doth the universality of his own knowledge carry him to neglect or pass over the very forms of the laws of the land. Neither was there ever king, I am persuaded, that did consult so oft with his judges, as my lords that sit here know well. The judges are a kind of council of the king's by oath and ancient institution; but he useth them so indeed; he confers regularly with them upon their returns from their visitations and circuits: he gives them liberty, both to inform him, and to debate matters with him; and in the fall and conclusion commonly relies on their opinions.

As for the use of the prerogative, it runs within the ancient channels and banks. Some things that were conceived to be in some proclamations, commissions, and patents, as overflows, have been by his wisdom and care reduced; whereby, no doubt, the main channel of his prerogative is so much the stronger. For evermore overflows do hurt the channel.

As for administration of justice between party and party, I pray observe these points. There is no news of great seal or signet that flies abroad for countenance or delay of causes; protections rarely granted, and only upon great ground, or by consent. My lords here of the council and the king himself meddle not, as hath been used in former times, with matters of meum and tuum, except they have apparent mixture with matters of estate, but leave them to the king's courts of law or equity. And for mercy and grace, without which there is no standing before justice, we see, the king now hath reigned twelve years in his white robe, without almost any aspersion of the crimson dye of blood. There sits my lord Hobart, that served attorney seven years. I served with him. We were so happy, as there passed not through our hands any one arraignment for treason; and but one for any capital offence, which was that of the lord Sanguhar; the noblest piece of justice, one of them, that ever came forth in any king's time.

As for penal laws, which lie as snares upon the subjects, and which were as a nema-scit to king Henry VII; it yields a revenue that will scarce pay for the parchment of the king's records at Westminster.

And lastly, for peace, we see manifestly his majesty bears some resemblance of that great name, a prince of peace: he hath preserved his subjects during his reign in peace, both within and without. For the peace with states abroad, we have it usque ad satietatem: and for peace in the lawyers phrase, which count trespasses, and forces, and riots, to be contra pacem; let me give your lordships this token or taste, that this court, where they should appear, had never less to do. And certainly there is no better sign of omnia bene, than when this court is in a still.

But, my lords, this is a sea of matter; and therefore I must give it over, and conclude, that there was never king reigned in this nation that did better keep covenant in preserving the liberties and procuring the good of his people: so that I must needs say for the subjects of England, as no doubt they do both know and acknowledge it; whatsoever a few turbulent discourses may, through the lenity of the time, take boldness to speak.

O fortunatos nimium sua si bona norint;

And as for this particular, touching the benevolence, wherein Mr. I. S. doth assign this breach of covenant, I leave it to others to tell you what the king may do, or what other kings have done; but I have told you what our king and my lords have done: which, I say and say again, is so far from introducing a new precedent, as it doth rather correct, and mollify, and qualify former precedents.

Now, Mr. I. S. let me tell you your fault in few words: for that I am persuaded you see it already, though I woo no man's repentance; but I shall, as much as in me is, cherish it where I find it. Your offence hath three parts knit together:

Your slander,
Your menace, and
Your comparison.

For your slander, it is no less than that the king is perjured in his coronation oath. No greater offence than perjury; no greater oath than that of a coronation. I leave it; it is too great to aggravate.

Your menace, that if there were a Bullingbroke, or I cannot tell what, there were matter for him, is a very seditious passage. You know well, that howsoever Henry the fourth's act, by a secret providence of God, prevailed, yet it was but an usurpation; and if it were possible for such a one to be this day, wherewith it seems your dreams are troubled, I do not doubt, his end would be upon the block; and that he would sooner have the ravens sit upon his head at London-Bridge, than the crown at Westminster. And it is not your interlacing of your 'God forbid,' that will save these seditious speeches: neither could it be a forewarning, because the matter was past and not revocable, but a very stirring up and incensing of the people. If I should say to you, for example, 'if these times were like some former times, of king Henry VIII, or some other times which God forbid,' Mr. I. S. it would cost you your life; I am sure you would not think this to be a gentle warning, but rather that I incensed the court against you.

And for your comparison with Richard II. I see, you follow the example of them that brought him upon the stage, and into print, in queen Elizabeth's time, a most prudent and admirable queen. But let me intreat you, that when you will speak of queen Elizabeth or king James, you would compare them to king Henry VII, or king Edward I, or some other parallels, to which they are alike. And this I would wish both you and all to take heed of, how you speak seditious matter in parables, or by tropes or examples. There is a thing in an indictment called an inuendo; you must beware how you beckon or make signs upon the king in a dangerous sense. But I will contain myself and press this no farther. I may hold you for turbulent or presumptuous; but I hope you are not disloyal: you are graciously and mercifully dealt with. And therefore having now opened to my lords, and, as I think, to your own heart and conscience, the principal part of your offence, which concerns the king, I leave the rest, which concerns the law, parliament, and the subjects that have given, to Mr. Serjeant and Mr. Solicitor.

XX. The Case of Duels; or Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, against Mr. WILLIAM PRIEST for writing and sending a Challenge, and Mr. RICHARD WRIGHT for carrying it, 26 Jan. 11 Jan. I. 1615.

[The following speech of lord Bacon as attorney-general in this case, and the decree of the court, are taken from the last edition of his works. See vol. 2. p. 563.]

Charge of sir Francis Bacon, the king's attorney-general.

My lords,
I THOUGHT it fit for my place, and for these times, to bring to hearing before your lordships some cause touching private duels, to see if this court can do any good to tame and reclaim that evil, which seems unbridled. And I could have wished that I had met with some greater persons, as a subject for your censure; both because it had been more worthy of this presence, and also the better to have shewed the resolution myself hath to proceed without respect of persons in this business. But finding this cause on foot in my predecessor's time, and published and ready for hearing, I thought to lose no time in a mischief that groweth every day: and besides, it passes not amiss sometimes in government, that the greater sort be admonished by an example made in the meaner, and the dog to be beaten before the lion. Nay, I should think, my lords, that men of birth and quality will leave the practice, when it begins to be villified, and come so low as to barber-surgeons and butchers, and such base mechanical persons.

And for the greatness of this presence, in which I take much comfort, both as I consider it in itself, and much more in respect it is by his majesty's direction, I will supply the meanness of the particular cause, by handling of the general point: to the end, that by the occasion of this present cause, both my purpose of prosecution against duels, and the opinion of the court, without which I am nothing, for the censure of them, may appear, and thereby offenders in that kind may read their own case, and know what they are to expect; which may serve for a warning until example may be made in some greater person: which I doubt the times will but too soon afford.

Therefore before I come to the particular, whereof your lordships are now to judge, I think it time best spent to speak somewhat.

First,

First, of the nature and greatness of this mischief.

Secondly, of the causes and remedies.

Thirdly, of the justice of the law of England, which some stick not to think defective in this matter.

Fourthly, of the capacity of this court, where certainly the remedy of this mischief is best to be found.

And fifthly, touching mine own purpose and resolution, wherein I shall humbly crave your lordships aid and assistance.

For the mischief itself, it may please your lordships to take into your consideration, that when revenge is once extorted out of the magistrates hands, contrary to God's ordinance, mibi vindicta, ego retribuam, and every man shall bear the sword, not to defend, but to assail; and private men begin once to presume to give law to themselves, and to right their own wrongs; no man can foresee the danger and inconveniencies that may arise and multiply thereupon. It may cause sudden storms in court, to the disturbance of his majesty, and unsafety of his person. It may grow from quarrels to bandying, and from bandying to trooping, and so to tumult and commotion; from particular persons to dissension of families and alliances; yea, to national quarrels, according to the infinite variety of accidents, which fall not under foresight. So that the state by this means shall be like to a distempered and imperfect body, continually subject to inflammations and convulsions.

Besides, certainly, both in divinity and in policy, offences of presumption are the greatest. Other offences yield and consent to the law that it is good, not daring to make defence, or to justify themselves; but this offence expressly gives the law an affront, as if there were two laws, one a kind of gown-law, and the other a law of reputation, as they term it. So that Paul's and Westminster, the pulpit and the courts of justice, must give place to the law, as the king speaketh in his proclamation, of ordinary tables, and such reverend assemblies: the year-books and statute-books must give place to some French and Italian pamphlets, which handle the doctrine of duels, which if they be in the right, transjamos ad illa, let us receive them, and not keep the people in conflict and distraction between two laws.

Again, my lords, it is a miserable effect, when young men full of towardness and hope, such as the poets call Auroræ filii, sons of the morning, in whom the expectation and comfort of their friends consisteth, shall be cast away and destroyed in such a vain manner. But much more it is to be deplored when so much noble and gentle blood should be spilt upon such follies, as, if it were adventured in the field in service of the king and realm, were able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a kingdom. So as your lordships see what a desperate evil this is; it troubleth peace; it dis-furnisheth war; it bringeth calamity upon private men, peril upon the state, and contempt upon the law.

Touching the causes of it; the first motive, no doubt, is a false and erroneous imagination of honour and credit; and therefore the king, in his last proclamation, doth most aptly and excellently call them bewitching duels. For, if one judge of it truly, it is no better than a sorcery that enchanteth the spirits of young men, that bear great minds with a false shew, species falsa; and a kind of satanical illusion and apparition of honour against religion, against law, against moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times and valiantest nations; as I shall tell you by and by, when I shall shew you that the law of England is not alone in this point.

But then the seed of this mischief being such, it is nourished by vain discourses, and green and unripe conceits, which nevertheless have so prevailed, as though a man were staid and sober-minded, and a right believer touching the vanity and unlawfulness of these duels; yet the stream of vulgar opinion is such, as it imposeth a necessity upon men of value to conform themselves, or else there is no living or looking upon mens faces: so that we have not to do, in this case, so much with particular persons, as with unfound and depraved opinions, like the dominations and spirits of the air which the scripture speaketh of.

Hereunto may be added, that men have almost lost the true notion and understanding of fortitude and valour. For fortitude distinguisheth of the grounds of quarrels whether they be just; and not only so, but whether they be worthy; and setteth a better price upon mens lives than to bestow them idly. Nay, it is weakness and dis-esteem of a man's self, to put a man's life upon such lightheaded performances. A man's life is not to be trifled away: it is to be offered up and sacrificed to honourable services, public merits, good causes, and noble adventures. It is in expence of blood as it is in expence of money. It is no liberality to make a profusion of money upon every vain occasion; nor no more it is fortitude to make effusion of blood, except the cause be of worth. And thus much for the causes of this evil.

For the remedies, I hope some great and noble person will put his hand to this plough, and I wish that my labours of this day may be but forerunners to the work of a higher and better hand. But yet to deliver my opinion as may be proper for this time and place, there be four things that I have thought on, as the most effectual for the repressing of this depraved custom of particular combats.

The first is, that there do appear and be declared a constant and settled resolution in the state to abolish it. For this is a thing, my lords, must go down at once, or not at all; for then every particular man will think himself acquitted in his reputation, when he sees that the state takes it to heart, as an insult against the king's power and authority, and thereupon hath absolutely resolved to master it; like unto that which was set down in express words in the edict of Charles IX. of France touching duels, that the king himself took upon him the honour of all that took themselves grieved or interested for not having performed the combat. So must the state do in this business; and in my conscience there is none that is but of a reasonable sober disposition, be he never so valiant, except it be some furious person that is like a firework, but will be glad of it, when he shall see the law and rule of state disinterest him of a vain and unnecessary hazard.

Secondly, care must be taken that this evil be no more cockered, nor the humour of it fed; wherein I humbly pray your lordships, that I may speak my mind freely, and yet be understood aright. The proceedings of the great and noble commissioners martial I honour and reverence much, and of them I speak not in any sort. But I say the compounding of quarrels, which is otherwise in use by private noblemen and gentlemen, it is so punctual, and hath such reference and respect unto the received conceits, what's before-hand, and what's behind-hand, and I cannot tell what, as without all question it doth, in a fashion, countenance and authorize this practice of duels, as if it had in it somewhat of right.

Thirdly, I must acknowledge, that I learned out of the king's last proclamation, the most prudent and best applied remedy for this offence, if it shall please his majesty to use it, that the wit of man can devise. This offence, my lords, is grounded upon a false conceit of honour; and therefore it would be punished in the same kind, in eo quis rectissime plectitur, in quo peccat. The fountain of honour is the king and his aspect, and the access to his person continueth honour in life, and to be banished from his presence is one of the greatest eclipses of honour that can be. If his majesty shall be pleased that when this court shall censure any of these offences in persons of eminent quality, to add this out of his own power and discipline, that these persons shall be banished and excluded from his court for certain years, and the courts of his queen and prince, I think there is no man, that hath any good blood in him, will commit an act that shall cast him into that darkness, that he may not behold his sovereign's face.

Lastly, and that which more properly concerneth this court: we see, my lords, the root of this offence is stubborn; for it despiseth death, which is the utmost of punishments; and it were a just but a miserable severity, to execute the law without all remission or mercy, where the case proveth capital. And yet the late severity in France was more, where, by a kind of martial law, established by ordinance of the king and parliament, the party that had slain another was presently had to the gibbet, inasmuch as gentlemen of great quality were hanged, their wounds bleeding, left a natural death should prevent the example of justice. But, my lords, the course which we shall take is of far greater lenity, and yet of no less efficacy; which is to punish, in this court, all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, which I will enumerate to you anon, and so to hew and vex the root in the branches, which, no doubt, in the end will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of law.

Now for the law of England, I see it excepted to, though ignorantly, in two points.

The one, that it should make no difference between an insidious and foul murder, and the killing of a man upon fair terms, as they now call it.

The other, that the law hath not provided sufficient punishment, and reparations, for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like.

But these are no better than childish novelties against the divine law, and against all laws in effect, and against the examples of all the bravest and most virtuous nations of the world.

For first, for the law of God, there is never to be found any difference made in homicide, but between homicide voluntary, and involuntary, which we term misadventure. And for the case of misadventure itself, there were cities of refuge; so that the offender was put to his flight, and that flight was subject to accident, whether the revenger of blood should overtake him before he had gotten sanctuary or no. It is true that our law hath made a more subtle distinction between the will inflamed and the will advised, between manslaughter in heat and murder upon premeditated malice or cold blood, as the soldiers call it; an indulgence not unfit for a choleric and warlike nation; for it is true, ira furor brevis, a man in fury is not himself. This privilege of passion the ancient Roman law restrained, but to a case: that was, if the husband took the adulterer in the manner. To that rage and provocation only it gave way, that an homicide was justifiable. But for a difference to be made in case of killing and destroying man, upon a fore-thought purpose, between foul and fair, and as it were between single murder and vied murder, it is but a monstrous child of this latter age, and there is no shadow of it in any law divine or human. Only it is true, I find in the scripture that Cain inticed his brother into the field and slew him treacherously; but Lamech vaunted of his manhood, that he would kill a young man, and if it were to his hurt: so as I see no difference between an insidious murder and a braving or presumptuous murder, but the difference between Cain and Lamech.

As for examples in civil states, all memory doth consent, that Græcia and Rome were the most valiant and generous nations of the world; and, that which is more to be noted, they were free estates, and not under a monarchy; whereby a man would think it a great deal the more reason that particular persons should have righted themselves. And yet they had not this practice of duels, nor any thing that bare shew thereof: and sure they would have had it, if there had been any virtue in it. Nay, as he saith, fas est ab hoste doceri. It is memorable, that is reported by a counsellor ambassador of the emperor's, touching the censure of the Turks of these duels. There was a combat of this kind performed by two persons of quality of the Turks, wherein one of them was slain, the other party was convented before the council of bashaws. The manner of the reprehension was in these words. 'How durst you undertake to fight one with the other? Are there not Christians enough to kill? Did you not know that whether of you shall be slain, the loss would be the great seignior's?' So as we may see that the most warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have ever despised this wherein now men glory.

It is true, my lords, that I find combats of two natures authorized, how justly I will not dispute as to the latter of them.

The one, when upon the approaches of armies in the face one of the other, particular persons have made challenges for trial of valours in the field upon the publick quarrel.

This the Romans called pugna per provocationem. And this was never, but either between the generals themselves, who were absolute, or between particulars by licence of the generals; never upon private authority. So you see David asked leave when he fought with Goliath; and Joab, when the armies were met, gave leave, and said, 'let the young men play before us.' And of this kind was that famous example in the wars of Naples, between twelve Spaniards and twelve Italians, where the Italians bare away the victory; besides other infinite like examples worthy and laudable, sometimes by singles, sometimes by numbers.

The second combat is a judicial trial of right, where the right is obscure, introduced by the Goths and the northern nations, but more anciently entertained in Spain. And this yet remains in some cases as a divine lot of battle, though controverted by divines, touching the lawfulness of it: so that a wise writer saith, taliter pugnantes videntur tentare Deum, quia hoc volunt ut Deus ostendat et faciat miraculum, ut iustam causam habens victor efficiatur, quod saepe contra accidit. But howsoever it be, this kind of fight taketh its warrant from law. Nay, the French themselves, whence this folly seemeth chiefly to have flown, never had it but only in practice and toleration, and never as authorised by law; and yet now of late they have been fain to purge their folly with extreme rigour, in so much as many gentlemen left between death and life in the duels, as I spake before, were hastened to hanging with their wounds bleeding. For the state found it had been neglected so long, as nothing could be thought cruelty, which tended to the putting of it down.

As for the second defect pretended in our law, that it hath provided no remedy for lyes and fillips, it may receive like answer. It would have been thought a madness amongst the ancient lawgivers, to have set a punishment upon the lye given, which in effect is but a word of denial, a negative of another's saying. Any lawgiver, if he had been asked the question, would have made Solon's answer: that he had not ordained any punishment for it, because he never imagined the world would have been so fantastical as to take it so highly. The civilians, they dispute whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather resolve the contrary. And Francis the first of France, who first set on and stamped this disgrace so deep, is taxed by the judgment of all wise writers for beginning the vanity of it; for it was he, that when he had himself given the lye and defy to the emperor, to make it current in the world, said in a solemn assembly, 'that he was no honest man that would bear the lye:' which was the fountain of this new learning.

As for words of reproach and contumely, whereof the lye was esteemed none, it is not credible, but that the orations themselves are extant, what extreme and exquisite reproaches were tossed up and down in the senate of Rome and the places of assembly, and the like in Greece, and yet no man took himself fouled by them, but took them but for breath; and the stile of an enemy, and either despised them or returned them, but no blood spilt about them.

So of every touch or light blow of the person, they are not in themselves considerable, save that they have got upon them the stamp of a disgrace, which maketh these light things pass for great matter. The law of England, and all laws, hold these degrees of injury to the person, slander, battery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordinary circumstances of despite and contumely, as in case of libels, and bastinadoes, and the like, this court taketh them in hand and punisheth them exemplarily. But for this apprehension of a disgrace, that a fillip to the person should be a mortal wound to the reputation, it were good that men did hearken unto the saying of Gonsalvo, the great and famous commander, that was wont to say, a gentleman's honour should be de tela crassiore, of a good strong warp or web, that every little thing should not catch in it; when as now it seems they are but of cobweb-lawn or such light stuff, which certainly is weakness, and not true greatness of mind, but like a sick man's body, that is so tender that it feels every thing. And so much in maintenance and demonstration of the wisdom and justice of the law of the land.

For the capacity of this court, I take this to be a ground infallible: that wheresoever an offence is capital, or matter of felony, though it be not acted, there the combination or practice tending to that offence is punishable in this court as a high misdemeanor. So practice to poison, though it took no effect; waylaying to murder, though it took no effect; and the like; have been adjudged hainous misdemeanors punishable in this court. Nay, inceptions and preparations in inferior crimes, that are not capital, as suborning and preparing of witnesses that were never deposed, or deposed nothing material, have likewise been censured in this court, as appeareth by the decree in Garnon's case.

Why then, the major proposition being such, the minor cannot be denied: for every appointment of the field is but combination and plotting of murder. Let them gild it how they list, they shall never have fairer terms of me in place of justice. Then the conclusion followeth, that it is a case fit for the censure of the court. And of this there be precedents in the very point of challenge.

It was the case of Wharton, plaintiff against Ellekar and Acklam defendants, where Acklam, being a follower of Ellekar's, was censured for carrying a challenge from Ellekar to Wharton, though the challenge was not put in writing, but delivered only by word of message; and there are words in the decree, that such challenges are to the subversion of government.

These things are well known, and therefore I needed not so much to have insisted upon them, but that in this case I would be thought not to innovate any thing of my own head, but to follow the former precedents of the court, though I mean to do it more thoroughly, because the time requires it more.

Therefore now to come to that which concerneth my part; I say, that by the favour of the king and the court, I will prosecute in this court in the cases following.

If any man shall appoint the field, though the fight be not acted or performed.

If any man shall send any challenge in writing, or any message of challenge.

If any man carry or deliver any writing or message of challenge.

If any man shall accept or return a challenge.

If any man shall accept to be a second in a challenge of either side.

If any man shall depart the realm, with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the seas.

If any man shall revive a quarrel by any scandalous bruits or writings, contrary to a former proclamation published by his majesty in that behalf.

Nay, I hear there be some counsel learned of duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwise, and thereby incense and incite them to the duel, and make an art of it. I hope I shall meet with some of them too: and I am sure, my lords, this course of preventing duels in nipping them in the bud, is fuller of clemency and providence, than the suffering them to go on, and hanging men with their wounds bleeding, as they did in France.

To conclude, I have some petitions to make first to your lordship, my lord chancellor, that in case I be advertised of a purpose in any to go beyond the sea to fight, I may have granted his majesty's writ of ne exeat regnum to stop him, for this giant bestrideth the sea, and I would take and snare him by the foot on this side; for the combination and plotting is on this side, though it should be acted beyond sea. And your lordship said notably the last time I made a motion in this business, that a man may be as well sur de se, as fels de se, if he steal out of the realm for a bad purpose. As for the satisfying of the words of the writ, no man will doubt but he doth machinari contra coronam, as the words of the writ be, that seeketh to murder a subject; for that is ever contra coronam et dignitatem. I have also a suit to your lordships all in general, that for justice sake, and for true honour's sake, honour of religion, law, and the king our master, against this fond and false disguise or puppetry of honour, I may in my prosecution, which, it is like enough, may sometimes stir coals, which I esteem not for my particular, but as it may hinder the good service, I may, I say, be countenanced and assisted from your lordships. Lastly, I have a petition to the nobles and gentlemen of England, that they would learn to esteem themselves at a just price. Non hos quaesitum munus in usus, their blood is not to be spilt like water or a vile thing; therefore that they would rest persuaded there cannot be a form of honour, except it be upon a worthy matter. But for this, ipsi viderunt, I am resolved. And thus much for the general, now to the present case.

Decree of the Star-Chamber against Duels.

George lord archbishop of Canterbury.

Thomas lord Ellesmere, lord chancellor of England.

Henry earl of Northampton, lord privy seal.

Charles earl of Nottingham, lord high admiral of England.

Thomas earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain.

John lord bishop of London.

Edward lord Zouch.

William lord Knolles, treasurer of the household.

Edward lord Wotton, comptroller.

John lord Stanhope, vice-chamberlain.

Sir Edward Coke, knight, lord chief justice of England.

Sir Henry Hobart, knight, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas.

Sir Julius Caesar, knight, chancellor of the Exchequer.

THIS day was heard and debated at large the several matters of informations here exhibited by sir Francis Bacon, knight, his majesty's attorney-general: the one against William Priest, gentleman, for writing and sending a letter of challenge, together with a stick, which should be the length of the weapon: and the other against Richard Wright, esquire, for carrying and delivering the said letter and stick unto the party challenged, and for other contemptuous and insolent behaviour used before the justices of the peace in Surry at their sessions, before whom he was convicted. Upon the opening of which cause, his highness's said attorney-general did first give his reason to the court, why, in a case which he intended should be a leading case for the repressing of so great a mischief in the common-wealth, and concerning an offence which reigneth chiefly amongst persons of honour and quality, he should begin with a cause which had passed between so mean persons as the defendants seemed to be; which he said was done, because he found this cause ready published, and in so growing an evil, he thought good to lose no time; whereunto he added, that it was not amiss sometimes to beat the dog before the lion; saying farther, that he thought it would be some motive for persons of high birth and countenance to leave it, when they saw it was taken up by base and mechanical fellows; but concluded, that he resolved to proceed without respect of persons for the time to come, and for the present to supply the meanness of this particular case by insisting the longer upon the general point.

Wherein he did first express unto the court at large the greatness and dangerous consequence of this presumptuous offence, which extorted revenge out of the magistrate's hands, and gave boldness to private men to be lawgivers to themselves; the rather, because it is an offence that doth justify itself against the law, and plainly gives the law an affront; describing scribing also the miserable effect which it draweth upon private families, by cutting off young men, otherwise of good hope; and chiefly the loss of the king and the commonwealth, by the casting away of much good blood, which, being spent in the field upon occasion of service, were able to continue the renown which this kingdom hath obtained in all ages, of being esteemed victorious.

Secondly, his majesty's said attorney-general did discourse touching the causes and remedies of this mischief that prevailed so in these times; shewing the ground thereof to be a false and erroneous imagination of honour and credit, according to the term which was given to those duels by a former proclamation of his majesty's, which called them bewitching duels, for that it was no better than a kind of sorcery, which enchanteth the spirits of young men, which bear great minds, with a shew of honour in that which is no honour indeed; being against religion, law, moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times, and valiantest nations of the world; which though they excelled for prowess and military virtue in a public quarrel, yet know not what these private duels meant; saying farther, that there was too much way and countenance given unto these duels, by the course that is held by noblemen and gentlemen in compounding of quarrels, who use to stand too punctually upon conceits of satisfactions and distinctions, what is before-hand, and what behind-hand, which do but feed the humour: adding likewise, that it was no fortitude to shew valour in a quarrel, except there were a just and worthy ground of the quarrel; but that it was weakness to set a man's life at so mean a rate as to bestow it upon trifling occasions, which ought to be rather offered up and sacrificed to honourable services, public merits, good causes, and noble adventures. And as concerning the remedies, he concluded, that the only way was, that the state would declare a constant and settled resolution to master and put down this presumption in private men, of whatsoever degree, of righting their own wrongs, and this to do at once; for that then every particular man would think himself acquitted in his reputation, when that he shall see that the state takes his honour into their own hands, and standeth between him and any interest or prejudice, which he might receive in his reputation for obeying. Whereunto he added likewise, that the wisest and mildest way to suppress these duels, was rather to punish in this court all the acts of preparation, which did in any wise tend to the duels, as this of challenges and the like, and so to prevent the capital punishment, and to vex the root in the branches, than to suffer them to run on to the execution, and then to punish them capitally after the manner of France; where of late times gentlemen of great quality that had killed others in duel, were carried to the gibbet with their wounds bleeding, lest a natural death should keep them from the example of justice.

Thirdly, his majesty's said attorney-general did, by many reasons which he brought and alledged, free the law of England from certain vain and childish exceptions, which are taken by these duellists. The one, because the law makes no difference in punishment between an insidious and foul murder, and the killing a man upon challenge and fair terms, as they call it. The other, for that the law hath not provided sufficient punishment and reparation for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like. Wherein his majesty's said attorney-general did shew, by many weighty arguments and examples, that the law of England did consent with the law of God and the law of nations in both those points, and that this distinction in murder between foul and fair, and this grounding of mortal quarrels upon uncivil and reproachful words, or the like disgraces, was never authorised by any law or ancient examples; but it is a late vanity crept in from the practice of the French, who themselves since have been so weary of it, as they have been forced to put it down with all severity.

Fourthly, his majesty's said attorney-general did prove unto the court by rules of law and precedents, that this court hath capacity to punish sending and accepting of challenges, though they were never acted nor executed; taking for a ground infallible, that wheresoever an offence is capital or matter of felony, if it be acted and performed, there the conspiracy, combination, or practice tending to the same offence, is punishable as a high misdemeanor, although they never were performed. And therefore, that practice to impose, though it took no effect, and the like, have been punished in this court; and cited the precedent in Garnon's case, wherein a crime of a much inferior nature, the suborning and preparing of witnesses, though they never were deposed, or deposed nothing material, was censured in this court. Whereupon he concluded, that for as much as every appointment of the field is in law but a combination of plotting of a murder, howsoever men might gild it; that therefore it was a case fit for the censure of this court: and therein he vouched a precedent in the very point, that in a case between Wharton plaintiff, and Ellekar and Acklam defendants. Acklam being a follower of Ellekar, had carried a challenge unto Wharton; and although it were by word of mouth, and not by writing, yet it was severely censured by the court; the decree having words, that such challenges do tend to the subversion of government. And therefore his majesty's attorney-willed the standers-by to take notice that it was no innovation that he brought in, but a proceeding according to former precedents of the court, although he purposed to follow it more thoroughly than had been done ever heretofore, because the times did more and more require it. Lastly, his majesty's said attorney-general did declare and publish to the court in several articles, his purpose and resolution in what cases he did intend to prosecute offences of that nature in this court; that is to say, that if any man shall appoint the field, although the fight be not acted or performed; if any man shall send any challenge in writing or message of challenge; if any man shall carry or deliver any writing or message of challenge; if any man shall accept or return a challenge; if any man shall accept to be a second in a challenge of either part; if any man shall depart the realm with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the seas; if any man shall revive a quarrel by any scandalous bruits or writings contrary to a former proclamation, published by his majesty in that behalf; that in all these cases his majesty's attorney-general, in discharge of his duty, by the favour and assistance of his majesty and the court, would bring the offenders, of what state or degree soever, to the justice of this court, leaving the lords commissioners martial to the more exact remedies: adding farther, that he heard there were certain counsel learned of duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwise, and did incense and incite them to the duel, and made an art of it; who likewise should not be forgotten. And so concluded with two petitions, the one in particular to the lord chancellor, that in case advertisement were given of a purpose in any to go beyond the seas to fight, there might be granted his majesty's writ of ne exeat regnum against him; and the other to the lords in general, that he might be assisted and countenanced in this service.

After which opening and declaration of the general cause, his majesty's said attorney did proceed to set forth the proofs of this particular challenge and offence now in hand, and brought to the judgment and censure of this honourable court; whereupon it appeared to this honourable court by the confession of the said defendant Priest himself, that he, having received some wrong and disgrace at the hands of one Hutchest, did thereupon, in revenge thereof, write a letter to the said Hutchest, containing a challenge to fight with him at single rapier; which letter the said Priest did deliver to the said defendant Wright, together with a stick containing the length of the rapier, wherewith the said Priest meant to perform the fight. Whereupon the said Wright did deliver the said letter to the said Hutchest, and did read the same unto him; and after the reading thereof, did also deliver to the said Hutchest the said stick, saying, that the same was the length of the weapon mentioned in the said letter. But the said Hutchest, dutifully respecting the preservation of his majesty's peace, did refuse the said challenge, whereby no farther mischief did ensue thereupon.

This honourable court, and all the honourable presence this day sitting, upon grave and mature deliberation, pondering the quality of these offences, they generally approved the speech and observations of his majesty's said attorney-general, and highly commended his great care and good service in bringing a cause of this nature to public punishment and example, and in professing a constant purpose to go on in the like course with others: letting him know, that he might expect from the court all concurrence and assistance in so good a work. And thereupon the court did by their several opinions and sentences declare, how much it imported the peace and prosperous estate of his majesty and his kingdom to nip this practice and offence of duels in the head, which now did overspread and grow universal, even among mean persons, and was not only entertained in practice and custom, but was framed into a kind of art and precepts: so that, according to the saying of the scripture, mischief is imagined like a law. And the court with one consent did declare their opinions: that by the ancient law of the land, all inceptions, preparations, and combinations to execute unlawful acts, though they never be performed, as they be not to be punished capitally, except it be in case of treason, and some other particular cases of statute law, so yet they are punishable as misdemeanors and contempts: and that this court was proper for offences of such nature; especially in this case, where the bravery and insolency of the times are such as the ordinary magistrates and justices, that are trusted with the preservation of the peace, are not able to master and repress those offences, which were by the court at large set forth, to be not only against the law of God, to whom, and his substitutes, all revenge belongeth, as part of his prerogative, but also against the oath and duty of every subject unto his majesty, for that the subject doth swear unto him by the ancient law allegiance of life and member; whereby it is plainly inferred, that the subject hath no disposing power over himself of life and member to be spent or ventured according to his own passions and fancies, in so much as the very practice of chivalry in jousts and tournaments, which are but images of martial actions, appear by ancient precedents not to be lawful without the king's licence obtained. The court also noted, that these private duels or combats were of another nature from the combats which have been allowed by the law, as well of this land as of other nations for the trial of rights or appeals. For that those combats receive direction and authority from the law; whereas these contrariwise spring only from the unbridled humours of private men. And as for the pretence of honour, the court much misliking the confusion of degrees which is grown of late, every man assuming unto himself the term and attribute of honour, did utterly reject and condemn the opinion, that the private duel, in any person whatsoever, had any grounds of honour; as well because nothing can be honourable that is not lawful, and that it is no magnanimity or greatness of mind, but a swelling and tumour of the mind, where there faileth a right and sound judgment; as also for that it was rather justly to be esteemed a weakness, and a conscience of small value in a man's self to be dejected so with a word or trifling disgrace, as to think there is no re-cure of it, but by the hazard of life; whereas true honour in persons that know their own worth is not of any such brittle substance, but of a more strong composition. And finally, the court, shewing a firm and settled resolution to proceed with all severity against these duels, gave warning to all young noblemen and gentlemen, that they should not expect the like connivance or toleration as formerly have been, but that justice should have a full passage without protection or interruption. Adding, that after a strait inhibition, whosoever should attempt a challenge or combat, in case where the other party was restrained to answer him, as now all good subjects are, did by their own principles receive the dishonour and disgrace upon himself.

And for the present cause, the court hath ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said William Priest and Richard Wright be committed to the prison of the Fleet, and the said Priest to pay five hundred pounds, and the said Wright five hundred marks, for their several fines to his majesty's use. And to the end, that some more public example may be made hereof amongst his majesty's people, the court hath further ordered and decreed, that the said Priest and Wright shall at the next assizes, to be holden in the county of Surry, publicly in face of the court, the judges sitting, acknowledge their high contempt and offence against God, his majesty, and his laws, and shew themselves penitent for the same.

Moreover, the wisdom of this high and honourable court thought it meet and necessary, that all sorts of his majesty's subjects should understand and take notice of that which hath been said and handled this day touching touching this matter, as well by his highness's attorney-general, as by the lords judges, touching the law in such cases. And therefore the court hath enjoined Mr. Attorney to have special care to the penning of this decree, for the setting forth in the same summarily the matters and reasons, which have been opened and delivered by the court touching the same; and nevertheless also at some time convenient to publish the particulars of his speech and declaration, as very meet and worthy to be remembered and made known unto the world, as these times are. And this decree, being in such sort carefully drawn and penned, the whole court thought it meet, and so have ordered and decreed, that the same be not only read and published at the next assizes for Surry, at such time as the said Priest and Wright are to acknowledge their offences as aforesaid; but that the same be likewise published and made known in all shires of this kingdom. And to that end the justices of assize are required by this honourable court to cause this decree to be solemnly read and published in all the places and sittings of their several circuits, and in the greatest assembly; to the end, that all his majesty's subjects may take knowledge and understand the opinion of this honourable court in this case, and in what measure his majesty and this honourable court purposeth to punish such as shall fall into the like contempt and offences hereafter. Lastly, this honourable court much approving that, which the right honourable sir Edward Coke, knight, lord chief justice of England, did now deliver touching the law in this case of duels, hath enjoined his lordship to report the same in print, as he hath formerly done divers other cases, that such as understand not the law in that behalf, and all others, may better direct themselves, and prevent the danger thereof hereafter.

XXI. Case of Mr. WILLIAM TALBOT, Hilary-Term, 11 Jam. I. on an Information ore tenus, for maintaining a Power in the Pope to depose and kill Kings.

[In lord Bacon's works there is a speech by him as attorney-general and prosecutor in this case. 2 Bac. last 4to ed. 577. According to the title of the speech, the cause of the prosecution appears to have been this. Mr. Talbot, who was a counsellor at law of Ireland, being asked, whether the doctrine of Suarez in respect to the deposing and killing of kings excommunicated was true or not, answered, that he submitted his opinion to the judgment of the Roman catholic church. This answer he subscribed, and we presume, that it was given on being examined before the privy-council; though that circumstance is not expressly stated by lord Bacon. What the judgment of the Star-Chamber was, we do not find noticed.]

Speech of sir Francis Bacon attorney-general, the last day of Hilary-Term, 11 Jam. I.

My lords,
I BROUGHT before you the first sitting of this term the cause of duels. But now this last sitting I shall bring before you a cause concerning the greatest duel which is in the Christian world, the duel and conflict between the lawful authority of sovereign kings, which is God's ordinance for the comfort of human society, and the swelling pride and usurpation of the see of Rome in temporalibus, tending altogether to anarchy and confusion. Wherein if this pretence in the pope of Rome, by cartels to make sovereign princes as the banditti, and to proscribe their lives, and to expose their kingdoms to prey; if these pretences, I say, and all persons that submit themselves to that part of the pope's power in the least degree, be not by all possible severity repressed and punished, the state of Christian kings will be no other than the ancient torment described by the poets in the hell of the heathen; a man sitting richly robed, solemnly attended, delicious fare, &c. with a sword hanging over his head, hanging by a small thread, ready every moment to be cut down by an accursing and accursed hand. Surely I had thought they had been the prerogatives of God alone, and of his secret judgments: solvam cingula regum, I will loosen the girdles of kings; or again, he poureth contempt upon princes; or, I will give a king in my wrath, and take him away again in my displeasure; and the like. But if these be the claims of a mortal man, certainly they are but the mysteries of that person, which exalts himself above all that is called God, supra omne quod dicitur Deus. Note it well, not above God, though that in a sense be true, but above all that is called God; that is, lawful kings and magistrates.

But, my lords, in this duel I find this Talbot, that is now before you, but a coward; for he hath given ground, he hath gone backward and forward; but in such a fashion, and with such interchange of repenting and relapsing, as I cannot tell whether it doth extenuate or aggravate his offence. If he shall more publicly in the face of the court fall and settle upon a right mind, I shall be glad of it; and he that would be against the king's mercy, I would he might need the king's mercy: but nevertheless the court will proceed by rules of justice.

The offence, therefore wherewith I charge this Talbot, prisoner at the bar, is this in brief and in effect: that he hath maintained and maintaineth under his hand, a power in the pope for the deposing and murdering of kings. In what sort he doth this, when I come to the proper and particular charge, I will deliver it in his own words without pressing or straining.

But before I come to the particular charge of this man, I cannot proceed so coldly; but I must express unto your lordships the extreme and imminent danger wherein our dear and dread sovereign is, and in him we all, nay, all princes of both religions, for it is a common cause, do stand at this day, by the spreading and enforcing of this furious and pernicious opinion of the pope's temporal power: which though the modest sort would blanch with the distinction of in ordine ad spiritualia, yet that is but an illusion; for he, that maketh the distinction, will also make the case. This peril, though it be in itself notorious, yet because there is a kind of dullness, and almost a lethargy in this age, give me leave to set before you two glasses, such as certainly the like never met in one age; the glass of France, and the glass of England. In that of France the tragedies acted and executed in two immediate kings; in the glass of England, the same, or more horrible, attempted likewise in a queen and king immediate, but ending in a happy deliverance.

In France, Henry III. in the face of his army, before the walls of Paris, stabbed by a wretched Jacobine frier. Henry IV. a prince that the French do surname the Great, one that had been a saviour and redeemer of his country from infinite calamities, and a restorer of that monarchy to the ancient state and splendor, and a prince almost heroical, except it be in the point of revolt from religion, at a time when he was as it were to mount on horseback for the commanding of the greatest forces that of long time had been levied in France, this king likewise stillettoed by a rascal votary, which had been enchanted and conjured for the purpose.

In England, queen Elizabeth, of blessed memory, a queen comparable and to be ranked with the greatest kings, oftentimes attempted by like votaries, Sommerville, Parry, Savage, and others, but still protected by the watchman that slumbereth not. Again, our excellent sovereign king James, the sweetness and clemency of whose nature were enough to quench and mortify all malignity, and a king shielded and supported by posterity; yet this king in the chair of majesty, his vine and olive branches about him, attended by his nobles and third estate in parliament; ready in the twinkling of an eye, as if it had been a particular doomsday, to have been brought to ashes, dispersed to the four winds. I noted the last day my lord chief justice, when he spoke of this powder treason, he laboured for words; though they came from him with great efficacy, yet he truly confessed, and so must all men, that that treason is above the charge and report of any words whatsoever.

Now, my lords, I cannot let pass, but in these glasses which I speak of, besides the facts themselves and danger, to shew you two things: the one, the ways of God Almighty, which turneth the sword of Rome upon the kings that are the vassals of Rome, and over them gives it power; but protecteth those kings, which have not accepted the yoke of his tyranny, from the effects of his malice: the other, that, as I said at first, this is a common cause of princes; it involveth kings of both religions; and therefore his majesty did most worthily and prudently ring out the alarm-bell, to awake all other princes to think of it seriously, and in time. But this is a miserable case the while, that these Roman soldiers do either thrust the spear into the sides of God's anointed, or at least they crown them with thorns; that is, piercing and pricking cares and fears, that they can never be quiet or secure of their lives or states. And as this peril is common to princes of both religions, so princes of both religions have been likewise equally sensible of every injury that touched their temporals.

Thuanus reports in his story, that when the realm of France was interdicted by the violent proceedings of pope Julius the second, the king, otherwise noted for a moderate prince, caused coins of gold to be stamped with his own image, and this superscription, perdam nomen Babylonis à terra. Of which Thuanus saith, himself had seen divers pieces thereof. So as this catholic king was so much incensed at that time, in respect of the pope's usurpation, as he did apply Babylon to Rome. Charles the fifth, emperor, who was accounted one of the pope's best sons, yet proceeded in matter temporal towards pope Clement with strange rigour; never regarding the pontificality, but kept him prisoner thirteen months in a pestilent prison; and was hardly dissuaded by his council from having sent him captive into Spain; and made sport with the threats of Frosberg the German, who wore a silk rope under his cassock, which he would shew in all companies; telling them that he carried it to strangle the pope with his own hands. As for Philip the Fair, it is the ordinary example, how he brought pope Boniface the eighth to an ignominious end, dying mad and enraged; and how how he filed his rescript to the pope's bull, whereby he challenged his temporals, fiat satuitas vestra, not your beatitude, but your stultitude; a stile worthy to be continued in the like cases; for certainly that claim is mere folly and fury. As for native examples here, it is too long a field to enter into them. Never kings of any nation kept the partition-wall between temporal and spiritual better in times of greatest superstition. I report me to king Edward I. that set up so many crosses, and yet crossed that part of the pope's jurisdiction, no man more strongly. But these things have passed better pens and speeches: here I end them.

But now to come to the particular charge of this man, I must inform your lordships the occasion and nature of this offence. There hath been published lately to the world a work of Suarez a Portuguese, a professor in the university of Coimbra, a confident and daring writer, such an one as Tully describes in derision; nihil tam verens, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videretur: one that fears nothing but this, lest he should seem to doubt of any thing. A fellow that thinks with his magistrality and goose-quill to give laws and menages to crowns and sceptres. In this man's writing, this doctrine of deposing or murdering kings seems to come to a higher elevation than heretofore; and it is more arted and posited than in others. For in the passages which your lordships shall hear read anon, I find three assertions which run not in the vulgar track, but are such as wherewith mens ears, as I suppose, are not much acquainted. Whereof the first is, that the pope hath a superiority over kings, as subjects, to depose them; not only for spiritual crimes, as heresy and schism, but for faults of a temporal nature; forasmuch as a tyrannical government tendeth ever to the destruction of souls. So by this position, kings of either religion are alike comprehended, and none exempted. The second, that after a sentence given by the pope, this writer hath defined of a series, or succession, or substitution of hangmen, or bourreaux, to be sure, lest an executioner should fail. For he saith, that when a king is sentenced by the pope to deprivation or death, the executioner who is first in place is he to whom the pope shall commit the authority, which may be a foreign prince, it may be a particular subject, it may be general, to the first undertaker. But if there be no direction or assignation in the sentence special nor general, then, de jure, it appertains to the next successor, a natural and pious opinion; for commonly they are sons, or brothers, or near of kin, all is one, so as the successor be apparent; and also that he be a catholic. But if he be doubtful, or that he be no catholic, then it devolves to the commonalty of the kingdom; so as he will be sure to have it done by one minister or other. The third is, he distinguisheth of two kinds of tyrants, a tyrant in title, and a tyrant in regiment; the tyrant in regiment cannot be resisted or killed without a sentence precedent by the pope; but a tyrant in title may be killed by any private man whatsoever. By which doctrine he hath put the judgment of kings titles, which I will undertake are never so clean but that some vain quarrel or exception may be made unto them, upon the fancy of every private man; and also couples the judgment and execution together, that he may judge him by a blow, without any other sentence.

Your lordships see what monstrous opinions these are, and how both these beasts, the beast with seven heads, and the beast with many heads, pope and people, are at once let in, and set upon the sacred persons of kings.

Now to go on with the narrative. There was an extract made of certain sentences and portions of this book, being of this nature that I have set forth, by a great prelate and counsellor, upon a just occasion; and there being some hollowness and hesitation in these matters, wherein it is a thing impious to doubt, discovered and perceived in Talbot, he was asked his opinion concerning these assertions, in the presence of the best: and afterwards they were delivered to him, that upon advice and sedato animo, he might declare himself. Whereupon, under his hand, he subscribes thus;

May it please your honourable good lordships: concerning this doctrine of Suarez, I do perceive, by what I have read in this book, that the same doth concern matter of faith, the controversy growing upon exposition of scriptures and councils, wherein, being ignorant and not studied, I cannot take upon me to judge; but I do submit my opinion therein to the judgment of the catholic Roman church, as in all other points concerning faith I do. And for matter concerning my loyalty, I do acknowledge my sovereign liege lord king James, to be lawful and undoubted king of all the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and I will bear true faith and allegiance to his highness during my life.

William Talbot.

My lords, upon these words I conceive Talbot hath committed a great offence, and such a one, as if he had entered into a voluntary and malicious publication of the like writing, it would have been too great an offence for the capacity of this court. But because it grew by a question asked by a council of estate, and so rather seemeth, in a favourable construction, to proceed from a kind of submission to answer, than from any malicious or insolent will; it was fit, according to the clemency of these times, to proceed in this manner before your lordships. And yet let the hearers take these things right; for certainly, if a man be required by the council to deliver his opinion whether king James be king or no; and he deliver his opinion that he is not, this is high treason. But I do not say that these words amount to that; and therefore let me open them truly to your lordships, and therein open also the understanding of the offender himself, how far they reach.

My lords, a man's allegiance must be independent and certain, and not dependent and conditional. Elizabeth Barton, that was called the holy maid of Kent, affirmed, that if king Henry VIII. did not take Catharine of Spain again to his wife within a twelvemonth, he should be no king: and this was treason. For though this act be contingent and future, yet the preparing of the treason is present.

And in like manner, if a man should voluntarily publish or maintain, that whensoever a bull of deprivation shall come forth against the king, that from thenceforth he is no longer king; this is of like nature. But with this I do not charge you neither; but this is the true latitude of your words, that if the doctrine touching the killing of kings be matter of faith, then you submit yourself to the judgment of the catholic Roman church: so as now, to do you right, your allegiance doth not depend simply upon a sentence of the pope's deprivation against the king; but upon another point also, if these of doctrines be already, or shall be declared to be matter of faith. But, my lords, there is little won in this: there may be some difference to the guilt of the party, but there is little to the danger of the king. For the same pope of Rome may, with the same breath, declare both. So as still, upon the matter, the king is made but tenant at will of his life and kingdoms, and the allegiance of his subjects is pinned upon the pope's acts. And certainly it is time to stop the current of this opinion of acknowledgment of the pope's power in temporalibus; or else it will sap and supplant the seat of kings. And let it not be mistaken, that Mr. Talbot's offence should be no more than the refusing the oath of allegiance. For it is one thing to be silent, and another thing to affirm. As for the point of matter of faith, or not of faith, to tell your lordships plain, it would astonish a man to see the gulf of this implied belief. Is nothing excepted from it? If a man should ask Mr. Talbot whether he do condemn murder, or adultery, or rape, or the doctrine of Mahomet, or of Arius, instead of Suarez; must the answer be with this exception, that if the question concern matter of faith, as no question it doth, for the moral law is matter of faith, that therein he will submit himself to what the church shall determine? And, no doubt, the murder of princes is more than simple murder. But to conclude, Talbot, I will do you this right, and I will not be reserved in this, but to declare that that is true; that you came afterwards to a better mind; wherein, if you had been constant, the king, out of his great goodness, was resolved not to have proceeded with you in course of justice: but then again you started aside like a broken bow. So that by your variety and vacillation you lost the acceptable time of the first grace, which was not to have converted you.

Nay, I will go farther with you. Your last submission I conceive to be satisfactory and complete. But then it was too late; the king's honour was upon it; it was published and a day appointed for hearing. Yet what preparation that may be to the second grace of pardon, that I know not: but I know my lords, out of their accustomed favour, will admit you not only to your defence concerning that that hath been charged; but to extenuate your fault by any submission that now God shall put into your mind to make.

XXII. Proceedings against Mr. RICHARD CHAMBERS, in the Star-Chamber, for seditious Speeches before the Privy-Council, 5 Cha. I. 1629.

AT the same time [1629] Sir Robert Heath, the king's attorney-general, preferred an information in the Star-Chamber against Richard Chambers of the city of London, merchant. Wherein, first, he did set forth the gracious government of the king, and the great privileges which the merchants have in their trading, by paying moderate duties for the goods and merchandizes exported and imported; and setting forth, that the raising and publishing of undutiful and false speeches, which may tend to the dishonour of the king or the state, or to the discouragement or discontentment of the subject, or to set discord or variance between his majesty and his good people, are offences of dangerous consequence, and by the law prohibited, and condemned under several penalties and punishments. That nevertheless the said Richard Chambers, the 28th day of September last, being, amongst other merchants, called to the council-board at Hampton-Court, about some things which were complained of in reference to the customs, did then and there, in an insolent manner, in the presence or hearing of the lords and other of his majesties privy-council, then sitting in council, utter these undutiful, seditious, and false words, that the merchants are in no part of the world so screwed and wrung as in England; that in Turkey they have more encouragement. By which words, he the said Richard Chambers, as the information setteth forth, did endeavour to alienate the good affection of his majesties subjects from his majesty, and to bring a slander upon his just government: and therefore the king's attorney prayed process against him.

To this Mr. Chambers made answer, that having a case of silk grograms brought from Bristol by a carrier to London, of the value of 400 l. the same were, by some inferior officers, attending on the Custom-House, seized without this defendants consent, notwithstanding he offered to give security to pay such customs as should be due by law; and that he hath been otherwise grieved and damnified, by the injurious dealing of the under-officers of the Custom-House; and mentioned the particulars wherein: and that being called before the lords of the council, he confesseth, that out of the great sense which he had of the injuries done him by the said inferior officers, he did utter these words, that the merchants in England were more wrung and screwed than in foreign parts. Which words were only spoken in the presence of the privy-council, and not spoken abroad, to stir up any discord among the people; and not spoken with any disloyal thought at that time of his majesty's government, but only intending by these words to introduce his just complaint against the wrongs and injuries he had sustained by the inferior officers; and that as soon as he had heard a hard construction was given of his words, he endeavoured by petition to the lords of the council, humbly to explain his meaning, that he had not the least evil thought as to his majesties government; yet was not permitted to be heard, but presently sent away prisoner to the Marshalsea: and when he was there a prisoner, he did again endeavour by petition to give satisfaction to the lords of the council; but they would not be pleased to accept of his faithful explanation, which he now makes unto this honourable court upon his oath; and doth profess from the bottom of his heart, that his speech only aimed at the abuses of the inferior officers, who in many things dealt most cruelly with him and other merchants.

There were two of the clerks of the privy-council examined as witnesses to prove the words, notwithstanding the defendant confessed the words in his answer as aforesaid, who proved the words as laid in the information. And on the sixth of May, 1629, the cause came to be heard in the Star-Chamber, and the court were of opinion, that the words spoken were a comparing of his majesty's government with the government of the Turks; intending thereby to make the people believe, that his majesty's happy government may be termed Turkish tyranny; and therefore the court fined the said Mr. Chambers in the sum of 2000 l. to his majesty's use, and to stand committed to the prison of the Fleet, and to make submission for his great offence, both at the council-board, in court of Star-Chamber, and at the Royal Exchange.

There was a great difference of opinion in the court about the fine: and because it is a remarkable case, here followeth the names of each several person who gave sentence, and the fine they concluded upon, viz.

Sir Francis Cottington, chancellor of the Exchequer, his opinion was for 500 l. fine to the king, and to acknowledge his offence at the council-board, the Star-Chamber Bar, and the Exchange.

Sir Thomas Richardson, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, 500 l. fine to the king, and to desire the king's favour.

Sir Nicholas Hyde, lord chief justice of the King's Bench, 500 l. and to desire the king's favour.

Sir John Cook, secretary of state, 1000 l.

Sir Humphrey May, chancellor, 1500 l.

Sir Thomas Edmonds, 2000 l.

Sir Edward Barret, 2000 l.

Doctor Neal, bishop of Winchester, 3000 l.

Doctor Laud, bishop of London, 3000 l.

Lord , chancellor of Scotland, 3000 l.

Earl of Holland, 1500 l.

Earl of Doncaster, 1500 l.

Earl of Salisbury, 1500 l.

Earl of Dorset, 3000 l.

Earl of Suffolk,	3000 l.
Earl of Montgomery, lord chamberlain,	1500 l.
Earl of Arundel, lord high marshal,	3000 l.

So the fine was settled to 2000 l.

And all (except the two chief justices) concurred for a submission also to be made. And accordingly the copy of the submission was sent to the warden of the Fleet, from Mr. Attorney-General, to shew the said Richard Chambers, to perform and acknowledge it; and was as followeth:

"I Richard Chambers, of London, merchant, do humbly acknowledge, that whereas upon an information exhibited against me by the king's attorney-general, I was in Easter-Term last sentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, for that in September last, 1628. being convented before the lords and others of his majesty's most honourable privy-council-board, upon some speeches then used concerning the merchants of this kingdom, and his majesty's well and gracious usage of them; did then, and there, in insolent, contemptuous, and seditious manner, falsely and maliciously say and affirm, that they, meaning the merchants, are in no parts of the world so screwed and wrung as in England; and that in Turkey they have more encouragement. And whereas by the sentence of that honourable court, I was adjudged, among other punishments justly imposed upon me, to make my humble acknowledgment and submission of this great offence at this honourable board, before I should be delivered out of the prison of the Fleet, whereto I was then committed, as by the said decree and sentence of that court, among other things, it doth and may appear: now I the said R. Chambers, in obedience to the sentence of the said honourable court, do humbly confess and acknowledge the speaking of these words aforesaid, for the which I was so charged, and am heartily sorry for the same; and do humbly beseech your lordships all to be honourable intercessors for me to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to pardon this great error and fault so committed by me."

When Mr. Chambers read this draught of submission, he thus subscribed the same:

"All the aforesaid contents and submission, I Richard Chambers do utterly abhor and detest, as most unjust and false; and never till death will acknowledge any part thereof.
Rich. Chambers."

Also he under-writ these texts of scripture to the said submission, before he returned it.

That make a man an offender for a word, and lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate, and turn aside the just for a thing of nought.

Blame not before thou hast examined the truth; understand first, and then rebuke: answer not before thou hast heard the cause, neither interrupt men in the midst of their talk.

Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?

King Agrippa said unto Paul, thou art permitted to speak for thyself.

Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of the poor in his cause, thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the eyes of the righteous.

Wo to them that devise iniquity, because it is in the power of their hand, and they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away: so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage.

Thus saith the Lord God, let it suffice you, O princes of Israel: remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord God.

If thou seekest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than they.

Per me, Richard Chambers.

Afterwards in the term of Trinity, the 5th year of king Charles, it is found in the great roll of this year, that there is demanded there, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2000 l. for a certain fine imposed on him, hither sent by virtue of a writ of our said lord the king, under the foot of the great seal of England, directed to the treasurer and barons of this Exchequer, for making execution thereof to the use of the said lord the king, as is there contained; and now, that is to say, in the Octab of the Blessed Trinity, this term, comes the said Richard Chambers in his own proper person, and demands oyer of the demand aforesaid, and it is read unto him; and he demands oyer also of the writ aforesaid, under the foot of the great seal of England hither sent, and is read unto him in these words:

"CHARLES by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to his treasurer and barons of his Exchequer, health. The extrete of certain fines taxed and adjudged by us and our council, in our said council, in our court of Star-Chamber, in the term of St. Michael, the term of St. Hilary, and the term of Easter last past, upon Thomas Barnes, of the parish of St. Clement Danes in the county of Middlesex, carpenter, and others, severally and dividedly, as they be there severally assessed, we send unto you included in these presents, commanding, that looking into them, you do that which by law you ought to do against them, for the levying of those fines. Witness our self at Westminster, the 21st of May, in the year of our reign the 5th Mutas."

And the tenor of the schedule to the said writ annexed, as to the said Richard Chambers, followeth in these words:

"IN the term of Easter, the fifth year of king Charles, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2000*l.* which being read, heard, and by him understood; he complains, that he is grievously vexed and inquieted by colour of the premises; and that not justly, for that protesting, that the great roll, and the matter therein contained, is not in law sufficient, to which he hath no need, nor is bound by law to answer. Yet for plea the said Richard Chambers saith, that he, of the demand aforesaid, in the great roll aforesaid mentioned, and every parcel thereof, ought to be discharged against the said lord the king, for that he said; that he from the time of the taxation of the aforesaid fine, and long before, was a freeman and a merchant of this kingdom; that is to say, in the parish of the Blessed Mary of the Arches, in the ward of Cheaps, London: and that by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the ninth year of his reign, it was provided by authority of the said parliament, that a freeman shall not be amerced for a little offence, but according to the manner of the said offence; and for a great offence, according to the greatness of the offence, saving to him his contentment or freehold; and a merchant in the same manner, saving unto him his merchandize; and a villain of any other than the king after the same manner to be amerced, saving his wainage; and none of the said amercedments to be imposed but by the oaths of good and lawful men of the neighbourhood: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the first, held in the third year of his reign, it was and is provided, that no city, borough, or town, nor any man, shall be amerced, without reasonable cause, and according to his trespass; that is to say, a freeman, saving to him his contentment; a merchant, saving to him his merchandize; and a villain, saving to him his wainage: and this by their peers: and by the same act in the parliament of the said lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the ninth year of his reign aforesaid, it was and is provided by the authority of the said parliament, that no freeman should be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, or liberties, or free-customs, or out-lawed, or banished, or any way destroyed: and that the lord the king should not go upon him, nor deal with him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land: and by a certain act in parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the third, held in the fifth year of his reign, it was and is provided by the authority of the said parliament, that no man henceforward should be attached by reason of any accusation, nor prejudged of life or member, nor that his lands, tenements, goods or chattels should be seized into the hands of the lord the king against the form of the great charter, and the law of the land: and by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the seventh, held in the third year of his reign, reciting, that by unlawful maintenances given of liveries, signs, and tokens, and retainers by indentures, promises, oaths, writings, and other imbraceries of the subjects of the said lord the king, false demeanors of sheriffs, in making of pannels, and other false returns, by taking of money by jurors, by great riots and unlawful assemblies, the policy and good government of this kingdom was almost subdued; and by not punishing of the said inconveniences, and by occasion of the premises, little or nothing was found by inquisition; by reason thereof, the laws of the land had little effect in their execution, to the increase of murders, robberies, perjuries, and infidelities of all men living, to the loss of their lands, and goods, to the great displeasure of Almighty God; it was ordained for reformation of the premises, by authority of the said parliament, that the chancellor and treasurer of England for the time being, and the keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one bishop, one lord temporal of the most honourable council of the lord the king, and the two chief justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas for the time being, or two other justices in their absence, by bill or information exhibited to the chancellor for the king, or any other, against any person, for any other ill behaviours aforesaid, have authority of calling before them, by writ of privy-seal, such malefactors, and of examining them and others by their discretion, and of punishing such as they find defective therein, according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the statutes thereof made, in the same manner and form as they might and ought to be punished, if they were thereof convinced according to the due course of law: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the eighth, held in the one and twentieth year of his reign, reciting the offences in the fore said statute of the said late king Henry the seventh, before-mentioned, by authority of the said parliament, it was and is ordained and enacted, that henceforward the chancellor, treasurer of England, and the president of the most honourable privy-council of the king, attending his most honourable person for the time being, and the lord keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one bishop, and one temporal lord, of the most honourable council of the lord the king, and two chief justices of the King's Bench,

"and Common Pleas for the time being, or two justices in their absence, by any bill or information then after to be exhibited to the chancellor of England, the treasurer, the president of the most honourable council of the lord the king, or the keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king for the time being, for any misdemeanor in the aforesaid statute of king Henry the seventh aforesaid before recited; from henceforth have full power and authority of calling before them, by writ or by privy-seal, such malefactors, and of examining of them and others by their discretion, and of punishing those that are found defective according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the said statute of the aforesaid lord king Henry the seventh, and of all other statutes thereupon made not revoked and expired, in the same manner and form as they might and ought to be punished, if they were convicted according to the due order of the laws of the said lord the king. And by the aforesaid writ, under the foot of the great seal, it manifestly appears, that the said fine was imposed by the lord the king and his council, and not by the legal peers of the said Richard Chambers, nor by the law of the land, nor according to the manner of the pretended offence of the said Richard Chambers, nor saving unto him his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the said statutes. All and singular the which, the said Richard Chambers is ready to verify to the court, &c. and demands judgment; and that he be discharged of the said 2000*l.* against the said lord, the now king; and that as to the premises he may be dismissed from this court.

Waterhouse."

With this plea, he annexed a petition to the lord chief baron, and also to every one of the barons, humbly desiring the filing of the plea, with other reasons in the manner of a motion at the bar, because he said, counsel would not move, plead, nor set hand to it, as further appeareth.

The copy of the order upon Mr. Attorney's motion in the Exchequer, the 17th of July, 1629. after the plea put in, and order to file it. Per the lord chief baron.

"TOUCHING the plea put into this court by Richard Chambers, to discharge himself of a fine of 2000*l.* set on him in the Star-Chamber, forasmuch as sir Robert Heath, knight, his majesties attorney-general, informed this court, that the said Chambers in his said plea recites divers statutes, and Magna Charta, and what offences are punishable in the Star-Chamber, and how the proceedings ought to be; and upon the whole matter concludes, that the said fine was imposed by the king and his council, and not by a legal judgment of his peers, nor by the laws of the land, nor according to the manner of his offence, nor saving his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the said statutes; which plea, Mr. Attorney conceiving it to be very frivolous and insufficient, and derogatory to the honour and jurisdiction of the court of Star-Chamber, humbly prayeth might not be allowed of, nor filed: it is therefore this day ordered, that the said plea shall be read on Saturday next; and then upon hearing the king's council, and the council of the said Richard Chambers, this court will declare their further order therein; and in the mean time the said plea is not to be filed nor delivered out."

In Michaelmas Term following, Mr. Chambers was brought by a Habeas Corpus out of the Fleet; and the warden did return,

"THAT he was committed to the Fleet by virtue of a decree in the Star-Chamber, by reason of certain words he used at the council-table, (viz.) that the merchants of England were screwed up here in England more than in Turkey. And for these and other words of defamation of the government, he was censured to be committed to the Fleet, and to be there imprisoned until he had made his submission at the council-table, and to pay a fine of 2000*l.* And now at the bar he prayeth to be delivered, because this sentence is not warranted by any law or statute: for the statute of 3 Hen. 7. which is the foundation of the court of Star-Chamber, doth not give them any authority to punish for words only. But all the court informed him, that the court of Star-Chamber was not erected by the statute of 3 Hen. 7. but was a court many years before, and one of the most high and honourable courts of justice; and to deliver one who was committed by the decree of one of the courts of justice, was not the usage of this court; and therefore he was remanded."

As a concurrent proof of these proceedings concerning Mr. Chambers, we shall insert here a petition of his (though out of time) to the long parliament.

To the parliament of the common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The brief remonstrance and humble petition of Richard Chambers, merchant, late alderman and sheriff of the city of London:

SHewing,

"THAT in the parliament held in the years 1627 and 1628, it was voted and declared by the honourable house of commons, that whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying of the subsidy of tunnage and poundage, not granted by parliament, or shall be any actor or instrument therein, shall be reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and common-wealth; and if any merchant or person whatsoever shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidy of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, they shall likewise be reputed betrayers of the liberties of England, and enemies to the same, as may appear by the said order upon record.

"In submission and obedience whereunto, the petitioner first opposed "and withstood the payment of tunnage and poundage (until they were settled by parliament) and all other illegal taxes; for which submission and obedience, in the years 1628 and 1629, the petitioner had 7060 pounds of his goods wrongfully taken and detained from him by the late king's officers and farmers of the Custom-House of London, for pretended duties, and a heavy sentence and fine in the Star-Chamber, which was imposed upon him in the year 1629. Besides which losses, the petitioner further suffered in his person by six whole years imprisonment in the Fleet, for not submitting to that sentence and fine; and in the year 1637, nine months imprisonment in Newgate for withstanding ship-money; by which losses and imprisonments, the petitioner was put by the exercise of his calling, and was wounded in his credit and reputation.

"Which sufferings the honourable house of commons (upon the petitioners complaint in the year 1640,) taking into their grave considerations, were pleased to refer the examination thereof to a committee of fifty members, wherein were included the committee for the navy and customs; who being well satisfied of the truth thereof, by oath, and other good sufficient proofs upon record, drew up their report, that the petitioner ought then to have 13680 pounds in part of reparation, leaving the rest of those reparations to the further judgment of the honourable house, as by the annexed copy of that report may further appear.

"In pursuit of which report, the parliament then levied and received from the old farmers and officers of the customs 50000 pounds for wrongs and abuses done to the petitioner (chiefly) and other merchants, intending first to give to the petitioner satisfaction out of the same, because he was the first man that opposed the pretended duties, and the greatest sufferer.

"Whereupon in the year 1642, the petitioner was chosen alderman, and in the year 1644 sheriff of the city of London: which places the petitioner earnestly endeavoured to shun; but such were the earnest importunities, and persuasive encouragements of divers members of the honourable house, (who then desired to have the petitioner in place of trust, for his former service to the commonwealth) that the petitioner was constrained to accept not only of the place of alderman, but further underwent the office and charge of sheriff of London, which stood the petitioner in 4000 pounds that year. But notwithstanding the aforesaid promises and intents of the parliament to give the petitioner satisfaction, such were the great compulsive exigents, and urgent necessities of those times, caused by the publick distractions, that the said monies were converted to the publick use. Therefore the parliament desired the petitioner to have a little patience, promising him speedy satisfaction as well for the forbearance as for the principal debt. But the distractions continuing, the petitioner had neither interest nor any part of his principal. The parliament in the year 1648, in part of satisfaction, settled the petitioner in the office of surveyor and check in the Custom-House of London, then worth at least 600*l.* per annum; but the petitioner having enjoyed that place only eight months, was causelessly ousted

"by sinister information of intruders, who have enjoyed that office and divided the profit thereof between them ever since that intrusion.

"Moreover, the late king, by privy-seal, owes to the petitioner's wife (who is the relict of Mr. Thomas Ferrer) for linnen cloth 500*l.* and for money lent 1200*l.* for which she was assigned satisfaction out of the customs of tobacco. Besides, she was further assigned out of Sir Thomas Dawes office one hundred marks per annum. All which debts likewise lie wholly unsatisfied, to the petitioner's great prejudice.

"Besides the aforesaid losses, hinderances, expences, sufferings, and forbearances of the profit of the said office, the petitioner from time to time hath laid out himself for the common good, in acting, lending, spending, (and serving) when others refused; exposed himself to that eminent danger at Branford, by leading out a troop of horse for the privileges, liberties, and rights of the city of London and commonwealth, inasmuch, that thereby, and for want of his satisfaction aforesaid, the petitioner, having consumed his estate, hath been constrained to sell and mortgage some part of his lands to pay creditors, and to maintain his family, having a wife and nine children; and is likely to be undone for obeying the parliament's commands, unless by the justice and commiseration of this honourable assembly he be speedily relieved and righted; for that ever since the said reported sum, the petitioner from time to time hath made his humble addresses to the supreme powers for the time being, for satisfaction thereof, and to be restored to the said office, but could not prevail.

"The petitioner therefore humbly prays, that he may not perish for acting for the public good according to the declaration of parliament; but that now after twenty-six years suffering, whereof twelve years in fruitless and wearisome waitings, this honourable assembly would now be pleased to take the unparalleled sufferings of the petitioner into their grave considerations, for some speedy course for the petitioner's satisfaction, to pay his debts, and redeem his lands, by ordering him the one moiety of his debt in ready money out of the daily customs of London, (from whence his first losses and sufferings sprang) and the other moiety to be discompted upon such goods as the petitioner shall make entries of by exportation or importation in the Custom-House, London, until his debt with the interest be fully satisfied and paid; or any other speedy way, as in your grave wisdoms shall seem meet: and in like manner for his wife's debt, which is to pay debts and legacies: and that the petitioner may forthwith be restored to, and settled in the said office, and have reparations from the intruders.

"And the petitioner, with his, shall in all duty ever pray, &c.

"Sept. 6. 1654.

Richard Chambers."

The petitioner being wearied out with twelve years attendance upon one parliament, in hopes of reparation for his imprisonment, troubles, and losses, during the eleven years former interval of parliament, in standing for the liberty of the subject, grew infirm; and being not relieved, was reduced to a low estate and condition. He died in summer 1658; being about the age of seventy years.

XXIII. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Dr. ALEXANDER LEIGHTON, for a Libel, 4 June, 6 Cha. 1. 1630.

[The following report of this case is extracted from 2 Rushworth, 55. Mrs. Macaulay, in her history, comments on the proceedings against Dr. Leighton with great severity. 2 Macaul. Hist. 91. Indeed the cruelty of the sentence is beyond excuse.]

AN information formerly exhibited in the Star-Chamber against Alexander Leighton, a Scotsman born, and a doctor of divinity came to be heard the 4th of June in the court of Star-Chamber, for framing a book entitled, An Appeal to the Parliament, or a Plea against Prelacy, which he printed and published, during the sitting of the last parliament: and delivered it to diverse persons in a way of presenting just complaints (as he gave out) to the then commons house of parliament, 4 Carol. 1.

The defendant was charged by the said information with framing, publishing, and dispersing a scandalous book against king, peers, and prelates, wherein amongst other things he sets forth these false and seditious assertions and positions following.

1. That we do not read of greater persecution and higher indignity done upon God's people in any nation professing the Gospel, than in this our island, especially since the death of queen Elizabeth.

2. He terms the prelates of this realm men of blood, and enemies to God and the state, and faith, that the maintaining and establishing of bishops within this realm is a main and master-sin established by law, and that ministers should have no voices in council deliberative and deliberative.

3. He avowed the prelacy of our church to be antichristian and satanicall; and terms the bishops, raven and muggles, that prey upon the state.

4. He terms the canons of our church, made anno 1603, nonsensical canons. He disallowed and contemned the ceremony of kneeling in the receiving of the sacrament, alledging that the suggestion of false fears to the king by the prelacy, and the seeking of their own unlawful standing, brought forth that received spawn of the beast, kneeling at the receiving of the sacrament.

6. He affirms that the prelates did corrupt the king, forestalling his judgment against God and goodness; and most audaciously and wickedly calleth his majesty's royal consort, our gracious queen, the daughter of Hell.

7. He most impiously seems to commend him that committed the barbarous and bloody act of murdering the late duke of Buckingham; and to encourage others to second him in the like wicked and desperate attempt, to the destruction of others.

8. He layeth a most seditious scandal upon the king, state, and kingdom, wickedly affirming, that all that pass by us spoil us, and we spoil all that rely upon us; and amongst other particulars, instanceth the black pining death of the famished Rochesters, to the number of 15000 in four months: by which passages and wicked positions and assertions, he did, as much as in him lay, scandalize his majesties sacred person, his religious wife and just government, the person of his royal consort the queen, the persons of the lords and peers of this realm, especially the reverend bishops.

9. That in another place of the said book, endeavouring to slander not only his majesty's sacred person and government, but also to detract from his royal power, in making laws and canons for government ecclesiastical, and in matters concerning the church, he saith, that the church hath her laws from the scripture, and that no king may make laws in the house of God: for if they might, then the scripture might be imperfect.

10. And further charged, that in another place of the said book, thinking to salue all with an expression of his sacred majesty, he hath these words following; what pity it is, and indelible dishonour it will be to you the states representative, that so ingenious and tractable a king should be so monstrously abused, to the undoing of himself and his subjects?

The defendant in his answer confessed the writing of the book, but with no such ill intention, as by the said information is suggested; his end therein being only to remonstrate certain grievances in church and state, under which the people suffered, to the end the parliament might take them into consideration, and so give such redress, as might be for the honour of the king, the quiet of the people, and the peace of the church.

At the hearing of the cause, the defendant's answer was read at large, and the aforesaid particulars charged in the information as seditious and scandalous, were also read out of the book. After which the court proceeded to give sentence, and did there declare, that it evidently appeared upon proof, that the defendant had printed five or six hundred of the said books, and that in their opinions he had committed a most odious and heinous offence, deserving the severest punishment the court could inflict, for framing and publishing a book so full of most pestilent, devilish and dangerous assertions, to the scandal of the king, queen and peers, especially the bishops.

The two lord chief justices being present, delivered their opinions, that they would without any scruple have proceeded against the defendant as for treason committed by him, if it had come before them; and other lords expressly affirm'd, that it was his majesties exceeding great mercy and goodness, that he was brought to receive the censure of this court, and not questioned at another tribunal as a traitor.

And their lordships by an unanimous consent adjudged and decreed, that Dr. Leighton should be committed to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unless his majesty shall be graciously pleased to enlarge him; and he shall pay a fine of 10000*l.* to his majesty's use.

And in respect the defendant hath heretofore entered into the ministry, and this court, for the reverence of that calling, doth not use to inflict any corporal or ignominious punishment upon any person, so long as they continue in orders, the court doth refer him to the High-commission, there to be degraded of his ministry; and that being done, he shall then also for further punishment and example to others, be brought into the pillory at Westminster, (the court sitting) and there whipped, and after his whipping be set upon the pillory for some convenient space, and have one of his ears cut off, and his nose slit, and be branded in the face with a double S S, for a sower of sedition; and shall then be carried to the prison of the Fleet, and at some other convenient time afterwards shall be carried into the pillory at Cheapside, upon a market-day, and be there likewise whipt, and then be set upon the pillory, and have his other ear cut off, and from thence be carried back to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unless his majesty shall be graciously pleased to enlarge him.

This sentence being given toward the end of Trinity-Term, and the court not usually sitting after the term, unless upon emergent occasions, and it requiring some time in the Ecclesiastical court, in order to the degradation of the defendant, it was Michaelmas-Term following before any part of the sentence could be put in execution; but November the 4th he was accordingly degraded, and on Wednesday November the 10th (being a Star-Chamber day) he was to have undergone the execution of this sentence; but the evening before he escaped out of the Fleet, where he had been kept a close prisoner, and information hereof being given to the lords of the privy-council, they ordered this hue and cry to be printed to retake him.

(a) In 1641 the house of commons came to several resolutions in condemnation of the proceedings against Dr. Leighton. Particularly, they resolved, that the fine and corporal punishment and imprisonment by the sentence of the Star-Chamber were illegal, and that he ought to have satisfaction for his sufferings and damages. Journ. Comm. 21 April 1641. EDITOR.

A hue and cry against Dr. Leighton, by order of the privy-council.

Whereas Alexander Leighton, a Scottish man born, who was lately sentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, to pay a great fine to his majesty, and to undergo corporal punishment, for writing, printing, and publishing a very libellous and scandalous book against the king, and his government, hath this eleventh day of November escaped out of the prison of the Fleet, where he was a prisoner: these are in his majesties name to require and command all justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, bayliffs, customers, searchers and officers of the ports, and all other his majesties loving subjects, to use all diligence for the apprehending of the said Alexander Leighton; and being apprehended, safely to keep him in custody, until his majesty shall receive notice thereof, and shall give further direction concerning him. He is a man of low stature, fair complexion; he hath a yellowish beard, a high forehead, between forty and fifty years of age.

This hue and cry followed him to Bedfordshire, where he was apprehended, and brought again a prisoner to the Fleet. Concerning whose escape, and executing of the sentence upon him afterwards, the bishop of London in his Diary, on the fourth of November, makes this memorial, viz.

'Leighton was degraded at the High-commission, Tuesday the 9th of November; that night Leighton broke out of the Fleet, the warden says he got or was helped over the wall, and moreover professed he knew not this till Wednesday noon, he told it not me till Thursday night. He was taken again in Bedfordshire, and brought back to the Fleet, within a fortnight. Friday, November the 16th, part of his sentence was executed upon him in this manner, in the new palace at Westminster, in term time:

1. 'He was severely whipt before he was put in the pillory.
 2. 'Being set in the pillory, he had one of his ears cut off.
 3. 'One side of his nose slit.
 4. 'Branded on one cheek with a red hot iron, with the letters S S, signifying a stirrer up of sedition, and afterwards carried back again prisoner to the Fleet, to be kept in close custody.
- 'And on that day seven night, his sores upon his back, ear, nose, and face being not cured, he was whipt again at the pillory in Cheapside, and there had the remainder of his sentence executed upon him, by cutting off the other ear, slitting the other side of the nose, and branding the other cheek.'

The severe punishment of this unfortunate gentleman many people pitied, he being a person well known both for learning, and other abilities; only his untamed zeal (as his country-men then gave out) prompted him to that mistake, for which the necessity of affairs at that time required this severity from the hand of the magistrate, more than perhaps the crime would do in a following juncture.

Afterwards those who procured his escape were taken and brought into the Star-Chamber, and proceeded against, viz.

The defendants practising with one Leighton, a notable offender, to procure his escape out of the Fleet; Lewington put off his cloak, hat and breeches, being all of a grey colour, and Anderson his doublet, and Leighton put theirs on, and in that disguise they all went out of the Fleet unsuspected; but were afterwards taken again, and for these offences, and respect had of their penitency, they were only fined 500*l.* a-piece, and committed to the Fleet during the king's pleasure. XXIV. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, 29 May, 6 Cha. I. 1630, against the Earl of BEDFORD, the Earl of CLARE, the Earl of SOMERSET, Sir ROBERT COTTON, JOHN SELDEN, Esq; OLIVER ST. JOHN, Esq; and others, for publishing a seditious and scandalous Writing.

[The written piece, which gave occasion to these proceedings, was a most unconstitutional project for advancing the king's prerogative and revenue. It appears to have been sent over from Italy by the famous sir Robert Dudley, son of queen Elizabeth's favourite the earl of Leicester; and sir Robert is supposed to have been the author; though if that was really so, it highly reflects on one, who on other accounts is transmitted to us with high encomiums for his mental endowments and accomplishments, as the reader will see by consulting sir William Dugdale. See 2 Dugd. Baron. 222. It is probable, that the prosecution was commenced, in order to exculpate both James and Charles the First, with their respective ministers, from the imputation of approving of the project. It may seem surprizing to the reader, that such persons as Mr. Selden, and the other defendants named, except the earl of Somerset, should lie under a suspicion of countenancing propositions so irreconcilable with their political professions and conduct at the time. But, as there can be no reason for supposing that they gave their approbation to such arbitrary proposals, perhaps they were included in the prosecution from a suspicion of having encouraged a belief, that the king secretly favoured the scheme and meditated to execute it. On consulting the book intitled the Annals of James and Charles the First, we observe that the author adopts a like construction, adding that the piece in question was written by sir Robert Dudley at Florence, in 1613. See page 361.

We shall now lay before the reader, first the writing which was the cause of the prosecution; and secondly the account of the proceedings in the Star-Chamber; for both of which we are obliged to Mr. Rushworth.] See further the article of sir Robert Dudley in the Biograph Britannica.

Extract from Rushworth's Appendix to his Historical Collections, vol. 1. page 12.

A Proposition for his Majesty's Service to bridle the Impertinence of Parliaments.
THE proposition for your majesty's service, containeth two parts: the one to secure your state, and to bridle the impertinency of parliaments: the other, to increase your majesty's revenue, much more than it is.
VOL. XI.

1. Touching the first, having considered divers means, I find none so important to strengthen your majesty's regal authority, against all oppositions and practices of troublesome spirits, and to bridle them; than to fortify your kingdom, by having a fortress in every chief town, and important place thereof, furnished with ordnance, munition, and faithful faithful men, as they ought to be, with all other circumstances fit for to be digested in a business of this nature; ordering withal, the trained soldiers of the country to be united in one dependency with the said fort, as well to secure their beginning, as to succour them in any occasion of suspect; and also to retain and keep their arms for more security, whereby the countries are no less to be brought in subjection, than the cities themselves, and consequently the whole kingdom; your majesty having by this course the power thereof in your own hands. The reasons of the suggests are these. 1. That in policy, there is a greater tie of the people by force and necessity, than merely by love and affection; for by the one, the government resteth always secure; but by the other, no longer than the people are contented. 2. It forceth obstinate subjects to be no more presumptuous, then it pleaseth your majesty to permit them. 3. That to leave a state unfurnished, is, to give the bridle thereof to the subjects; when, by the contrary, it resteth only in the prince's hands. 4. That modern fortresses take long time in winning, with such charge and difficulty, as no subjects in these times have means probable to attempt them. 5. That it is a sure remedy against rebellion, and popular mutinies, or against foreign powers; because they cannot well succeed, when by this course the apparent means is taken away to force the king and subject upon a doubtful fortune of a set battle, as was the cause that moved the pretended invasion against the land, attempted by the king of Spain in the year 1588. 6. That your majesty's government is the more secure, by the people's more subjection; and by their subjection, your parliament must be forced consequently to alter their style, and to be conformable to your will and pleasure; for their words and opposition import nothing, where the power is in your majesty's own hands, to do with them what you please; being indeed the chief purpose of this discourse, and the secret intent thereof, fit to be concealed from any English at all, either counsellors of state, or other.

For these, and divers other weighty reasons, it may be considered in this place, to make your majesty more powerful and strong, some orders be observed, that are used in fortified countries, the government whereof imports as much as the states themselves, I mean, in times of doubt or suspect, which are these. Imprimis, that none wear arms or weapons at all, either in city or country, but such as your majesty may think fit to privilege, and they to be enrolled. 2. That as many highways as conveniently may be done, be made passable through those cities and towns fortified, to constrain the passengers to travel through them. 3. That the soldiers of fortresses be sometimes chosen of another nation, if subject to the same prince; but howsoever, not to be born in the same province, or within forty or fifty miles of the fortress, and not to have friends or correspondency near it. 4. That at all the gates of each walled town be appointed officers, not to suffer any unknown passengers to pass, without a ticket, shewing from whence he came, and whither to go. And that the gates of each city be shut all night, and keys kept by the mayor or governor. 5. Also innkeepers to deliver the names of all unknown passengers that lodge in their houses; and if they stay suspiciously at any time, to present them to the governor: whereby dangerous persons seeing these strict courses, will be more wary of their actions, and thereby mischievous attempts will be prevented. All which being referred to your majesty's wise consideration, it is meet for me withal to give you some satisfaction of the charge and time to perform what is purposed, that you may not be discouraged in the difficulty of the one, or prolongation of the other; both which doubts are resolved in one and the same reason, in respect that, in England, each chief town commonly hath a ruined castle, well seated for strength, whose foundation and stones remaining, may be both quickly repaired for this use, and with little charge and industry made strong enough; I hope, for this purpose, within the space of one year; by adding withal bulwarks and rampiers for the ordnance, according to the rules of fortification. The ordnance for these forts may be of iron, not to disfigure your majesty's navy, or be at a greater charge than is needful.

To maintain yearly the fort, I make account an ordinary pay, three thousand men will be sufficient, and will require forty thousand pound charge per annum, or thereabouts, being an expence that inferior princes undergo, for their necessary safety. All which prevention, added to the invincible sea-force your majesty hath already, and may have, will make you the most powerful and obeyed king of the world: which I could likewise confirm by many examples, but I omit them for brevity, and not to confuse your majesty with too much matter. Your majesty may find by the scope of this discourse, the means shewed in general to bridle your subjects, that may be either discontent or obstinate. So likewise am I to conclude the same intent particularly, against the perverseness of your parliament, as well to suppress that pernicious humour, as to avoid their oppositions against your profit, being the second part to be discoursed on: and therefore have first thought fit, for better prevention thereof, to make known to your majesty the purpose of a general oath your subjects may take, for sure avoiding of all rubs, that may hinder the conclusion of these businesses. It is further meant, that no subject, upon pain of high treason, may refuse the same oath, containing only matter of allegiance, and not scruples in points of conscience, that may give pretence not to be denied. The effect of the oath is this, that all your majesty's subjects do acknowledge you to be as absolute a king and monarch within your dominions, as is among the Christian princes; and your prerogative as great; whereby you may and shall of yourself, by your majesty's proclamation, as well as other sovereign princes doing the like, either make laws, or reverse any made, with any other act so great a monarch as yourself may do, and that without further consent of a parliament, or need to call them at all in such cases; considering, that the parliament in all matters, excepting causes to be sentenced at the highest court, ought to be subject unto your majesty's will, to give the negative or affirmative conclusion, and not be constrained by their impertinencies to any inconvenience, appertaining to your majesty's regal authority; and this, notwithstanding any bad pretence or custom to the contrary in practice, which indeed were fitter to be offered a prince elected, without other right, than to your majesty, born successively king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and your heirs for ever; and so received, not only of your subjects, but also of the whole world. How necessary the dangerous supremacy of parliament's usurpation is to be prevented, the example of Lewis the eleventh, king of France, doth manifest, who found the like opposition as your majesty doth, and by his wisdom suppressed it. And to the purpose here intended, which is not to put down altogether parliaments and their authority, being in many cases very necessary and fit; but to abridge them so far, as they seek to derogate from your majesty's regal authority, and advancement of your greatness; the caution in offering the aforesaid oath, may require some policy, for the easier passage at first, either by singular or particular tractation; and that so near about one time over the land, as one government may not know what the other intendeth; so it may pass the easier, by having no time of combination or opposition. There is another means also more certain than this, to bring to pass the oath more easily, as also your profit, and what else pretended; which here I omit for brevity, requiring a long discourse by itself, and have set it down in particular instructions to inform your majesty.

2. The second part of this discourse is, touching your majesty's profit, after your state is secured: wherein I should observe both some reasonable content to the people, as also consider the great expences that princes have now-a-days, more than in times past, to maintain their greatness, and safety of their subjects, who, if they have not wit or will to consider their own interest so much indifferently, your majesty's wisdom must repair their defects, and force them to it by compulsion; but I hope there shall be no such cause, in points so reasonable, to increase your majesty's revenue, wherein I set down divers means for your gracious self to make choice of, either all or part at your pleasure, and to put it in execution by such degrees and cautions, as your great wisdom shall think fit in a business of this nature.

Imprimis, the first means or course intended to increase your majesty's revenues or profits withal, is of greatest consequence, and I call it a decimation, being so termed in Italy, where in some part it is in use, importing the tenth of all subjects estates, to be paid as a yearly rent to their prince, and as well monied-men in towns, as landed-men in the countries, their value and estates esteemed justly as it is to the true value, though with reason; and this paid yearly in money: which course applied in England for your majesty's service, may serve instead of subsidies, fifteens, and such like, which in this case are fit to be released, for the subjects benefit and content, in recompence of the said decima, which will yield your majesty more in certainty, than they do casually, by five hundred thousand pounds per annum at the least. Item, that when your majesty hath gotten money into your hands by some courses to be set down, it would be a profitable course to encrease your entrada, to buy out all estates and leases upon your own lands, in such sort, as they be made no losers; whereby having your lands free, and renting it out to the true value, as it is most in use, and not employed as heretofore, at an old rent, and small fines, you may then rent it out for at least four or five times more money than the old rent comes unto. So as if your majesty's lands be already but sixty thousand pounds per annum, by this course it will be augmented at the least two hundred thousand pounds per annum; and to buy out the tenants estates will come to a small matter by the course, to make them no losers, considering the gain they have already made upon the land: and this is the rather to be done, and the present course changed, because it hath been a custom used merely to cosen the king. Item, whereas most princes do receive the benefit of salt in their own hands, as a matter of great profit, because they receive it at the lowest price possible, and vent it at double gain yearly; the same course used by your majesty, were worth at least one hundred and fifty thousand pounds per annum. It is likewise in other parts, that all weights and measures of the land, either in private houses, shops, or public markets, should be viewed to be just, and sealed once a year, paying to the prince for it; which in England, applied to your majesty, with order to pay sixpence for the scaling of each said weight or measure, would yield near sixty thousand pounds per annum. Item, tho' all countries pay a gabella for transportation of cloth, and so likewise in England; yet, in Spain, there is impost upon the wools, which in England is so great a wealth and benefit to the sheep-masters, as they may well pay you five pounds per cent. of the true value at the shearing, which I conceive may be worth one hundred and forty thousand pounds per annum. Item, whereas the lawyers fees and gains in England be excessive, to your subjects prejudice; it were better for your majesty to make use thereof, and impose on all causes sentenced with the party, to pay five pounds per cent. of the true value that the cause hath gained him; and for recompence thereof, to limit all lawyers fees and gettings, whereby the subject shall save more in fees and charges, then he giveth to your majesty in the gabella, which I believe may be worth, one year with another, fifty thousand pounds. Item, whereas the inns and victualling-houses in England are more chargeable to the travellers than in other countries, it were good for your majesty to limit them to certain ordinaries, and raise besides a large imposition, as is used in Tuscany, and other parts; that is, a prohibiting all inns and victualling-houses, but such as shall pay it; and to impose upon the chief inns and taverns, to pay ten pounds a-year to your majesty, and the worst five pounds per annum, and all ale-houses twenty shillings per annum, more or less, as they are in custom. Of all sorts there are so many in England, that this impost may well yield one hundred thousand pounds per annum to your majesty. Item, in Tuscany, and other parts, there is a gabella of all cattle, or flesh, and horses sold in markets, paying three or four per cent. of what they are sold for, which by conjecture may be worth in England, two hundred thousand pounds per annum; using the like custom upon fish, fish, and other victuals, (bread excepted) and for this cause, flesh, and fish, and victuals in the markets, to be priced and sold by weight, whereby the subject saveth more in not being coufened, than the imposition impairerth them. Item, in Tuscany is used a taxation of seven per cent. upon all alienation of lands to the true value. As also seven per cent. upon all dowries, or marriage-monies. The like, if it be justly used in England, were worth at least one hundred thousand pounds per annum; with many other taxations upon meal, and upon all merchandises in all towns, as well as port-towns, which here I omit, with divers others, as not so fit for England. And in satisfaction of the subject for these taxes, your majesty may be pleased to release them of wardships, and to enjoy all their estates at eighteen years old; and in the mean time, their profits to be preserved for their own benefit. And also in forfeitures of estate by condemnation, your majesty may release the subject, as not to take the forfeiture of their lands, but their goods, high treason only excepted; and to allow the counsel of lawyers in case of life and death; as also not to be condemned without two witnesses, with such like benefit, which importeth much more their good than all the taxations named can prejudice them. Item, some of the former taxations, used in Ireland and in Scotland, as may easily be brought about by the first example thereof used in England, may very well be made to increase your revenue there, more than it is, by two hundred thousand pounds per annum. Item, all offices in the land, great and small, in your majesty's grant, may be granted, with condition, to pay you a part yearly, according to the value: this, in time, may be worth (as I conceive) one hundred thousand pounds per annum: adding also notaries, attornies, and such like, to pay some proportion yearly towards it, for being allowed by your majesty to practise, and prohibiting else any to practise in such places. Item, to reduce your majesty's household to board-wages, as most other princes do, reserving some few tables; this will save your majesty sixty thousand pounds per annum, and ease greatly the subject besides, both in carriages and provision, which is a good reason, that your majesty in honour might do it. Item, I know an assured course in your majesty's navy, which may save at least forty thousand pounds per annum, which requiring a whole discourse by itself, I omit; only promise you to do it, whensoever you command. Item, whereas your majesty's laws do command the strict keeping of fasting-days, you may also prohibit on those days to eat eggs, cheese, and white-meats, but only such as are contented to pay eighteen pence a year for the liberty to eat them, and the better fort ten shillings. The employment of this may be for the defence of the land, in maintaining the navy, garrisons, and such like, much after the fashion of a Crusado in Spain, as your majesty knoweth, being first begun there, under the pretence to defend the land against the Moors. And the same used in England, as aforesaid, may very well yield, one year with another, one hundred thousand pounds, without any disgust to any, because it is at every one's choice to give it or no. Lastly, I have a course upon the Catholics, and very safe for your majesty, being with their good-liking, as it may be wrought, to yield you presently at least two hundred thousand pounds per annum, by raising a certain value upon their lands, and some other impositions; which requiring a long discourse by itself, I will omit it here, setting it down in my instructions. It will save your majesty at least one hundred thousand pounds per annum, to make it pain of death, and confiscation of goods and lands, for any of the officers to coufen you, which now is much to be feared they do, or else they could not be so rich; and herein to allow a fourth part benefit to them that shall find out the coufenage. Here is not meant officers of state, as the lord treasurer, &c. being officers of the crown. The sum of all this account amounteth unto two millions, or twenty hundred thousand pounds per annum: suppose it to be but one million and a half, as assuredly your majesty may make by these courses set down, yet it is much more than I promised in my letter for your majesty's service. Besides, some sums of money in present, by the courses following: imprimis, by the prince's marriage, to make all the earls in England grandees of Spain, and principi, with such like privileges, and to pay twenty thousand pounds a-piece for it. 2. As also, if you make them foeditaries of the towns belonging to their earldoms, if they will pay for it besides, as they do to the king of Spain in the kingdom of Naples. And so likewise barons, to be made earls and peers, to pay nineteen thousand pounds a-piece, I think might yield five hundred thousand pounds, and oblige them more sure to his majesty. 3. To make choice of two hundred of the richest men of England in estate, that be not noblemen, and make them titulate, as is used in Naples, and paying for it; that is, a duke thirty thousand pounds, a marquis fifteen thousand pounds, an earl ten thousand pounds, and a baron or viscount five thousand pounds. It is to be understood, that the antient nobility of barons, made earls, are to precede these as peers, tho' these be made marquesses or dukes; this may raise a million of pounds and more unto your majesty. To make gentlemen of low quality, and francklins, and rich farmers, esquires, to precede them, would yield your Majesty also a great sum of money in present. I know another course to yield your majesty at least three hundred thousand pounds in money, which as yet the time serveth not to discover, until your majesty be resolved to proceed in some of the former courses, which till then I omit. Other courses also, that may make present money, I shall study for your majesty's service, and, as I find them out, acquaint you withal. Lastly, to conclude all these discourses, by the application of this course used for your profit, that it is not only the means to make you the richest king that ever England had, but also the safety augmented thereby to be most secure, besides what was shewed in the first part of this discourse; I mean, by the occasion of this taxation, and raising of monies, your majesty shall have cause and means to employ in all places of the land so many officers and ministers, to be obliged to you for their own good and interest, as nothing can be attempted against your person, or royal state, over land, but some of them shall, in all probability, have means to find it out, and hinder it. Besides, this course will detect many disorders and abuses in the public government, which were hard to be discovered by men indifferent. To prohibit gorgeous and costly apparel to be worn, but by persons of good quality, shall save the gentry of the kingdom much more money, than they shall be taxed to pay unto your majesty. Thus withal I take my leave, and kiss your gracious hands, desiring pardon for my error I may commit herein.

Extract from Rushworth's Historical Collections, vol. 2. page 51.

ON the 20th of May, 1630, a great cause was brought to hearing in the Star-Chamber, concerning a discourse, entituled, A Proposition for his Majesties Service to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments. Wherein the king's attorney-general was plaintiff, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Clare, the earl of Somerset, sir Robert Cotton, John Selden, Oliver St. John, and others, defendants: which discourse we have inserted at large in the Appendix to the first part of Historical Collections. Here now followeth the answers of the defendants, and the judgment of the court thereupon, viz.

After the king's attorney-general opened the aforementioned information, the answer of Robert earl of Somerset to the said information, was also opened by his council, to this effect:

That the discourse, as he believed, was either the same that was shewed him in the time of his attendance near his late majesty king James, or had many of the same things in it: and finding no cause of concealing a proposition made in a former king's time, and having no apprehension, that scandal to his majesty, or the present government, might thereby happen, he casually imparted it to the earls of Bedford and Clare, who, after perusal thereof, delivered their opinion concerning it, at their next meeting; that it was a phantastick project of some brain-sick traveller, who had made collections of some princes in Italy, and other foreign states, no way suitable to the government of this kingdom.

And further said, that (besides that one time) there was never any conference, nor any passage by letter or otherwise, betwixt them concerning it, or with any other person, and denied that he either contrived the proposition, or knew of the contriving thereof, or ever imagined that his majesty would innovate the antient form of government, dispose of the estates of his subjects without their consents, make or repeal laws by proclamation without consent of parliament, plant garrisons in his principal cities and towns, or put in execution any part of the said discourse: and the reason why he did not present the discourse to his majesty, or some of the lords of the council, or some magistrate, was, because he did not conceive the same did in any sort concern the time of his majesties government, but was contrived in some former time, as appeared manifestly, by the particulars therein contained; and that about sixteen or seventeen years ago, sir David Fowles shewed him the project, to whom he replied, that he was satisfied no use could be made thereof, and so he redelivered it, and concluded that the divulging thereof was in his opinion pardoned by the general pardon granted upon his now majesties coronation.

The rest of the defendants denied any their contrivance thereof, alledging the author (as they were informed) was living beyond sea, and that they ought not to be questioned for it, being writ in the time of king James, and not in reference to his now majesties government, denying that they had the least thought or intention to scandalize the government; for that they rejected the discourse as soon as they read it, as a foolish and impertinent issue of some projecting brain; and they averred their detestation of such a project, and that they bore loyal hearts to his majesty, and blessed God for the happy and peaceable government under him.

After the publication of the cause in order to a hearing, it appeared by the depositions of sir David Fowles, that he received the said writing from one Mr. Yates, in the time of king James, who brought it from sir Robert Dudley at Florence, together with a letter, desiring him to deliver it to the earl of Somerset, that he might communicate it to king James, which was done accordingly, and that in his hearing the earl signified a dislike thereof; and that he received it back from the earl (being the original) and kept it by him till the lords of the council sent for it, and that he made no copy thereof.

It appeared also by the depositions of other witnesses, that this discourse, nine years ago, was bought by them in Little-Britain amongst other manuscripts.

So this cause coming to hearing, a great presence of nobility being in court, the attorney-general opened the charge. But before much proceeding, his majesty sent word unto the lord keeper Coventry, then in court, that the queen was brought to bed of a son, and a private message also was delivered to him from the king; whereupon the lord keeper declared in court, that his most sacred majesty had taken this matter into his most serious consideration, and although the same was of so high a nature, as it was necessary to be brought in question, (being contrary to many laws and statutes, and the common law itself) yet his majesty balancing the same in the scales of justice and mercy (the author of the discourse being discovered to live beyond the seas) found these defendants rather fitting to be objects of his mercy, than justice, they being some of them noblemen, and such as his majesty did and doth well esteem and like of, in his royal opinion: and that his majesty was the rather inclined to extend his goodness, in regard of the time; it having now pleased the great justice of heaven to bless his majesty and his kingdom with a royal

Issue of his body, a hopeful prince, the great joy and long expectation both of king and kingdom.

Upon this declaration of the king's pleasure, the lord keeper made known, that the court by his majesties special command was to proceed no further in the hearing of this cause: but ordered the project, or book, to be burnt, as seditious and scandalous both to his majesty, the state, and government of this kingdom. And ordered the proceedings to be taken off the file.

XXV. Proceedings in the Court of Chivalry, on an Appeal of High-Treason, by Donald Lord Rea, against Mr. DAVID RAMSAY, 7 Cha. I. 1631.

[The following case is an instance of awarding a trial by duel in the court of Chivalry, though afterwards the duel was prevented. There are two accounts of it, which we shall submit to our readers. One is from Sanderfon's History of the Life and Reign of Charles the First, page 164. to 173. The other is from Rushworth's Historical Collections, vol. 2. pages 62, 106, 112. Bishop Burnet relates the history of the accusation in his Lives of the Dukes of Hamilton, principally with a view to justify the first duke of Hamilton, whose name was involved in the affair. See Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 11. to 14. The bishop, it is observable, charges Sanderfon with giving a journal of the procedure on lord Rea's appeal, in order to impeach the duke of Hamilton's loyalty. In Rushworth there is a letter from Charles the first to the duke of Hamilton, which explains what was done in the court of Chivalry, and amply proves, that the king was quite satisfied of the duke's innocence. This letter forms a part of Rushworth's relation. As to the account in the Annals of James and Charles the First, it is merely a copy of Sanderfon, with the addition of the king's letter from Rushworth.] There is an account of the proceedings in this case amongst the manuscripts at the Herald's Office.

Sanderfon's Relation.

WHEN friends fall out their faults are found, as appears by the quarrell between Donnold lord Rey, a Scottish highlander, or rather more northward of the isles Orkney, and one David Ramsay a true Scot courtier, concerning words and designs of treason against the king and kingdom, which because Ramsay denied, they are admitted the trial by combat, the manner being as followeth.

The day prefixt for trial was the 28 of November, 1631, before Robert earl of Lindsey, lord high chamberlain of England, and now pro tempore deputed lord high constable of England.

Thomas earl of Arundel, earl marshall of England.

The earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain of the kings household.

The earl of Dorset, chamberlain to the queens household.

The earl of Carlisle.

Earl of Malgrave.

Earl of Merton.

Viscount Wimbleton.

Viscount Wentworth.

Viscount Falkland.

Sir Henry Vane.

The place was the Painted Chamber at Westminster: at the upper end thereof a bench was erected four foot high for the constable, and marshal, and lords assistants. Under them seats about a square table, filled with the heralds of arms, and serjeants at arms, and other officers of the court. Directly under the upper bench sate the register doctor Dethick, and over against him doctor Duck the kings advocate for the marshals court. Behinde him at the bar were the two pews for the appellant and defendant.

At eight a clock comes the earl marshal (ushered in with nine heralds, and three serjeants at arms) bearing his marshal truncheon of gold, tipped with black, and commanding room, and giving orders, retired into the upper house of parliament, and then returned into the court, as to make way for the high constable, who followed, and all took place in their degrees.

The earl marshal rises, makes obedience to the constable, and passing forward meets sir William Seager king of heralds, and both of them present to the constable his commission, which he received with his hat off: and delivered it to the register to read, in effect,

That his majesty being informed by Donnold lord Rey, how David Ramsay esquire, had plotted, and was privy unto divers treasons and conspiracies against his royal person, government, and kingdoms. In the search whereof the king had used all ways and means for the discovery of the truth: the one of them accusing, the other denying, and so no certain security to his own person and his subjects: therefore he doth authorize the said Robert Bartie earl of Lindsey lord high constable, for to call unto him Thomas earl of Arundel earl marshal, and with him such other peers, sheriffs, and officers, as he thinks fit, to hold a marshal's court, for lifting the truth between the said parties, &c.

Then the king of heralds delivers to the constable, his silver verge or staff, half a yard in length, headed with a crown of gold. Then the earl marshal delivered a key to a herald, to fetch in the appellant ushered in by the herald, and accompanied with his sureties, sir Pierce Crosby, sir Walter Crosby, sir William Forbiez, sir Robert Gordon, and sir William Evers. He was apparelled in black velvet trimmed with silver buttons, his sword in a silver imbroidered belt, in his order of a Scottish baronet, about his neck, and so with reverence entered into his pew. His council doctor Ravoe standing by. His behaviour (like himself, tall, swarthy, black, but comely) very port-like and of staid countenance.

The defendant was alike ushered in by another herald. His sureties were the lord Rauberough and lord Abercorn: and his deport like himself, stern and brave, a fair, ruddy, yellow-headed bush of hair, (so large, and in those days unusual, that he was called Ramsay Redhead). His apparel scarlet, over-laced with silver, the ground hardly discerned, and lined with sky-coloured plush, but unarmed, without a sword. After his reverence to the court, he faced the appellant, who alike sterner a countenance at him.

After O yes! the earl marshal told them the effect of the commission, and the power of this court, which was not of any strange nature, but legal and justifiable as any other trial in Westminster-Hall; and that there had been no more nor other trials of this kinde of late, we were to attribute it to Gods goodness, the justice of the king, and loyalty of the subject, with the providence of state, and wished there might be no more in time to come; and that to expect any combat, this court he hoped would prevent it by the discovery of the light, and so magna est veritas, & praevalabit.

He referred the further proceedings unto doctor Duck, the kings advocate, who spake thus in effect.

That the kings majesty had committed the trial of the business to your grace my lord high constable, the earl marshal, and this court, which course was warrantable by the laws of other nations, and also by our own, who have used the same manner of trial.

That our law admitted sundry proofs for treason, which in other matters it did not: that all subjects were bound to discover treasons: and cited two ancient civilians, Hieronymus and Tiberius, who gave their reasons for this kinde of trial. And he mentioned sundry records of our own chronicles and examples herein, as the duke of Norfolk combating against the duke of Harrford in Henry 4. his time; Jo. Ely and William Scroop against Ballamon at Burdeaux, the king being there; the lord Morley impeached Mountague earl of Salisbury; and that Thomas of Walsingham and Thomas of Woodstock in their learned writings, expressed sundry presidents for this manner of proceeding; wishing the court in Gods name to go on to the trial, and the appellant to give in his evidence.

Then the appellant came up upon the table, to whom the earl marshal delivered the petition, which he had the day before exhibited to the king. And the defendant being also called up, the petition was read, which was in effect, that he having accused Ramsay of treason, and also Meldram his kinsman, and of confederacy, against whom captain Notwick was witness, therefore had desired, that the court would proceed against Meldram first.

But he was told by the court, that their cases differing, the appellant was ordered to deliver in his charge against the defendant, which he did, in writing by bill, containing sundry particulars, viz.

That in May last in the Low-Countries, Ramsay complained to him against the court of England.

That the matters of church and state was so out of frame as must tend to a change, if not desolation.

That therefore he had abandoned the kingdom, to live where now he was, and to expect a mutation forthwith, to which end he had brought present moneys to maintain him at six pounds a day for three years. That marquis Hamilton had a great army promised to him, for pay whereof the king had given in hand ten thousand pound, and all the wine customes in Scotland for sixteen years, presently to be sold for the armies subsistence. And that he staid but for ammunition and powder to come over, for which his lordship was to mediate with his majesty of Sweden and the States, and then link themselves together, of whose minde Rey should know hereafter.

That their friends in Scotland had gotten therefore arms and powder out of England, and that what he should procure in Holland was to be brought over by the marquis; and that all Scotland were sure to them except three.

That France and Spain thirsted for England, but Hamilton would defeat them for himself. His onely fear was of Denmark, where he meant to land, and either to take him off, or make a party.

That afterwards at Amsterdam, Ramsay with Alexander Hamilton solicited him the lord Rey to be true to them, and to be of their council, though as yet they durst not reveal too much of Hamilton's secrets, but if he repaired to England, he would intrust him with letters; and that his brother in law Sea-port knew all.

This being the effect of the charge. He added, That if Ramsay would deny it, he was a villain and a traitour, which he would make good. And therewith cast him his glove.

Ramsay

Ramsay denied all, and said, Rey was a liar, a barbarous villain, and threw down his glove, protesting, to gar him dy for it, if he had had him in place for that purpose.

Rey was temperate, without any passion, but smiling, replied, Mr. Ramsay, we will not contend here. Answer to my bill.

Then Ramsay offered some reasons of the impossibility of the charge, the slender numbers of men from England, but six thousand raw souldiers, against three kingdoms, whom the first proclamation might dissipate. That the marquess was neither so wicked, nor weak in judgment: and if he should conceit to surprize the king, what hope had he against his children and kindred? And therefore (said he) my lord Rey is a barbarous villain, and a liar, and he will gar him dy for it, or lose his dearest blood.

He was interrupted by the earl marshal, telling him, he must not stand upon conjectures; but answer the bill of form according to law, and was advised to take counsel therein.

Then Ramsay in general acknowledged all the particular circumstances of time and place alleged by Rey, and the discourse to that effect; but concluded, that no treason was intended or uttered, and craved counsel to answer, which was granted.

And so the court adjourned to the fifth of December, but upon a fresh arrest by the earl marshal they were to put in bail for appearance, which were the old security; and Ramsay ordered to answer upon oath. At which day appearing, the fame of the cause brought thither such a crowd of people as was not imaginable.

Rey entered as before in manner and habit: but Ramsay was new suited in black fatten, and presented his answer in writing to this effect:

That having well considered the time, place, and communication with the lord Rey beyond the seas, (as before urged) he confesses;

That Rey demanded of him, whether the marquess Hamilton intended to come over and follow the wars? He said, yes; and told him of his forces six thousand men, and of the ten thousand pounds in money, and wine-customes in Scotland, which he would sell to maintain the army, and that he would come so provided with ammunition, that being joyned with his friends he valued no enemy. Upon which Rey replied, that his own two regiments should wait upon him: but the place of these forces to meet was at sea, and there to receive directions from the king of Sweden, where to rendezvous. Upon which Rey said, that his life and fortunes should wait on the marquess; who being told of his friendship, wrote a letter to Rey, which Ramsay delivered, in effect, that Rey would get some ammunition from the king of Sweden, which was wanting. And that, speaking in general of matters amiss in England, Rey answered, God amend all. To whom Ramsay replied, by God, Donnald, we must help him to amend all. And to all the other matters and things he utterly denies, and craves revenge upon Rey's person by dint of sword.

Then doctor Eden of council for Ramsay spake to the court, that being assigned his council, his opinion was, that the defendant might decline the combat, and reply to the appellant's bill in brief, with these reasons:

First, that by the words in the bill, no man can be charged a traitor by one that is guilty in his own particular, and so is not tied to be defendant, nor to answer such a bill.

Secondly, the uncertainty and doubtfulness of the words in the charge; so that till the court doth censure them to be treasonable, the defendant is not tied to answer.

Thirdly, the appellant refers the combat till the last, if he cannot in the mean time prove the charge by any other ways; then he offers to make it good by his body. So then, the defendant may forbear his answer, and decline the combat.

And now my lords (said he) I humbly shall acquaint you with the defendants answer to me in private, which was,

That though in law he might, yet in honour and innocency he would not, decline the combat, but being his own consent, his advocate hath the less to say for him. And so time was given for Rey's replication till Friday after.

Rey's counsel moved, whereas Dr. Eden had excepted at some words in the charge, he answered, that whoever was accused of treason, was not to insist, how polluted the answer was, but how to approve and clear himself: then to refer the combat to the last, was well done, ultimum refugium, to expose his life, for God, the king and his country.

This speech being somewhat peremptory, and directory to the court, he was told,

That the court needed not his direction, as to the tryall of combat, their wisdoms would consider of that when it was time; and so the court adjourned, both parties being admitted to have common lawyers; but to plead onely by civilians.

This day come, Rey appears as before; but Ramsay in a new suit, of ash-colour cloth, opened with scarlet colour, the cloke scarlet cloth, lined with ash coloured velvet, and the whole suit and cloke overlaid with silver and sky coloured lace.

The former proceedings were read by the register; and thereupon the appellants replication presented to the high constable: in effect, that Ramsay in his answer had cunningly slipt over a part of the charge, which was, that the lord Rey protested, he was not ingaged in wars, for want of subsistence, and therefore would not hazard in any designe, without sure knowledge, upon which words, depends much of the matter and main of that part of the bill. And so ripping up the several charges of the bill, the strength, reasons, and likelihood, and the defendants defects in not clearing the chief points, they went on with the council.

It was his part to enforce the charge against Ramsay to this effect.

He observed, that the first day, Ramsay denied all the charge, whilst he stood upon positive resolution, but afterwards his counsel brought him to particulars, and taught him to answer superficially; first he knew nothing, and yet now so much. No doubt there was some stranger enterprise by the marquess Hamilton, then to serve the king of Sweden, by Ramsay's professing that Hamilton was a protestant, and bore arms for religion, not caring with whom to grapple; from hence observing, they intended somewhat to attempt of themselves. Ramsay filed the marquess his master in discourse, and in many of his letters produced, much of the discovery by Rey was to fish out of Ramsay the truth of his doubtful words; how unlikely it was that Rey having two regiments of old souldiers, captain of the king of Sweden's dragoons in good pay for all, should offer to serve Hamilton who was to be commanded by the king.

And that Ramsay might decline the combat, or forbear answering till the last, was a strange opinion of counsel; because, combat was to be reserved till all other means of discovery sayled, and therefore Rey's reasons were supplimental proofs; and requesting Meldrams testimony; but however he was now ready, if the court thinks fit to give the combat presently.

And concluded with an example in case of murther. Two men fight in secret, the one is slain, the other flies, and though without any witness of the fact, his seeking to escape condemns him guilty. So Ramsay having been accused of treason above three moneths by the lord Rey, and both confined, Ramsay despairing of his cause, seeks his flight from justice by sending to Rey a private challenger, being a sufficient conviction in law, as by ancient presidents in this court: viz. Kiteles, after an appeal, sends a challenger to Scroop, and was therefore adjudged guilty.

Doctor Duck answered to all. That first, it was prudence for Ramsay to answer in general negatively, having been newly landed from sea; and might be excused till time and consideration, to refresh his memory, being not upon oath; and as yet, the defendant need not answer perfectly, till further time and favour, to view the exhibits in court by copies, which he desires.

And directly urged against the lord Rey's replication, not to be allowed; because, Rey, referring himself now to proofs, might have saved the trouble of this court of honour and chivalrie and hazzard of their persons by combat, which intends the trial without proofs; and that the defendant having ingaged his sureties, but to this day, he humbly desires the time and place to be ordered for the sudden combat, according to the law of arms, and custom of this court; saying, that the duel foreseen, must ensue upon the appeal and denial; and therefore ought now to be granted.

Doctor Reeves moved for continuance of the replication, and consented to the combat; the court admitted the replication, and ordered time till Wednesday for exceptions thereto.

Doctor Duck offered some reasons to satisfy Rey, and extremely to censure Ramsay, where he was interrupted and told by the earl marshal, that the court will save him the labour and counsel, till the rejoinders be put in, and then to be ordered.

Doctor Eden shewed, that the copies of the letters exhibited were not given out: nor shall, sayes the earl marshal, till the court have considered of the contents, and so they were read.

The one was from Ramsay to Rey, certifying him of passages in the Low-Countrys since their parting, to put the marquess in minde of directing him how to dispose of the ammunition and arms in his custody; subscribed, your servant, Ramsay.

The other from the lord marquess, to the lord Rey, congratulating his love and affection, expressing a great desire to meet him in Germany, upon any termes he would propose; and that Ramsay the bearer was instructed for him to treat with the king of Sweden, whom he desires to favour and assist, which will oblige him his friend and servant, Hamilton.

Doctor Duck opened the whole matter, and each particular, insisting, that my lord Rey's evidence being for the king, and he a person of honour, and peer of Scotland, his testimony was sufficient.

And moves that Mr. Meldram might be admitted for supply, for though they were not joynt witnesses together, of the words, which made the charge; yet for as much that they were spoken asunder, and agreeing together, made up a full proof: that no testimony may be neglected in matters of treason. That if any part of the charge was denied by the defendant, and proved by the appellant, it might convince him in a manner of the whole: and urged the offence of Ramsay's challenging Rey. But more of that hereafter.

But doctor Reeves prosecuted the matter, for that Ramsay's counsel endeavoured to prove that he might decline the combat, or forbear answering, because of some words which reflected upon my lord Rey as matter of reproach, that Rey had uttered words of treason to catch Ramsay, and then to turn informer. But (said he) no office can be accounted base, when the king and kingdoms safety is concern'd; citing a story out of Livie, that the Romans confederate with the Sanubies, were to undergo a base office that stood not with honour, and resolved, so long as it was advantageous to the Romane state, it might with honour be undertaken.

Doctor Eden was earnest to excuse himself for putting in these words against the lord Rey, saying, that his client enforced to have them inserted.

But being a point of honour, the earl marshal interposed, that true it was, the best man may not refuse the basest office to preserve a king and nation; but again, it was most unworthy the degree of honour, for any man to angle and intrap another, and then to present him to that kings justice.

Then the pleaders argued concerning Meldrams testimony, that no proof ought to be omitted for the king; but it was offered for Ramsay to joyn issue upon that point in law; for the bill was laid against him not general, but particular to place, time and matter, viz. that in May last in a ship, and afterwards at Amsterdam, then again at Dilph, Ramsay should say such and such words, which if Meldram would justify, besides himself, they ought to be admitted, otherwise it was no good matter, but must refer to a new bill.

That the defendant had answered fully, for that the lord Rey profered his service to the marquess without pressing to know any designe. That nothing in the letters could convict Ramsay. That the lord Rey standing upon his great offices under the king of Sweden, and so not necessitated to serve the marquess, he had not those places of command then, but since; and that since his coming into England, he said that he would have served under the marquess, and concluded that Ramsey and the marquess might use such words, and yet not intend treason to his majesty.

But having in this trial meddled so much with the marquess, the court was fain to enter an order or protection, to clear the marquess his words or actions from dishonour.

Then the court proceeded to examine witnesses viva voce.

Archibald Rauken was to prove the challenge as the bringer: upon these questions he confessed, that he was in Ramsey's chamber at Richmond the last of October.

That Ramsey did not employ him to carry any challenge to the lord Rey; but at that time Ramsey told him, that it was his grief to be restrained not to meet Rey, who was a traitorous villain, and wished to meet him in the open fields at Barn-Elms, he would make him dye for it, and tear his heart, with other such words of reproach, and wished this deponent to tell Rey so much, which he did, but it was three weeks after, and then, not until the lord Rey told him, that Ramsey had sent him a challenge; so that said Ramsey, my message was but a relation, not a challenge.

But Rauken was observed to falter from what he affirmed before Dr. Reeves, and others, viz. to have carried the challenge, and that Ramsey could not deny it; so that Rauken was threatened not to accuse Ramsey.

Gilbert Staton deposed, that Ramsey said, he had made it come to Rey's ears, to have ended this business without troubling the king or lords.

Then doctor Duck summoned up all the proceedings, observing that formerly in the presence of the king, Ramsey had with deep protestations and oath denied the time, place, and matter which he now confesseth, and though then not examined upon oath, yet in France and other countreys, the very holding up of the hand is an oath, and so Tertullian says of the Romanes, and Ramsey confessing part, he might be guilty of the whole charge.

Doctor Eden said, that Rey was not a competent witness against Ramsey, though for the king, for he was particeps criminis; capitalis inimicus: for the first his bill made him so; for if Ramsey spake treason, so did Rey; for the second, it appeareth by Rey's violent prosecution, and if all failed, his sword must make it good; and so the defendant was not bound to answer, nor to accept the challenge unless he will, to which he is so willing.

But doctor Duck said these reasons did not currere quatuor pedibus. Some of the conspirators with Cataline were revealers of the treason, and allowed as witnesses.

Doctor Reeves concluded, that although some of the lord Rey's witnesses did not affirm what they might, it would encourage him to set a sharper edge upon his sword when he entered the lists; and that the God of right would so weaken the heart of Ramsey, that it should fail him when he took his sword in hand.

The holy-daies of Christmas drawing nigh, the court ordered, that either party might repair to sir Henry Martin, and possess him with further proofs, out of these witnesses already examined, but of no other. And so adjourned the court till Monday the ninth of January, when after some small debates, but no further matter or proofs, the business was briefly determined to be referred to the king's pleasure.

Which came to this account. That Hamilton's power with the king got all favour for Ramsey; and well rewarded in due time; and Rey having done the duty of a loyal subject, left the court and kingdom, and returned to his command in Sweden. But this story, though tedious, will enlighten us further to the truths of the Scottish affairs.

Rushworth's Account.

TOWARDS the end of this year (1630), the marquis of Hamilton arrived at the court of England, where was at that time Mackay, lord Ochiltry, a lord in Scotland, by name Stuart, and who once bore the name of the earl of Arran, when by a parliament which contracted a by-name in that kingdom, the Hamiltons were attainted of treason, but afterwards both blood, honour, and estate were restored to them. This lord had no kindness for the marquess of Hamilton, but nourished a discourse, which Ramsey let fall to the lord Rea when they were beyond seas; and prevailed so far with lord Weston, then lord high treasurer of England, as to impart the business to the king, being a treason of an high nature (if true) to this effect; that he raised this new army, with design, when he was at the head of them, to set himself up as king of Scotland. Much credit was given to this design by the lord Weston lord high treasurer, who endeavoured to persuade the king not to permit the marquess to come near his sacred person, and in no kind to have the privilege to lie in his majesty's bed-chamber, lest his majesties life were hazarded thereby.

The lord Weston pressed this home unto the king, but his majesty kept his thoughts private to himself; and having a great affection to Hamilton, as soon as he came into his presence, embraced him with great kindness, and discovered to him what he was accused of, but said, I do not believe it; and that the world may know I have a confidence in your loyalty, you shall lie in my bed-chamber this night. But the marquess beseeched his majesty to excuse him, till he had received a trial, and was cleared of the treason he was accused of; but the king would receive no denial, yet told him he would put the business into a way of examination; but afterwards when the examination was taken, it was found that the one affirmed the accusation to be true, and the other as positively denied it, and that there appeared not then any concurrent proof of the same.

A report of these examinations was afterwards made to the king's majesty, who was graciously pleased to refer the whole matter to a trial before the lord high constable, and earl marshal, in the court of honour, of which the reader will have a full account towards the end of the next year in its proper time and place. In the mean time, the king caused Rea and Ramsey to be secured in order to that trial: so the marquess proceeded in making provisions for the imbarquing of his army, and ordering those forces in Scotland to be in readiness to be shipped, to come to the place of rendezvous when they received orders.

A memorial made by Mr. Justice Whitlock in his life-time concerning the lord Rea's discovery of the marquis of Hamilton's conspiracy.

PRESENTLY after my return from this circuit, myself and the rest of the judges of the King's Bench were sent for by the lord-keeper to London, to advise with him about the affairs of his majesty. We came thither on Monday, 22 August, except the chief justice, who was sick. The matter consulted of, was to give our opinion concerning the conference had in Germany between certain Scottish gentlemen, about the making the marquis of Hamilton the head of a party against the king and his kingdoms of England and Scotland.

The lord Rea, a Scottish baron, did impeach Ramsey and Meldrum for moving him to this conspiracy: they denied it punctually, and no witness could be produced. Ramsey, a soldier, offered to clear himself by combat, that he was innocent; and the appellant accepted of his offer. The king was desirous it should be put upon a duel; and we were consulted with, 1st What the offence was? 2dly Where the trial might be?

We all with the lord keeper were of the opinion, 1st, That it was an high and horrible treason, if that in the examinations were found true. 2dly, That the trial might be by an appeal of treason, upon which the combat might be joined: but the king must make a constable durante bene placito, for the marshal could not take the appeal without him: that it must be after the manner of the civil law, and we were not to meddle in it. Likewise we were of opinion that this proceeding before the constable and marshal was, as it was before the statute of the 35th H. 8. cap. 2. and that statute devised a way how to try these foreign treasons in England, but did not take away the other. We were also of opinion that the statute of 1 Mar. cap. 10. did not take it away nor intend it; and that a conviction in this appeal was no corruption of blood or forfeiture at the common law. See Doughtie's case in Coke's Commentaries, fol. 75, sect. Escauge.

IN order to a commission under the great seal, dated the 24th of November, [1631] there began a notable trial, before Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England; and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry, earl marshal of England, in the court of Chivalry, judicially sitting in the Painted-Chamber at Westminster; together with other honourable persons, namely Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, lord chamberlain of the king's household; Edward earl of Dorset, lord chamberlain of the queen's household; James earl of Carlisle; Edmund earl of Mulgrave; William earl of Morton; William earl of Strathborne; Edward vicount Wimbleton; Thomas vicount Wentworth; Henry vicount Faulkland; and sir Henry Martin, judge of the high court of Admiralty; all of counsel with the court; Gilbert Dethick being register. And first William Seager, king of arms, presented to the lord constable of England letters patents of the tenor following.

CAROLUS Dei gratia Angliæ, Scotiæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ, rex, fidei defensor, &c. predilecto & per-quam fideli consanguineo & consiliario nostro Roberto comiti Lindsey summo camerario Angliæ salutem. In cujus rei testimonium has literas nostras fieri fecimus patentes. Teste me ipso apud Westm. vicesimo quarto die Novemb. anno regni nostri septimo.

Per ipsum regem.

Which letters patents being read by the register of the court, Donald lord Rea, the plaintiff, and David Ramsey, gentleman of the king's privy-chamber, defendant, made their personal appearance. Then the lord marshal spake in defence of the court of Chivalry, and the manner of proceeding therein, according to the law and custom of arms, shewing;

That it was legal and agreeable to right and justice, as any judicial process in any other court of this realm; especially when the nature of the cause required it. And that in these latter ages this kind of trial hath not bin frequently used, but that was to be attributed to the pious and peaceable government of the state, under our most happy and prudent king, and his most illustrious predecessors, the kings and queens of England, and the obedience and fidelity of the people of England; both which are to be ascribed to the favour of Almighty God, conferring this blessing upon our nation above all the nations round about us.

The lord marshal further shewed; 'that it was an error in many, to apprehend, that as soon as an appeal is brought into this court, it was presently to be decided by duel; when as dueling was the ultimate trial in defect of all others. And even then it was in the arbitrament of the court, whether a duel shall be granted or denied.'

The earl marshal's speech being ended, Arthur Duck, doctor of the civil law, made a speech concerning the antiquity, jurisdiction, and necessity of the court of Chivalry, held by the lord high constable, with the earl marshal, especially in cases of treason, where the truth can no otherwise be discovered.

Then Rea and Ramsay were called into the inner court, and the one stood on the right hand, and the other on the left of the lord constable, and earl marshal.

The lord Rea presented his appeal in writing; and his petition formerly exhibited to the king, was read in these words.

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble petition of Donald lord Rea.

Most humbly sheweth,

THAT whereas he having heard sundry speeches fall from Mr. David Ramsay, importing plots and practices against your royal crown and realms, did, according to his duty and allegiance, reveal the same to your majesty; the truth whereof he is ready to maintain with the hazard of his life, and dearest blood, if he be thereunto required. Now so it is (may it please your sacred majesty) that your petitioner being informed (by his counsel) that these trials, by duel, or single combat, are utimur remedium; and that a man may not appeal to this kind of divine judgment, but where all possibility of discovery by ordinary trials fail, and cannot be had. And whereas your suppliant, at such time as he disclosed all the practices which he heard from the said Ramsay, and did withal discover what he heard likewise from Robert Meldrum; against whom also one captain James Borthwick hath been examined, and the examination of Meldrum taken thereupon. And your suppliant conceiving that if Meldrum be guilty, the said Mr. Ramsay cannot be innocent, your suppliant therefore, not out of any inclination to decline the combat (as God who knoweth his heart can witness with him) but only out of his sincere desire to have the truth discovered, in a case so highly concerning your majesty's safety, honour and government, most humbly prayeth, that you would be graciously pleased, that Meldrum may be first proceeded against according to law; and if upon his tryal, the conspiracy affirmed by your petitioner do not fully appear, he shall then with all alacrity (as in a case which otherwise cannot be cleared) justify his assertions to be most true: either as a defendant against the said Ramsay, who demanded the combat of him before your majesty, or as a challenger if the court of Chivalry shall so award; and shall be bound in all duty ever to pray for your majesty's long life and happy reign.'

The petition being read, the lord constable, with the counsel of the other nobles, declared his majesty's pleasure, that this cause should be tried in this court, and gave the appeal to be read as followeth:

IN the name of God, Amen. Before you, most illustrious and right honourable lords, Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry, marshal of England, or your lieutenants in this court-martial: I Donald lord Rea do accuse and challenge thee David Ramsay in the month of May or of June in the year of our Lord 1630, and in the sixth year of the reign of our lord Charles, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, being then alone in my ship within or near the port of Elfinore, in the kingdom of Swedenland, in the upper part or deck of the said ship, when thou hadst this discourse or the like, and spakest these or the like words to me in English, viz. You told me many abuses in the court of England, and that there was nothing to be looked for but desolation and change of religion, and therefore you had retired your self thence, since no honest man could live there, and with many such discourses you laboured to possess me: to which my answer was, the Lord mend those evils, and no remedy but patience. By God, Donald, said you, (I will use your own phrase) we must help God to amend it. You told me you had brought as much gold with you as would maintain you at the rate of six pounds a day for three years, and you assured me before that time would expire, God would raise up some men to defend his church, and liberate honest men from slavery. I desired if you could tell if the marquess of Hamilton would come over. You said he would the morrow or next day. After I asked you what content my lord marquess had at home. You said, none. I asked you what religion my lord marquess was. You said, a good protestant, and before it be long he would let the world see his design was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God, and that he should have an army so well provided with brave men, and all warlike provision, that he should not need to be afraid with whom he encountered. I asked you what advantage was it to us to make a free passage for the gospel in Germany, if we lost it at home. You said there were many honest men in our land, speaking of Swedenland; adding, if we had once an army over, what would you think if we should take a start to settle them also, for ere it be long you will hear our country will go together by th' ears. So closing that night's discourse; he says at last, some such thing perhaps is intended, but I will not tell you more, for my master's secrets are dear to me. The third night after, in an island, you told me, that Alex. Hamilton and sir James Hamilton were to go for England, and you for Holland; and in the mean while pretended your self willing to do me service in England. I told you I had a promise of the reversion of Orkney from the king my master; if the marquess would mediate with his majesty for it, he would do me a great kindness, and I said, it were good for my lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. You moreover asked me, if there were good harbours in Orkney, or in my land, or in any part that might be fortified. I said, yes. You said, by God, it was to be thought upon; and you desired leave to think upon it that night, and on the morrow you and Alexander Hamilton did desire me to write a general letter to the marquess, with trust to the bearer Alexander Hamilton, concerning Orkney, lest letters should miscarry, with great assurance of true friendship from your master, if I would continue constant in resolution, and so I gave you my letter.

Afterwards in March last past, you came to me from the Hague in the Low-Countries to Amsterdam, where you stayed with me eight days, and delivered me a letter from the marquess, only of compliment and thanks; and you told me all went right with the marquess, that he had gotten from his majesty 10000*l.* in England, and the wine customs of Scotland for sixteen years, which the marquess would sell, and all things went on without any demur or obstacle, and the only stay was for want of arms, ammunition, and especially powder, and desired me to put in hard with the Swedish ambassador, which I did; and you told me, that the marquess had writ to you, that if the arms and other provisions were obtained, they should be sent to England, and not to Scotland; at which you did marvel, because his lordship had changed his resolution, being all the other provisions were sent to Scotland. Also you told me, that my lord had sent over a man to receive them, as I desired. I told you the letter, which Mr. Lindsey brought me, desired the arms to be sent to England. You said, though the arms were had, yet you would not send them till you had further order from the marquess, and you desired me to haste to you the answer thereof. In the end you told me you had evil news to tell me, that the marquess's lady was brought to bed of a child.

Some few days after, in March or April last past, at Delf in the Low-Countries, I told you that I had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, desiring some ships for the marquess. You said the marquess and I must beware of that, for then they will think that we mean to take their land from them with their own ships. I asked you, where our forces should meet. You answered me, on the sea. I asked you, where we should land. You said in some part of your old master the king of Denmark's country. You asked further, what think you if we should plunder some nook of his land, and thereafter go where we please; for we think he will be the only man that will be most against us. I answered, I am content; for he rests in him more than you all. I asked if my lord was to raise any men in England. You said, one regiment. I asked you if they would be true to us? You said that there were English that my lord was as much assured of as of any Scots. I asked, where we should make these meet. You said at Harwich or Yarmouth. I asked if they were fortified. You said, that no parts of all those coasts in England or Scotland could hold us from landing. I told you that I feared Mr. Meldrum was an evil secretary. You asked me wherein. I said, that Meldrum had told me many things, and that I thought he had told it to others. You said Mr. Meldrum knew nothing thereof when you came from England, tho' he might well suspect, and that he spake once to you to that time, as if all were ours, and that you had great patience to hold your hands off him although he was your cousin. I told you, that I was not a souldier of fortune; but had bread at home, and might live without hazarding my self in the fortunes of war; yet notwithstanding that I would hazard my life and fortune with the marquess, only that I would know the business. You answered, you would tell me no more of your master's secrets; but that you would write a letter with me to the marquess, and when I came there, the marquess would infuse in me that which you would not; withal you desired me not to tell the marquess what had passed betwixt you and me, whereby the marquess should have all the thanks to himself; adding that he was very close, and that he would discover himself to them that he knew would hazard with him. That my brother-in-law Seaforth knew all, and that the marquess trusted him much. I asked you what was done in my business of Orkney. You told me, nothing till my coming, and said, it might be I should have it better cheap than to pay the duty of it; and you told me England had made a peace with Spain, very prejudicial to Holland; and that Spain and France were both striving who should first drink up England, but you hoped we should prevent them both. Besides, you told me the lack of powder was the greatest let. As for arms we might get help thereof in every house, and that we had reasonable provision thereof already; and that my lord had written to you that he had 90 pieces of cannon great and small already provided. I desired you to go in person and speak to the Swedish ambassador for the powder, and to advertise me in the Brill of his answer, that so I might assure the marquess what he might expect; and you did send a letter by one of your own men to the Brill, to shew me that you were with the ambassador, and hoped to have that which we spake of. You asked my advice whether it was best to cross the seas once, or to go on bravely. I answered, delays were not good, which you did condescend unto, or you used words and speeches to that effect.

But if thou the said David Ramsay shall deny the premises, or say thou hadst not the same discourse, or to the same effect with me, at the foresaid times and places; I the foresaid Donald lord Rea say and affirm, that thou David Ramsay art a false traitor, and lyest falsely. And in case the premises cannot otherwise be found out by the sentence of this court, proffer my self ready, by the help of God, to prove and justify justify this my accusation and appeal, by my body upon thy body, according to the laws and customs of weapons in a duel, to be performed in the presence of our lord the king, &c.

Which challenge being publicly recited, the said Donald lord Rea, the party challenging, threw his glove in the court, of a red or brown colour, for a pawn or pledge, in presence of the aforesaid lord constable, and Thomas lord marshal, in confirmation of all contained in the bill and challenge.

Then the said David Ramsey answered, in his own person, and said, 'that the said bill and appeal was and is false, and that the said Donald lord Rea, the appellant or challenger, did lie falsely, and that he was ready to justify and prove this in duel, according to the laws and customs of arms, and of this court, by his body upon the body of the said Donald lord Rea, as it should seem good to the court.'

And thereupon in confirmation and justification of the premises, he threw his glove in the court, of a white colour, for his pawn, or pledge, in presence of the lord constable, and earl marshal aforesaid; which gloves respectively Richard St. George, otherwise Clarenceux, king of arms, took up and delivered into the hands of the said lord constable with due reverence; and the said lord constable, together with the earl marshal, committed them to the custody of the aforesaid register of the court. Then the said lord marshal arrested, as well the said lord Rea the challenger, as the aforesaid David Ramsey esq; the defendant. And the said Donald lord Rea produced sir Robert Gordon, sir Pierce Crosby, sir Walter Crosby, and sir William Forbes knights and baronets, and William Innis esq; for his sureties, who obliged themselves all, and every of them, & divisim & conjunctim, to our lord the king, for the said lord Rea, body for body, that the said lord Rea should duly prosecute this aforesaid challenge to the final and last determination of the same; and that in the mean time the said lord Rea should keep the peace of our lord the king, against all and every of his lieges, and especially against the aforesaid David Ramsey esquire.

And the said David Ramsey produced for his sureties, the right honourable James earl of Abercorne, and Robert earl of Roxborough. Then the earl marshal aforesaid released Donald lord Rea the challenger, and the aforesaid David Ramsey defendant, from the aforesaid arrest, and at their request respectively delivered their bonds of suretieships to be cancelled.

After this there was read in the court, the lord Rea's petition to the king, for divers noblemen and others to be of his counsel in this cause; whose names he presented in a schedule annexed, as they are here recorded.

To the king's most excellent majesty,

The humble petition of Donald lord Rea.

Humbly beseeching your royal majesty in this cause of appeal against David Ramsey in the court of Chivalry, to grant unto the said petitioner, that he may have the parties, whose names are in the schedule hereunto annexed, to be of his counsel in the said court. And he shall daily pray for your majesty's long life and happy reign over us.

George earl of Lyncey, lord Gordon.

Miles vicount Mayo.

Thosbald baron of Brillis.

Maurice Roch, son and heir of the vicount Fennoy.

Donnough Mac Churty, son and heir of the vicount Muskery.

Sir Robert Gordon.

Sir Pierce Crosby.

Sir Walter Crosby.

Sir William Forbes.

Donnough O Conno Sligo.

James Hay esq; of his majesty's body.

William Innis esquire.

Dr. River. Dr. Duck.

Mr. Selden, } of the Inner Temple.

Mr. Littleton,

Upon which his majesty issued out the following order.

It is his majesty's pleasure, that only these should serve, both for his friends to advise him, and his counsel to plead for him.

Ramsley's defence.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you most illustrious and right honourable Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surrey, marshal of England, or your deputies in your court marshal; I David Ramsey esq; defendant, say and affirm, that all and every the things contained in the said pretended appeal and accusation, were and are false, and suggested and proposed against me maliciously, and against truth, excepting what follows at the time and place under-written, I had the under-written discourse with thee, or to the same effect, and no other, viz.

I David Ramsey being with thee Donald lord Rea, in the month of May or June, as it is in the said bill mentioned, and in the ship there also mentioned, being in or near the port there mentioned, thou desiredst that I would tell thee, if the marquess of Hamilton would come over; and I answered he would. And you asking me of what religion the lord marquess was, I said, a good protestant, and before it be long, he would let the world see his design was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God. And then asking me whether he would come over with an army, I said, yes, with an army of brave men, and all warlike provision, that he cared not with whom he encountered. Which passages, upon often and better recollecting of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And you the said Donald lord Rea, having then under your command two regiments of souldiers in service of the king of Sweden, and then and there of thine own accord saying to me, thou wouldst get leave of the said king to join your said two regiments with the said lord marquess his forces, and serve the said king in the wars under the lord marquess, I kindly accepted that motion of yours, and desired to confirm it in you; and I told you, that Alexander Hamilton and sir James Hamilton were to go for England; and you told me you had a promise of the reversion of Orkney from the king your master, if the marquess would mediate with your master for it; and I and Alexander Hamilton did desire you to write a general letter to the marquess, with trust to the bearer Alexander Hamilton concerning Orkney; and assured you of the said marquess his friendship, if you would continue constant in your resolution, in joining your regiments with the lord marquess, when he should come over, and you gave a letter accordingly. Afterwards in March last, I being then at the Hague in imploiment for providing furniture for the said marquess his companies, which were to go over into the king of Sweden's service, came to you from the Hague to Amsterdam, being earnestly invited thereunto by letters from you; where I staid with you eight days, and delivered to you a letter from the marquess only of complement and thanks for your offer, to join your regiment under the marquess his command. And I told you all went right with the marquess, and that I heard he had gotten from his majesty 10000*l.* in England, and the wine customs in Scotland for sixteen years, which he would sell; and all things for his coming over with his forces went on without any demur or obstacle; and the only stay was, for want of arms and ammunition, especially powder, and desired you to put in hard for that with the Swedish ambassador, which you did after the premises. And in March or April last, in Delf in the Low-Countries, you told me, you had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, to desire some ships for the marquess. And you said further, that the king of Sweden said, he had no ships to spare of his own, but he would write to our king for some for him; and that he the said king of Sweden would allow 40000 rix-dollars for the entertainment of the said ships to be always in readiness upon the motions of his army. You also asked me, if my lord marquess was to raise any men in England. I answered, I heard he was to raise three regiments in England, and three in Scotland. You asked me where these forces should meet. I answered, on the sea. You asked where they should land. I answered, I was doubtful where, because the rendezvous was to be appointed by the king of Sweden. You said further, that you was not a souldier of fortune, that you had bread at home, and might live without hazarding your self in the fortunes of war; yet that you would hazard your life and fortune with the marquess. I answered, I knew no more of the marquess his designs, than I had then told you, but that I would write to the marquess to commend to him your forward affection to his service, or to that purpose. I told you, that since my being in Holland, I did perceive the Hollanders did conceive, that England had made a peace with Spain very prejudicial to Holland; and that divers of them had said so in my hearing: which passages concerning the said peace, upon often and better recollection of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And I also told you, that the lack of powder was the greatest stay of the marquess his coming over; and you desired me to speak my self to the Swedish ambassador for the powder, and to advertise you of his answer, that you might assure the said lord marquess what he might expect; and I did send one of my men to the Brill, called John Thompson, to shew you I was with the ambassador, and hope to have what we spoke of.

But whereas thou the said Donald lord Rea in thy said pretended accusation or appeal dost affirm, that I said other words to thee, than such as are here set down in this my defence: I the aforesaid David Ramsey say and affirm, that thou liest falsely, and art a false calumniator, and oughtest to be punished with the punishment of a false traitor; and I offer my self ready to prove and justify, by the help of God, this my defence and exception, by my body upon thy body, according to the law and custom of arms in a duel, to be performed in the presence of our lord the king. And I humbly and instantly desire, that a day and place may be assigned for the said duel, &c.

Then was read in court the petition of David Ramsey to the king, beseeching his majesty to assign him the person, whose name was written in the schedule annexed, to be of counsel with him in this cause. The name written in the schedule was Mr. Dr. Eden. The witnesses in this cause were commanded to make their personal appearance in the court, and were there examined; and divers letters written, as well from marquess Hamilton as from Ramsey to the lord Rea, were then produced.

Mr. Ramsey had bin released from imprisonment in the Tower upon bail, and his promise to appear before the earl marshal of England, or such other persons as his majesty should appoint, at such time and place as should be assigned unto him, upon three days warning; in the mean time to keep the peace, and to confine himself to Richmond, having the liberty of three miles walk, with this acknowledgment, that in case of absenting himself from such appearance, or breaking the peace, he will be accounted guilty of the crime, for which he stood committed. And for the performance of this engagement, the earls of Abercorne and Roxborough entered into a bond of four thousand pounds to the king.

A while after Ramsey entered in the court a protestation of the tenor following.

Whereas in obedience to his majesty's commands, and in conformity to this honourable court, I have heretofore, contrary to such intentions as seemed to me most reasonable, procured some personages to stand engaged for my personal appearance in this court, concerning this pretended cause; and have, in obedience and conformity as aforesaid, used the counsel of Dr. Eden, assigned unto me for that purpose by his majesty, as defendant in the said cause: and

whereas

whereas at my first appearance, upon sight of my lord Rea's bill, I accepted of the trial by combat, and ever since avoided and waved all courses usually proposed by defendants to avoid the combat, which at this present I am ready to entertain; and whereas since from the premises, and the lord Rea's pretences of proving new matters, the final decree in this cause, to my great prejudice in my other occasions, hath bin from time to time put off, and nothing as I conceive, under favour of this honourable court, proved against me, either to convince me of any matter objected against me, or to urge me by the law of arms to submit my self to trial by combat, if I had a desire to decline it: I do here again once more, and that most instantly, desire a certain day and place to be assigned and decreed for the combat between the said lord Rea and me, for the trial of the matter in issue between us in this honourable court; and I do with all humbleness desire of this honourable court, that after all these delays used on the lord Rea's behalf, I may now betake my self to my said first intentions; and therefore I do protest, that so much as in me lieth, I do now disingage, and do desire this honourable court for ever after this time, to hold for disengaged those honourable personages that are bound for my personal appearance; and I do humbly desire to know what his majesty's further pleasure is concerning me, since I came hither upon his majesty's command by letters, and am here ready to satisfy my loyalty as his faithful servant, with the hazard of my life.

And so instantly desiring and urging to be released of his obligation, and that his sureties might be likewise released, he was remanded to the Tower of London, and his sureties were released, and the bonds were rendered to them.

At another sitting, when Dr. Dusk moved divers things in behalf of the lord Rea, declaring, that with due reverence he submitted to the court in all things; the earl marshal made answer, that the lord Rea had governed himself in the whole process of the cause with much prudence and moderation, and wished that Ramsey had used the like moderation in his defence. And he further said, that now it seems necessary to lay open the series of the whole business: and so continuing his speech, he shewed that our sovereign lord the king, so soon as he had knowledge of the crime objected, did use all diligence to find out the truth, and called the parties before him; and the lord Rea constantly affirmed the truth of these things, and offered to justify the same with the hazard of his blood and life; and Mr. Ramsey on the other part with the like constancy denied the accusation, and said, he would prove it false against the lord Rea by duel, if it seemed good unto his majesty; and that the king observing the confidence of the parties, and the defect of other proofs, and the parties free choice of duel, consulted about the way of a public duel by the authority of this court, and took care to be informed of the proceedings and customs thereof. That it was certain, that this court was the only publick judicature, to which the cognizance of treasons committed beyond sea appertained before the time of Henry the 8th; and that the statute of 26th and 35th years of that king, concerning another manner of proceeding therein, was not derogatory to the authority of this court, but only superadded another way of trial. That all private duels were accounted and are unlawful; but public duels, decreed by the authority of this court, were always granted to be lawful in cases of treason, when for the safety of the king and state the truth would not otherwise appear. That his majesty therefore consented to the requests of these parties, that they should fight a duel for the discovery of the truth in this behalf; and therefore he constituted and confirmed this court under the great seal of England. That the lord constable, and he the earl marshal, according to the king's letters patents, together with those noble persons that were of counsel with the court, had heard with patience whatsoever was alledged on either side; and that there were three ways of determining things of this nature in this court used by our ancestors.

First, to absolve the accused; which in this case, the nature, quality, and circumstances of the fact and crime objected being considered, cannot be.

Secondly, to condemn the accused, when the truth of the crime objected evidently appeareth by witnesses, or any other way; which in this case hath not been, nor seemeth possible to be, when out of the accusation it self, it appeareth, that the words were spoken secretly, and not before witnesses.

Thirdly, by way of publick duel, to the decreeing whereof the lord constable and himself, with the assent of those honourable persons of counsel with the court, did intend to proceed.

Then the lord constable together with the earl marshal demanded of the parties, whether they had any thing more to speak or propound in this cause. They severally answered they had nothing more. The forenamed lords asked the lord Rea, whether he would finally acquiesce in his forementioned bill of appeal. Whereunto he answered he would therein acquiesce. Then they asked Ramsey, whether he would acquiesce in his answer to the bill of appeal. Whereunto he also answered that he would therein acquiesce. After this, the register read in court the lord Rea's bill of appeal, and Ramsey's defence in the presence of the parties. Presently the lord Rea sealed his bill with his seal at arms, and subscribed his name with his own hand. After the same manner Mr. Ramsey sealed and subscribed his answer.

Then the lord constable taking the appeal in his hands, and folding it up, put it into the glove, which the lord Rea had cast forth in the court for a pawn in this behalf; and held the bill and glove in his right hand, and in his left hand the answer and glove or pawn of David Ramsey; and then joyning the bill and answer, and the gloves, and folding them together, he, with the earl marshal, adjudged a duel between the parties under this form of words.

In the name of God the Father the Son and the Holy-Ghost, the Holy and most Blessed Trinity, who is one, and the only God and Judge of battels; we, as his viceregents under the most excellent prince in Christ our lord and king, by whom we are deputed to this, do admit you the aforesaid Donald lord Rea, the party challenging, and you the aforesaid David Ramsey, the defendant, to a duel, upon every accusation contained in this bill and the answer to the same; and we assign unto you the twelfth day of the month of April next following, between sun and sun, in the fields called Tuttle-Fields, in or near Westminster, in the presence of our lord the king, to do and perform your parts to your utmost power respectively.

And we will and enjoyn you the aforesaid lord Rea the challenger, to be in the aforesaid field, and within the list there, between seven and nine of the clock in the forenoon of the aforesaid day. And we enjoyn you the aforesaid David Ramsey the defendant, to be in the fields in the aforesaid list between nine and eleven of the clock in the forenoon of the said day, upon peril attending you respectively in that behalf.

Which decree and final sentence pronounced, the lord Rea craving pardon of the court, spake to this effect. First, he gave thanks to the lord constable, the earl marshal, and the rest of the lords, that they had with so much patience and justice heard and examined this cause, and for the justice therein exercised, especially for the sentence already given. Then he protested before Almighty God and that court, that he had revealed nothing against David Ramsey, or any other, for malice, or hatred, or hope of reward, either gain, or honour, but only out of his faithfulness to our lord the king, and for the safety of his flourishing kingdoms, knowing that nothing is more pernicious to kingdoms and commonwealths than intestine wars. He professed that if he himself had not revealed the premises, but some other acquainted with the treason had first discovered it, he without all doubt had deserved the death of a traitor. And whereas it might be said, that he by revealing it had hazarded his own life: to this he answered, that he was unworthy of all honour, yea of life it self, that was not ready to lay down, much more to hazard his own life for the safety of king and kingdom. And whereas he might seem in the process of this cause to have declined a duel; he desired to be understood that whatsoever was done in that behalf, he did in hope and expectation, that the treason, which was communicated to many, might be some way brought to light; for he did neither distrust his own cause, nor fear the person of his adversary, nor any other in so just a cause, only in this he grieved, that an adversary, equal to him in birth, degree, and nobility, was not offered. And whereas many wondered that he would hazard his life for revealing words, whereof he was doubtful, whether they would amount to treason or not; he said, he knew much more concerning the treason, than what was contained in this bill, which, by the interposing of authority, was for just causes yet to be suppressed.

As for the duel now decreed, he professed, that he embraced the sentence with all cheerfulness, and desired no further delay of the combat, than that in the mean time he might provide himself with such necessities for this duel as became his stock and kindred, and the combatant and champion of so great a king. That he had no private hatred to the person of David Ramsey, but was now to encounter him, being by the court declared his publick enemy. And so having prayed to God for his majesty's safety, and happy government, and imploring the favour of the court, he made an end of speaking.

After this the court assigned to both parties a day, whereon to make such propositions as they would think fit.

Then the lord Rea desired, that the crimes and words, by him objected in his bill against David Ramsey, might be declared treasonable, and that Ramsey were guilty of treason, if he uttered those words: which the court with an unanimous consent did declare so, and adjudge.

Ramsey moved, that a shorter time, and some day within the 12th of April, might be assigned for the duel, saying that he would soon compel the lord Rea to confess the falsehood of the crime objected, if he would meet him in place convenient.

The lord marshal answered, that the day was determined; and further intimated to both parties that they were to be attached and kept in safe custody, if they gave not sufficient caution for their appearing at the day and place appointed, and in the mean while for keeping the peace. For the performance whereof on his part the lord Rea produced sureties, namely sir Pierce Crosby, sir William Forbes, sir Walter Crosby, knights and baronets, and William Jones, esq; who bound themselves to the king body for body.

Then Mr. Ramsey being asked, whether he would bring forth sureties, answered, that he was ready in the word and honour of a gentleman, to oblige himself to whatsoever in that regard should be by the court enjoined; but as for sureties that he had none, or at least desired none; that it was troublesome for him to engage noble persons, who had in other respects interposed in this behalf. Whereupon the lord Rea's advocate desired, that Ramsey be committed to the Tower till the day appointed for the combat.

Then Robert earl of Roxborough publicly offered, and said that himself and James earl of Abercorne were ready to put in caution for Ramsey, if the court would admit them; and Walter earl of Balclough made the same offer; and the court admitted them, (although the lord Rea's advocate alledged many things to the contrary) and they became bound body for body. Whereupon Ramsey was released from his imprisonment in the Tower.

The lord constable and earl marshal admonished both parties to keep within the bounds assigned them, to wit, that the lord Rea should not go westward beyond Charing-Cross, nor Mr. Ramsey beyond Whitehall eastward. These bounds they might not pass without the special licence of the court, or some just and reasonable cause.

The weapons, which the court assigned to the combatants, were a spear, a long sword, a short sword, and a dagger; each of them with a point.

Then the lord Rea presented these protestations to the court.

First, he did humbly desire of the right honourable judges the lord constable, constable and earl marshal, that his arms and weapons might be assigned him for to aid himself therewith against his adversary in the day and place to him assigned, and also in any other day and place, if any should be assigned him; and that he might have no weapon of advantage, and that he might be received into the lifts or field with those arms as shall be assigned him, and armed in what sort he should please; and that he might have with him all other things needful and accustomed by right to aid himself at need against his adversary, although they be not expressly written; and desired that his adversary should have no other weapon, nor of other size than those, that he the said lord Rea should have; and if the said adversary should bring into the lift any other weapons, or of other size than the court should assign him, that such weapon should be taken from him, and that he be allowed no other.

It seemed reasonable to the court, that he should be received into the lifts armed as is fit: and as for the weapons, was to have a spear, a long sword, a short sword and a dagger, each with a point, as above said, and for the rest the court would do reason, according to the custom and law of arms.

Item, the said challenger did pray, that his counsel might be received into the lifts or field with him, for to counsel him what should be needful, and that he might have a chirurgeon with his ointments and instruments to serve and aid him when need required; and he did pray, that his counsel might remain with him, until the words lesser les armes were cried.

The court willeth, that he shall have sufficient counsel, a chirurgeon with his ointments and instruments within the said lifts, as appertaineth, until the words lesser les armes be pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have, within the said lifts or fields, a seat or pavilion, or other coverture to rest himself; that he might have bread, wine, or other drink, iron-nails, hammer, file, scissars, bodkin, needle and thread, armorer and tailor with their instruments, and other necessities to aid and serve him in and about his armour, weapons, apparel and furniture, as need required.

The court willed, that he have a seat and such coverture as he shall please, without fixing any thing in the ground, bread, wine, and other necessities, in such cases requisite, till the words lesser les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have liberty to make trial of his arms and weapons within the field, to put them off, and to put them on, and change them at his pleasure; to nail, fasten, or loose his arms and apparel, and other things needful; to eat and drink, and to do all other his necessities.

The court granted, until the words lesser les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that after he did once come into the field and lifts, that his adversary should not be permitted to make him stay and attend too long, under pain of being convict.

To this the court returned answer, the court will do you reason.

Item, he did pray, that if it should happen, either by the delay of his adversary, or any other impediment, that he should not be able to prove his intent upon his adversary in the day assigned him, between sun and sun, that then he might have further time and day allowed and assigned him for the proof thereof on his said adversary.

To this the court answered, the court in this case will do as anciently hath been used according to the custom and law at arms.

Item, he did pray, that the field and lifts might be well and safely guarded for him until the end of the battel, and as well in the night as in the day, until that with the aid of God he should make good, and prove his intent upon his adversary.

It was answered, the court will do herein as is right.

Item, he did humbly pray, that if God should so dispose, as that he died in the prosecution of this his rightful appeal in this behalf, that then his heirs, without any impeachment or hinderance, might take his body and give it Christian burial, in such place as he shall appoint by his last will and testament.

It was answered, this must be at the king's pleasure.

Item, he did pray, that notwithstanding that the custom of arms will, that he should bear into the field certain things necessary for him, that these, or some of these things, may be brought by others in case of him, and that they might be saved and carried back for him, if in case God should please to give him the victory, as he may of his special goodness and mercy.

Hereupon this order was made by the court;

The court willeth, that you do herein according to the custom of arms used in like cases before this time.

Item, he did desire, that the same day when with God's help he did intend to prove his intent upon his adversary, he might have all other things necessary for him, and accustomed by right and law of arms, although they were not expressed in these his protestations.

To this it was answered, the court herein will do that which shall seem reasonable unto them.

Item, he did pray, that these his protestations, nor the copy of them, might be delivered nor shewed to his adversary, nor to any of his counsel, or other person, whereby his said adversary might have knowledge thereof: further praying, and desiring, that these his protestations and demands might be graciously granted unto him, by those honourable lords, as the right and law of arms did require.

It was answered, the court would herein do that which should be reason.

Item, he did pray, that it might be lawful for him to go or ride into Tuttle-Fields, in or near Westminster, at his pleasure, and so often as he should think fit, to view the ground which should be assigned him for the proving of his intent, and for such other ends as should be most for his advantage for the proving of his intent upon his adversary.

To this the court answered, it seemeth reasonable unto the court, that at convenient times, which should be signified and expressed under the hands of the lord constable and earl marshal, what should be lawful for him to do as was desired.

Item, he did humbly pray, that since by the law and custom of arms, and of the honourable court, the defendant is never to be allowed counsel, nor to have any assistants, nor to have any petitions of favour granted, except in due time he shall have desired, or shall have protested that he would desire them; and that in this case his adversary publicly hath protested against the having of counsel, and all other aids and assistants in this court, as by the acts of the court appeareth; he humbly prayeth, that he might not have any counsel, nor aids, nor assistants assigned unto him in this behalf; and that no petitions or protestations (if he shall make any) might be granted unto him; and in this he humbly desired the justice of that honourable court.

Answer was made, the court would do herein upon consideration, as to the custom and law of arms appertained.

The dimensions of the weapons were as followeth.

A long sword, four foot and a half in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Short sword, a yard and four inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Pike, fifteen foot in length, head and all.

Dagger, nineteen inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth an inch.

The weapons were not to exceed this proportion; but the parties might abate of this length and breadth if they thought fit.

These protestations and petitions were accepted and registered.

Afterwards Mr. Ramsey presented a petition to the lord high constable, and to the earl marshal.

Ramsey's petition.

To the right honourable the lord high constable and the lord marshal of England;

The humble petition of Mr. David Ramsey, gent. of his majesty's privy-chamber in ordinary.

Shewing,

THAT in regard there can be no president shewed forth by authentic record, whereby the choice of arms was ever heretofore permitted or granted to the challenger, or refused to the defender, suitable to the custom and law of all Christian nations; as likewise in regard the challenger himself, as I suppose, being ashamed of his protestations and demand for defensive armour, has in good company denied the same, and ascribed it to your lordships imposing; he therefore according to the said law of nations, and custom of the kingdom, doth humbly intreat, that there be no other arms allowed for the trial, than such as he hath bin already suitor for, (viz.) rapier and dagger, as being in the number of such as your lordships were pleased to nominate, which are the most common in all gentlemen's opinions, and that are carried by all and every man that is acquainted with the management of them.

Lastly, intreating, that if there chanced to be found any want or mistake in the formality of this, that your lordships will be pleased to pass over the same, and attribute it to the absence of the lawyer allowed by your lordships, having now no other counsel than the justice and equity of his demand. And as in duty bound, he shall never be wanting, either in action or speech, to shew his gratitude for these your lordships so just and noble favours.

To the foregoing petition, this following answer was returned decimo Aprilis 1632.

The first part concerning my lord Rea, the lords having called for William Balfour, (the witness vouched by Mr. Ramsey) and heard him, but could not prove what was alledged.

The second part, concerning the election of arms, the lords thought it was not fit to be granted, the custom of this court being otherwise, and other arms being already assigned by the court.

On the 10th of April Rea and Ramsey appeared again before the court, sitting in the Council Chamber at Whitehall; at which time the lord high constable and the earl marshal signified to the parties, that it was the king's pleasure, for certain just and urgent causes, to prorogue the day of combat, from the 18th of April, to the 17th of May; and they prorogued the same accordingly; and required Rea and Ramsey to appear in Tuttle-Fields, upon the day last assigned, at the hours appointed in the former day: for the performance whereof, both the challenger and the defender produced their several sureties, and the cautions and sureties for the former day were by the court remitted.

The lord Rea desired to know the pleasure of the court, whether he might use defensive arms; and in case he might, whether according to his own discretion, or as the court shall regulate.

The judges of the court answered, that the offensive weapons and their dimensions were assigned by the court already; but both parties might use defensive weapons at their own discretion.

May the 12th the court reassembled, and the parties were called, and answered to their names.

Then the constable, together with the marshal, declared, that upon hearing and examination of this cause, they had not found David Ramsey guilty of treason, nor was the treason intimated made appear by the lord Rea, though he had so long time attempted it; yet they found that he had seditiously committed many contempts against his majesty, the reformation mation whereof his majesty reserved to himself; and therefore the court decreed, that they (the said lord Rea and David Ramsey) should both be committed to the Tower of London, till by sureties to be approved by his majesty, they gave in sufficient caution, that neither in their own person, nor by any in their families, nor by their procurement or assent, they would attempt any thing one against the other, and that so long, till it seemed good to his majesty to set them at liberty; and so they were both arrested by order of the lord constable and marshal, and by sergeants at arms delivered over to sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower.

Then a letter was brought from his majesty by Richard St. George, king of arms, to the lord constable and marshal, by which his majesty revoked his letters patents, given to the said lords for the trial of this cause, not willing to have it decided by duel. And so there was nothing more done in it.

On the 8th of May this year, [1632] a period was put to the great trial in the court of honour before the lord high constable, and lord marshal, between Rea and Ramsay, concerning the forementioned accusation of high treason against marquis Hamilton, which begun to have a hearing in November the last year, and was now decreed by that court in this year to be determined by combat: which in regard it is a trial remarkable after the proceeding of the civil law, we have given the reader an account thereof at large. However, take his majesty's thoughts of it, as it is expressed in this letter to the marquis.

James,
Since you went I have not written to you of Mackay's business, because I neither desire to prophesie nor write half news; but now seeing (by the grace of God) what shall be the end of it, I have thought fit to be the first advertiser of it to you. I doubt not but you have heard, that (after long seeking of proofs for clearing the business as much as could be, and formalities which could not be eschewed) the combat was awarded, day set, weapons appointed: but having seen and considered all that can be said on either side, as likewise the carriage of both the men, upon mature deliberation I have resolved not to suffer them to fight. Because, first, for Mackay, he hath failed so much in his circumstantial probations, especially concerning Muschamp, upon whom he built as a chief witness, that no body now is any way satisfied with his accusations. Then for David Ramsey, though we cannot condemn him for that that is not, yet he hath so much, and so often offended by his violent tongue, that we can no ways think him innocent, though not that way guilty whereof he is accused; wherefore I have commanded the court shall be dismissed, and combat discharged, with a declaration to this purpose, that though upon want of good proof the combat was necessarily awarded, yet upon the whole matter I am fully satisfied that there was no such treason as Mackay had fancied. And for David Ramsey, though we must clear him of that treason in particular, yet not so far in the general, but that he might give occasion enough by his tongue of great accusation, if it had been rightly placed, as by his foolish presumptuous carriage did appear.

This is the substance, and so short, that it is rather a direction how to believe others, than a narration it self; one of my chief ends being that you may so know David Ramsey, that you may not have to do with such a pest as he is, suspecting he may seek to insinuate himself to you upon this occasion. Wherefore I must desire you, as you love me, to have nothing to do with him.

To conclude now; I dare say that you shall have no dishonour in this business; and for my self, I am not ashamed that herein I have shewed my self to be 1632.

London, May 8,

Your faithful friend, and loving cousin,

CHARLES R.

XXVI. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Sir DAVID FOWLIS, Sir THOMAS LAYTON, and HENRY FOWLIS, Esquire, on a Charge of opposing the King's Service, and traducing his Officers of State. Hilary, 9 Char. I. 1633.

[The following account of this case is extracted from Rushworth's Historical Collections, vol. 2. page 215. In the Appendix at the end of vol. 3. page 65. of the same work, there is an abridged account of the same case. The prosecution was apparently promoted by lord Wentworth, afterwards the famous earl of Strafford. It produced disagreeable consequences to the earl; for on the trial of his impeachment for treason, sir David Fowlis, and sir Thomas Layton, two of the defendants in this case, were material witnesses against his lordship on the second article of the impeachment; both swearing to having heard him use those emphatically threatening words to some justices of the peace, 'that the king's little finger should be heavier than the loins of the law.' See Rushworth, vol. 8. pages 149, 154.]

In the month of February in Hilary-Term, upon an information in the Star-Chamber against sir David Fowlis, sir Thomas Layton, and Henry Fowlis, esq; defendants, the cause came to a hearing.

The information being opened to the court was to this effect:

THAT whereas several commissions had issued lately out of his majesties court of Exchequer in the 6th, 7th, and 8th. year of his majesties reign, directed to the lord viscount Wentworth, and to divers other lords, knights, and gentlemen of the best and principal rank and quality in those northern parts, who were thereby authorized for the more ease of the country, to treat, commune, and compound with all and singular his highness's subjects of the city and county of York, and other northern counties therein particularly expressed, as would make fine with his majesty for their contempts in not attending his majesties coronation, to have taken the order of knighthood, as they ought to have done; and the said lord viscount Wentworth was by express letters from his majesty in that behalf specially appointed to be collector: and albeit the said sir David Fowlis had received many gracious favours both in honour and profit, as well from king James, as his now majesty, which might justly have incited and stirred him up to all dutiful and grateful thankfulness for the same; nevertheless the said sir David Fowlis most undutifully, and ingrately, did not regard the same, but harbored some secret discontentment, and ill affection in his heart; for whereas the said lord viscount Wentworth, and other his majesties commissioners, carefully and dutifully intended the due execution of his highness's said commissions, and had by virtue thereof summoned, and given notice to Ralph Eure, James Penniman, esquires, and sundry others dwelling and inhabiting near unto the said sir David Fowlis, to attend the said commissioners at the said city of York, for their compounding for their said fines of knighthood; the said sir David Fowlis most undutifully endeavoured and practised what he possibly could to oppose his majesties service therein, and to dissuade and divert persons from compounding with the said commissioners, and many times publicly declared his dislike and disaffection of, and to the said service, which was generally observed and noted throughout the country where he dwelt; which was by him so spoken of intent and purpose to cause men to forbear and refrain compounding, or resorting to the said commissioners, to make any composition for their aforesaid contempts; and thereby animated and incouraged sundry persons to stand out, and refuse to make any composition at all, who otherwise would have compounded with the said commissioners for their said fines of contempt, in not attending at his majesties coronation to take the order of knighthood, as aforesaid. And in farther prosecution of his ill affection, and to shew his dislike of the said service, and the more fully to express and manifest himself, and his desire for the hindrance thereof, he the said sir David Fowlis, at a public meeting, at the house of the said sir Thomas Layton, in the beginning of the month of July 1632, did, in divers of his conferences with gentlemen concerning the compounding with the said lord viscount, and the other commissioners for their fines and contempts of knighthood, publicly affirm and say; 'that Yorkshire gentlemen had been in time past accounted and held stout spirited men, and would have stood for their rights and liberties, and were wont to be the worthiest of all other shires in the kingdom. And that in former times all other shires did depend, and would direct all their great actions by that country. And that other counties, for the most part, followed and imitated Yorkshire: but now in these days Yorkshiremen were become degenerate, more dastardly and more cowardly than the men of other counties, wanting their wonted courage and spirit, which they formerly used to have.' Which said words and speeches the said sir David Fowlis then used and uttered purposely to dissuade and discourage persons from compounding for the said contempts and fines for knighthood, as aforesaid. And the more to encourage those that stood out, and refused to compound, the said sir David Fowlis, at the same time and place, extolled and highly commended one James Maleverer, esq; for denying and refusing to compound with the said commissioners for his fines of knighthood, and said; 'that the said James Maleverer was the wisest and worthiest man in the country; and that he was a brave spirit, and a true Yorkshireman; and that none durst shew himself stoutly for the good of the country, but the said Mr. Maleverer, and was to be honoured therefore; and did very much commend him, both there, and at other places and times, for not compounding. And the said sir David Fowlis being then told, it might perhaps prove more chargeable to the said Mr. Maleverer, for his wilful standing-out in that manner; the said sir David replied, 'that the said Mr. Maleverer had put in his plea thereunto, and would easily procure his discharge, both of the fines and issues.' And in truth he had pleaded in his majesties Exchequer an insufficient plea, and after such time as he had paid 156*l.* for issues, at last he compounded for his contempt. And farther to discourage and hinder men from compounding, the said sir David Fowlis then also alledged, that in other counties and shires they had not not advanced their *fin*es of knighthood so high, as was done by the commis- sioners in Yorkshire, saying, that there were many in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, who did utterly refuse to compound: and thereupon shewed forth a list or paper of the names of sundry persons of those two counties, that so refused to compound. And the said sir David Fowlis taking notice of Mr. Ewre's, and Mr. Pennyman's compounding with the commissioners, blamed and reproved them for so doing, saying, that they had by compounding done themselves some wrong, and that the country hereafter would be much troubled with such impositions. And the said sir David Fowlis farther, to beget and draw a general disobedience in the hearts of his highness's people, and to cause them to deny and refuse to compound for their knighthood- *fin*es with the said commissioners, and to draw a scandal upon the said lord viscount Wentworth, and to bring him into disesteem in the hearts and minds of the gentlemen of that country, publicly said and pretended, that the people of Yorkshire did adore him the said lord viscount Went- worth, and were so timorous and fearful to offend his lordship, that they would undergo any charge, rather than displease him; and that his lordship was much respected in Yorkshire, but at court he was no more respected than an ordinary man; and that as soon as his back was turned for Ireland, his place of presidentship of the council would be bestowed on another man. And the said sir David Fowlis, and the defendant Henry Fowlis did, about the beginning of July 1632, and at other times publicly, in the hearing of sundry knights and gentlemen, to the end to hinder his majesties service, and to render the said lord viscount Went- worth odious to the inhabitants of Yorkshire, and the places and countries where he was employed as a commissioner, most falsely and untruly scandalize and wrong the said lord viscount Wentworth, to have received much money of the country for *knighthood-fin*es, by vertue of the aforesaid com- mission; and that his lordship had not paid the same, either to his majesty, or the Exchequer. The contrary whereof did plainly, clearly, and evidently appear by the several tallies and constats, which were produced and shewed in open court, testifying that the lord viscount Wentworth had, a year before the speaking of those words by the said sir David, and his son, paid unto his majesties receipts for *knighthood-fin*es the sum of 24500*l.*

besides other assignments by his lordship disbursed about the said service amounting to about 700*l.* of his own money, and more than he had at that time received for his majesty. And the said sir David Fowlis and Henry Fowlis most falsely and maliciously, not only to the scandal of his majesty and his justice, but chiefly to wrong and slander the said lord viscount Wentworth, reported, gave out and affirmed in the presence of divers knights, gentlemen and others, that when the said lord viscount Wentworth was gone into Ireland, all such as had paid their *fin*es to his lordship, although they had his lordship's acquittance for the same, yet they would and should be forced to pay the same over again to his majesties use. And the defendant, Thomas Layton, caused his officer and bailiff to levy about 39*l.* issues upon the goods of one
Mr. Wivel, who formerly compounded and paid his fine for knighthood, and had his lordships acquittance for the same; and that complaint had been made to the council at York, in the absence of the said lord president, that the said sir Thomas Layton's officers or bailiffs had by his privy exacted and taken 40*s.* worth of the said Wivel's tenants goods, by colour of the said levy, for so levying of the said issues, whereby the said council conceived, that the same would much cross and oppose his majesties said service, and the exactation was meet to be punished: and therefore did award, and send the king's letter to the said sir Thomas Layton (being then high-sheriff for the county of York) for to appear, and answer an information exhibited against him, and his servants, for such their supposed exactions in that behalf, as was lawful for the said council to do; and caused the said sir Thomas Layton to be served therewith, who immediately shewed it to the said sir Da- vid Fowlis: then the said sir David Fowlis thereon took upon him in a great presence and assembly of divers knights and gentlemen of the county (himself being then one of his majesties sworn council in the said northern parts, one of the deputy lieutenants there, and a justice of peace in the North-Riding, where he then dwelt) to advise and dissuade sir Thomas Layton, to yield obedience to his majesties letter, which this court held to be a great contempt, and offence; for that he said, that he held it not fit, that the said sir Thomas Layton, being high-sheriff, should appear, and answer the said letter, before he had acquainted his majesty first therewith, and known the king's pleasure. The said sir David saying farther, (in scorn and contempt of the said court and council, whereof himself was a member, and by his oath bound to maintain and uphold the rights and liberties thereof to his uttermost) that the said court was a paper-court, and the said lord president, and council, had done more than they could justify, by sending for the said high-sheriff; and that, if he were in the sheriff's case, he would not care a dog's turd for them. And the more to draw the council into disesteem and disrespect in those parts, he the said sir David then also said, that the said council had nothing to do with a justice of peace; speaking withall comparatively, that the office of a justice was above the council at York; the one (meaning a justice of peace) was by act of parliament, the other (meaning the court at York) was made but by commission. And also the said sir David being reproved by some gentlemen there present, who much disliked his discourse, yet he answered, he cared not who heard it, nor if it were proclaimed at the Cross.

To this information sir David Fowlis made this answer; that he hath been so far from opposing the commission concerning knighthood, as that he hath, according to his power, advanced the said service; and that he did perswade James Malverer, and others to submit to the commis- sioners, and compound for their *fin*es. That he did perswade sir Thomas Layton to appear before the lord Wentworth, and the council, upon the king's letter, and denieth the words charged upon him. He confesseth he did say, that he knew not how his majesty would take it to have a high- sheriff committed, and disgraced for executing his majesties writ: and confesseth, that it appears by the information, that Mr. Wivel had made his composition for knighthood, and that he receiv'd his acquittance; nevertheless process was awarded out of the Exchequer for levying issues, amounting to 30*l.* or thereabout: whereupon this defendant did say, that if the lord Wentworth had paid in all the monies he had received, he might have done well to have taken order, that those who had paid their money to him, should be free from any trouble, and not be compelled to make double payment.

Henry Fowlis pleaded not guilty.

Sir Thomas Layton for himself saith; that a letter was served upon him from the lord president and council, he being then high-sheriff of the county, doing matters in the execution of his office; and that before he was in any contempt, he was within three days arrested by the pursi- vant attending the court, and by him carried prisoner from his own house to the said council, about thirty miles, and there remained in the custody of the said messenger, till he had answered an information there preferred against him, and interrogatories concerning the self-same matter now charged upon him; and before he was discharged, paid the said Wivel the money levied by vertue of the process, and also paid 40*s.* more, which (as was pretended) Appleby, the bailiff, exacted from the said Wivel.

During all which time of this defendants restraint, he was high-sheriff of the county of York, of all which he desireth a consideration might be had; albeit he might justly plead the dependance of the suit at York, yet he doth wave the same; and doth deny, that if the said 40*s.* were exacted by the said bailiff, over and above the 39*l.* levied upon Mr. Wivel, that the same, or any part thereof came to this defendant.

And it plainly appeared to this honourable court, by good and sufficient testimony then openly read; that all the particulars before-mentioned, wherewith sir David Fowlis stood charged by the information, were fully proved against him: whereupon the court, upon grave and deliberate consideration of all the aforesaid premises, declared; that the said sir David had many ways endeavoured and sought to oppose his majesties service, and had withall greatly and highly thereby scandalized his majesty, who had done him so many gracious favours, and affronted his service, and had unjustly tra-duced his majesties commissioners, and great officers of state, and shewed exceeding malice to the lord deputy: and the said sir David speaking these words charged upon him, to deter his majesties subjects from making payment of their *fin*es to his majesties receiver, for knighthood money: and that the court duly weighing and considering the baineousness of the said defendant's offence therein, and declaring the same worthy of severe and extraordinary punishment, ordered:

That the said sir David Fowlis, being a principal offender, shall stand, and be committed to the Fleet, there to remain during his majesties pleasure; and that he shall pay a fine of 5000*l.* to his majesties use; and shall also publicly acknowledge his great and several offences, both to his majesty, and the said lord viscount Wentworth; not only in this court, but in the court of York, and likewise at the open assizes in the same county, where this decree shall be publicly read. And farther; that the said sir David Fowlis is a person altogether unworthy of the places he holds, as one of the council of York, deputy-lieutenant, and justice of peace, who hath breathed out so much faction and disobedience. And for that he sought and endeavoured to draw disesteem and scandal upon that court, whereof he himself was a member, and upon the principal officer and member of the said court, the lord Wentworth, a noble person of singular worth and merit, and worthily employed in a matter of greatest trust and importance: the court hath therefore ordered and adjudged, that the said sir David Fowlis shall, from henceforth, be b.l.d. and made incapable to have, or execute any of the said places, and that he shall pay good damage to the said lord Went- worth, relator in this court, whom this court highly commended for vindicating his majesties honour, in such a service of so undoubted right, justly appertaining to the crown, and which hath been heretofore taken by many kings, his majesties predecessors, constantly and successively. Their lordships generally condemned the said sir David therefore, and for the base and scandalous report, that he so published against the said lord Wentworth, ordered and decreed, that the said sir David should pay 3000*l.* to the said lord Wentworth.

And touching the defendant Henry Fowlis, the court likewise thought him worthy of censure, and ordered and decreed, that he should stand committed to the Fleet, and pay 500*l.* fine to his majesties use.

And forasmuch as the council urged no proof against sir Thomas Layton, they dismissed him from any farther attendance.

XXVII. The Case of WILLIAM Earl of DEVONSHIRE, on an Information in the King's Bench in 1687, for assaulting Colonel CULPEPPER in the King's Palace.

See in Tremain's History of the Crown 190. an indictment of Thomas Culpepper for assaulting the Earl of Devonshire.

[The following statement of this remarkable case and of the arguments against the proceedings of the King's Bench is from a volume of miscellaneous pieces by the Lord Delamer, who was acquitted of a charge of high treason in the reign of James the Second, and after the revolution was created earl of Warrington. See his trial in volume 4. of this collection, p. 210. The book, from which we extract the case, was published as the works of the earl of Warrington in 1694; and though the publication appears to have been posthumous, yet there is not the least reason to suspect the authenticity of the contents, as the book was dedicated to Lord Warrington's son and heir by Mr. De la Heuse the gentleman entrusted with his education. The case in question, from the stile of it, is evidently addressed to the house of lords; but whether it was by way of speech, or how otherwise, is not explained.

After the earl of Devonshire's case we give the proceedings of the house of lords upon it.

In the article of duke of Devonshire in Collins's Peerage there are some anecdotes relative to this case, which deserve to be remembered, though they are not noticed in the account we shall lay before the reader.]

There is a short report of this case when in B.R. in MS. Rep. penes me, fol. 876. It is also shortly reported in Comber. 49. The pleadings are in Tremain's 190. & there also see an indictment against Culpepper for assaulting the Earl of Devon.

ON Sunday the 24th of April, 1687, the said earl meeting with colonel Culpepper in the drawing room in White-hall, who had formerly affronted the said earl in the said king's palace, for which he had not received any satisfaction, he spake to the said colonel to go with him into the next room, who went with him accordingly; and when they were there, the said earl required of him to go down stairs, that he might have satisfaction for the affront done him, as aforesaid; which the colonel refusing to do, the said earl struck him with his stick, as is supposed. This being made known to the king, the said earl was required by the lord chief justice Wright, by warrant, to appear before him with sureties. Accordingly April 27, he did appear, and gave bail in 30000*l.* to appear the next day at the King's Bench, himself in 10000*l.* and his four sureties in 5000*l.* a piece, who were the duke of Somerset, lord Clifford the earl of Burlington's son, lord De-la-mere, and Tho. Wharton, esq; eldest son to lord Wharton. The earl appeared accordingly next morning, and then the court told him, that his appearance was recorded, and so he had leave to depart for that time. But upon the sixth of May he appear'd there again, and being then requir'd to plead to an information of misdemeanor for striking the said colonel in the king's palace, he insisted upon his privilege, that as he was a peer of England, he could not be tried for any misdemeanor during the privilege of parliament: and it being then within time of privilege, he refused to plead. The court took time to consider of it till Monday, which was the last day of the term, and the earl then appeared, and delivered in his former plea in parchment. The judgment given by the house of lords, in the case of the earl of Arundel, 3 Car. was urged on the behalf of the earl, viz. that no lord of parliament, the parliament then sitting, or within the usual times of privilege of parliament, is to be imprison'd or restrain'd without sentence or order of the house, unless it be for treason or felony, or for refusing to give security for the peace: and also, that the like privilege was, about two years before, allow'd in the case of my lord Lovelace. The court over-rul'd the earl's plea, and requir'd him to plead to the information the first day of the next term, and to be a plea as of this term; and so he had leave to depart, but his sureties were not called, for to see if they would continue as his bail. The next term he appeared, and pleaded guilty to the information, and so the last day of the term the court did award, that he should pay a fine of 30000*l.* be committed to the King's Bench till it be paid, and to find sureties for the peace for a year.

To all which proceeding and judgment three notorious errors may be assign'd.

I. The over-ruling of the earl's plea of privilege.

II. The excessiveness of the fine.

III. The commitment till it be paid.

1. The over-ruling the earl's plea of privilege is a thing of that vast consequence, that it requires a great deal of time to comprehend it aright, and is of so great an extent, that more may be said of it than any one man can say. The judgment seems to be very unnatural, because an inferior court has taken upon it to reverse a judgment given in a superior, of which no such precedent is to be found in regular times, scarcely in the most confused and disorderly.

2. Because it is in case of privilege, which is the most tender part of every court; for if the rights and privileges of any court are made light of, the court itself will soon come to nothing, because they are as it were the most essential part of it, if not the very essence of the court; for what signifies a court, if its orders cannot be executed? It is better that a court were not, than that its privileges should not be duly observ'd, for without that it becomes a snare and mischief to the people, rather than an advantage.

3. Because by this they have set the feet above the head; for as they have by this declared themselves to be superior to the lords, so it will naturally follow, that a quarter-sessions may reverse their orders, or suspend their privileges, and a more inferior court shall supersede what the quarter sessions do.

sions does: and thus it must go on till the course of nature is inverted.

4. Because they may as well deny a lord, or over-rule any other privilege, as well as this, and so consequently, when the house of lords is not actually sitting, every peer must be beholden to the judges for every privilege that he enjoys.

5. If this judgment be according to law, then may the King's Bench try a peer for misdemeanor, at the very time when the house of lords is sitting; and consequently the house must want a member, if the King's Bench sees it good to have it so; and what a confusion would it make, and the consequence of it would be, is easily discern'd. The want of one member makes that house think itself to be lame: as was seen in the case of the earl of Arundel, 3 Car. How many petitions did the lords make, and how many messages passed to and fro, between the king and them, who would not proceed to any business till he was restored to his place in that house? For they told the king, that no lord of parliament, the parliament sitting, or within the usual times of privilege of parliament, is to be imprison'd or restrain'd without sentence or order of the house, unless it be for treason or felony, or for refusing to give security for the peace. Surely the judges did not give that judgment for want of understanding that judgment of the lords; for nothing can be more express and plain for it: for it says directly, that sitting the parliament, or within usual times of privilege, no peer shall be molest'd, unless for treason or felony, or for refusing to give security for the peace. The earl of Devonshire did all that the judges could require of him, by finding sureties for the peace, and what the judges did more, was not grounded upon that judgment of the lords, but was a manifest and presumptuous invasion and violation of the privileges of the whole peerage of England.

It is very obvious, how the peerage has been undermined ever since Hen. VII's time, what endeavours have been used to make it less and less; first, by multiplying the number of them; secondly, by raising people of mean extraction to that dignity, both which tend to render it contemptible. But nothing can make it more despicable, than that its privileges should depend upon the beck of the King's Bench: and therefore considering how groundless and without precedent it is, what they have done in the case of the said earl, it is no more than probable, that they thereby aimed at pulling down the peerage. For, what seems so likely as it does? It carries its evidence in its face, for it manifestly takes away the privilege of the peers, and till it does appear for what other end it was done, all men of sense, and that are unprejudic'd, must believe it was to pull down the peerage; for all that can be pretended, is, either to secure the peace, or to punish the offence. The earl did give security for the peace, and he did not design to shift off his trial, but that it should be in its proper season; for though it delay'd the trial, yet it brought it to the proper time, and so consequently the more legal and reasonable; but the judges must go out of the way of reason and the law, to make a breach in the privilege of the peers. It is too commonly the discourse every where, and I fear with too much reason, that the judges make very bold with the law; but it's plain by this judgment, that they have struck the privileges of the peers under their girdle. Whether it did proceed from ignorance or corruptness, will appear upon what they shall say for themselves. It is too plain from one of them it is, and either of them renders them unmeet to sit in that place.

I do remember, that the judge gave this reason for over-ruling the earl's privilege. Says he, your lordship, and all the peers, receive all your privileges from the king, and therefore it would be very unreasonable to make use of them against him: and seeing the king is concerned in this case, I am of the opinion, that the plea be over-ruled. It is said, that he has some law, and therefore it's the greater presumption in him to judge upon the lords' privileges, who is not qualified by law to sit as a judge in any case; for he is a papist, as every body says, and so consequently has not taken the oaths and so, that the law enjoins, before he take his place on the bench,

M m

But

But as to his doctrine which he laid down, since it does not properly come into this debate, I will only ask him a few questions: whether there was not a people before there was a king? whether the king begot all his people? and if people of several nations should be cast upon an island, and seeing no probability of getting thence, they agree upon certain laws and rules for the common good, and make choice of the wisest man amongst them as their king, to rule and govern them according to those laws, can it then be said, that the people received their privileges from him, or that he is not strictly bound to govern them by those laws and no other? I desire to ask this one question more: whether the king is not bound, as well by his oath as by the nature of the government, to protect and defend every subject in his just rights and properties? But allowing his doctrine as orthodox, yet his reason is admirable; for the subject is not to make a defence in any case, if the king have any title or concern in it, all corporations must deliver up their charters of course, whenever a quo warrantum is brought; and why? Because it was a grant from the king, and it would be very hard to oppose him with his own gift. Whoever holds any thing by gift from the crown, and tho' made as sure as the broad seal can make it, yet if the king think good to question it, the party must yield it up without insisting upon his right, for the reason given by the learned judge. For the same reason every peer, if denied his writ, must not demand it; nay, he must surrender his patent, and renounce his title, as far as in him lies, if the king require it: and for the same reason, when any man is called to an account for his life, he must make no defence, but submit himself to the king's mercy; for all we have is from the king, and nothing must be disputed when it is his pleasure to question it. This is indeed to make the king as absolute as any thing on earth can be, yet is withal to make him the most unjust prince that ever sat on the English throne. This sort of justice is learnt from children, whose gifts continue good no longer than the donor remains in that kind mood. Surely nothing can more reflect dishonour upon the king; for it makes him as unjust and uncertain as any thing can be, both which should not be in the temper, much less in the actions of a prince.

Another reason was given, I think, by the chief justice, or else by Mr. Justice Holloway, because it was absolutely necessary for the securing of the peace, it was urg'd so far, as if the peace could not be secured without it. Surely all this must be but gratis dictum, for my lord Devonshire, by finding foreties, had done all that the law does require for securing the peace, unless they had clapt him up a close prisoner; which they could not justify, if he tender'd foreties: and therefore, either my lord Devonshire is different from all mankind, and a different method must be made use of to secure the peace, or else this argument of theirs favours not so much of reason as of something else, that ought to be no ingredient when they give judgment in any case. And it surpasses common sense to understand, how over-ruling the lord's plea could tend to the securing of the peace. Either the security which he had given must awe him to keep the peace, or the other could not; for had he broke the peace again, and repeated it several times before he came to his trial, yet that could not affect the merits of the cause, neither could it be given in evidence at the trial, so as to alter the state of the fact; neither could the judges, by reason of it, enhance his punishment if he were found guilty, but they must look upon it as a distinct offence, and so might require the greater security for the peace, and for a longer time.

Indeed it is an effectual way to prevent a man from breaking the peace, to lay such a fine upon him as is impossible to be paid immediately, and to commit him till payment.

It is too probable, that the judges, being conscious how liable they have made themselves to be called in question for this sauvages and trampling upon the law, would debase and bring under the credit and authority of this court; because no other can take cognizance of their proceedings, so as to correct their errors and mistakes. It is only here that they can be called to an account for what they do amiss; no court can punish them but this; so that if they can once top your lordships, there is nothing they need stand in awe of, nothing to restrain them, but they may act ad libitum, not per legem; for, let this court be deprest, and they may say, of whom then need we be afraid? By what they have done already, they have sufficiently shewn to what extravagances they will proceed, when they think themselves to be out of the reach of this court.

If once the King's Bench can set it self as high as the judges have attempted by this proceeding against my lord Devonshire, then must the whole nation (your lordships not excepted) stoop to all the extravagances and monstrous judgments that every corrupt and ignorant fellow shall give, who shall chance to get up to the bench; and not only this present age shall feel and undergo the mischief, but it will be entailed upon all succeeding generations. Well then, did the judges attempt that which would bring your lordships so low, and raise their court so high, to set it above all reach or controul; especially if they did promise to themselves impunity, if not reward, which they might have expected, had it been in the reign of an arbitrary prince, who would be a great gainer by the fall of this court, because then the screen betwixt the king and people is taken away.

This is the first time, that an inferior court did take upon it to invalidate the privileges of a superior. Superior courts do sometimes set aside the orders and proceedings of inferior courts; and yet in that case they proceed with that caution, that it is never done but when there is manifest error, and the law not duly pursued and observed; but in no case was it known that they ever meddled with their privileges.

If what the judges have done is good, I cannot tell what power and jurisdiction they may not pretend to, for no bounds nor limits can be set to the King's Bench; it may assume as great a power in civil affairs as the High Commission does in ecclesiastical, in their actions not to be tied up to any rules or method, but to vary and alter them as well as the law, when occasion or humor serves. The proceedings shall be as summary, or as delatory as they think fit, and your lordships shall no more than other people be exempted from the exercise of that power.

Therefore if your lordships will not prevent the mischief from spreading it self over the whole nation, yet I hope you will take notice of the injury you have suffered in the case of my lord Devonshire, and to do your selves right.

The law has for the most part left fines to the discretion of the judges, yet it is to be such a discretion as is defined by my lord Coke, fol. 56. discretio est discernere per legem quid sit justum; not to proceed according to their own will and private affection, for talis discretio, discretionem confundit, as Spingate says, fol. 201. So that the question is not whether the judges could fine my lord Devonshire, but whether they have kept themselves within the bounds and limits which the law has set them.

It is so very evident, as not to be made a question, whether in those things which are left to the discretion of the judges, that the law has set them bounds and limits, which, as God says to the waves of the sea, hitherto shalt thou go and no farther. For either they are so restrained, or else the law does suppose them to be exempted from those frailties and passions which do attend the rest of mankind; but as they cannot be supposed to be void of passions and infirmities, no less than other men, so it cannot be imagined, that the law has left men to so wild a justice as is guided by passion and affection; for it had been so great a defect in the constitution of this government, that long before this it would have been reformed. And as it is most clear, that they are thus restrained, so those bounds and limits are no less known to them that are acquainted with the law. There are two things which have heretofore been looked upon as very good guides, 1st, what has formerly been expressly done in the like case; 2^{dly}, for want of such particular direction, then to consider that which comes the nearest to it, and so proportionably to add or abate, as the manner and circumstance of the case do require. These were thought very good and safe directions, till it was declared, and ever since has been practised in the King's Bench, that they did not regard precedents, but would make them; and for ought that I can learn or find, this of my lord Devonshire is an original.

What obscurity soever may be pretended in other cases, yet in this the law has given so positive and plain a direction, that it seems very strange, how they came to lay a fine of 30000*l.* upon my lord Devonshire.

The court of Star-Chamber was taken away, because of the unmeasurable fines which it imposed, which alone was a plain and direct prohibition for any other court to do the like, for otherwise the mischief remained; for what advantage was it to the nation, if it had not been wholly suppressed? The shifting of hands gave the people no ease in the burden that lay upon them. It was all one, whether the Star-Chamber or King's Bench did crush them by immoderate fines. But to put all out of dispute, the statute 17 Car. says expressly, that from henceforth no court, council, or place of judicature shall be erected, ordained, constituted, or appointed within this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, which shall have, use, or exercise the same, or the like jurisdiction, as is or hath been used, practised, and exercised in the said court of Star-Chamber; and this was upon very good reason, because those great fines, imposed in that court, were inconsistent with the law of England, which is a law of mercy, and concludes every fine which is left at discretion, with salvo contentamento. If the fines imposed in the Star-Chamber were an intolerable burden to the subject, and the means to introduce an arbitrary power and government, as that statute recites, the like proceeding in the King's Bench can be no less grievous, and must produce the same evil. Laws that are made upon new occasions, or sudden emergencies, the reason upon which they were made may cease, and consequently they do cease also. But laws that are grounded upon the ancient principles of the government cannot cease, because the reason of them will ever continue; and this statute of 17 Car. being such, no doubt holds good, and is now in as much force as the first moment in which it was made; and therefore this fine imposed on my lord Devonshire is in open defiance of that statute.

I think no man can altogether excuse my lord Devonshire; for my part I don't, but think it was a very inconsiderate rash act, and I believe the indiscretion of it abstracted from the fine is a very sensible trouble to him. Yet if those things were wanting which may be urged in his excuse, the offence and punishment don't seem to bear a proportion. Could not the merits of his father be laid in the balance, nor the surprise of meeting coll. Culpepper? For my lord having been abused by him, a man of so great courage and honour as my lord Devonshire, must needs feel and remember it a long time; having received no satisfaction or reparation made him for it. But if there were nothing of this in the case, could all that may be said to alleviate his offence be urged against him with a double weight, were the circumstances of the fact as foul and aggravating as the malice of his enemies could wish, yet surely a less fine might have served; for the law calls in a great many grains of mercy into every judgment, and has ever looked upon an over-rigid prosecution of the guilty to be no less tyranny than the prosecution of the not guilty, because it is summum jus, and has declared that to be summa injuria.

But besides all this, I do conceive with submission, that where the law has intrusted the judges with a power to fine, it is in a much less degree than they have done in this case.

First, because the law is very cautious whom and with what it does intrust. It reposes a great confidence in the king, yet in some cases his acts are not regarded by it; as the king can do no ministerial act, a commitment per speciale mandatum dom. regis, is a void commitment. Where there lies an action in case of wrong done to the party, the acts of the king in those cases, according to the old law phrase, are to be held for none.

Secondly, because liberty is so precious in the eye of the law, it is of so tender a regard, that it has reserved the whole dispose thereof to its own immediate direction, and left no part of it to the discretion of the judges; and what the law will not suffer to be done directly, it does forbid that it be done indirectly, or by a side-wind; and so consequently the judges cannot impose a greater fine than what the party may be capable of paying immediately into court. But if the judges may commit the party to prison till the fine be paid, and withal set so great a fine as is impossible for the party to pay into court, then it will depend upon the judges pleasure, whether he shall ever have his liberty; because the fine may be such as he shall never be able to pay; and thus every man's liberty is wrested out of the dispose of the law, and is stuck under the yirds of the judges.

Thirdly, because the nation has an interest in the person of every particular subject; for every man, either one way or other, is useful and serviceable in his generation. But by these intolerable fines the nation will frequently lose a member, and the person that is fined shall not only be disabled from doing his part in the commonwealth, but also he and his family will become a burden to the land; especially if he be a man of no great estate, for the excessive charge that attends a confinement will quickly consume all that he has, and then he and his family must live upon charity. And thus the poor man will be doubly punished, first, to wear out his days in perpetual imprisonment; and secondly, to see himself and family brought to a morsel of bread.

Fourthly, because in all great cases, and such as require a grievous punishment, the law has in certain awarded the judgment; and next to life and corruption of blood, a severer punishment cannot be imposed, than to be fined more than a man can pay, and to lye in prison till he does: but if some great cases did happen, which could not be foreseen, it was always usual with the judges, when any such case came before them, to adjourn it to the parliament, which had been needless, if they could have punished at the rate that our judges have of late done.

Fifthly, because where-ever the law has set down a fine, either by way of punishment or caution, it seldom exceeds 2000*l.* Nay, even in that tender place of liberty, if a judge shall not relieve with an habeas corpus, but let the person languish in prison, yet the third offence is but 2000*l.* penalty; and I suppose that that is but inconsiderable, in comparison of what any of the judges are worth, yet it being taken as a punishment, is by the law looked upon as a great sum.

Sixthly, because the law of En-land being a law of mercy, and very careful to prevent violence and oppression, and to that end having for almost every offence appointed its particular punishment, it cannot be supposed to have left so great a power in the judges, as they have exerted in this case. True it is, some things are left to their discretion; because it was not possible to foresee every particular case that might happen. Yet they are things of the least size that are so intrusted to their judgment; for (as was said before) matters of any considerable moment were still referred to the parliament; as also the review of what the judges should do in those lesser matters, which were left to their discretion.

As these proceedings are a great wrong to the subject, so are they no less a disadvantage to the king; because they will make his government look very rigid and severe, and gives it a grim fierce countenance, which, tho' I don't say that it will make the people rebel, yet I am apt to believe that it will set them upon their guard. It's fair and gentle usage, that prevails upon reasonable and free-born men. It's an easie government that will bow the hearts of the people of England; for, says the statute of Wil. and Mar. the estate of a king standeth more assured by the love of his subjects than in fear of laws; so that the king will be on the losing hand by these proceedings, because it spoils the complexion of his government.

And the king will yet be a farther sufferer, for if 30000*l.* be the price of a blow, it will make White-hall very empty; for he that goes thither must approach it with fear and trembling, because he does not know but he shall be ruined before he comes thence; for though a man arm himself with all the resolution he can, yet it cannot be proof against the contrivance of those that intend to do him a mischief. Especially if he is not upon very good terms at court, there will never want those who will endeavour to draw him into the snare, hoping to merit by it; and though perhaps they mistake their aim; yet however, revenge, that is so sweet, will be greatly encouraged to provoke him, because he cannot hope to reek his malice so plentifully as this way, because if his attempt succeed, the other is ruined: nay, if he do not strike, but only defend himself, yet if the judges don't like the complexion of the man, they will call the fox's ears horns, and lay all the blame on his back, and pronounce him more guilty that looks over the hedge, than he that steals the horse.

Since the business of my lord Devonshire happened, I have heard him blam'd as the author of his own misfortune, and that he drew the mischief upon himself; and the reason given, was, because he ought not to have gone to court; for, said they, he knew there were many there who wished him ill, and therefore sooner or later he would meet with an affront, and if he once fell into their hands, he must expect no quarter, because coll. Culpepper, who, without any provocation of my lord's part, had so unnecessarily fallen upon him, and had by drawing blood upon my lord forfeited his hand; yet not only that, but all the rest of the judgment was pardoned; and therefore as well that as this are looked upon as businesses that were laid. But in saying this, I only tell your lordships what is said without doors, and I don't speak it as my opinion; but setting the tattle without doors aside, I do conceive, that can never be a just judgment which injures the king as well as the party that is punished.

But the true nature of my lord Devonshire's offence has not yet been thoroughly considered. The law does in all cases give great allowances to what is done on a sudden heat, where there does not appear any premeditation; and for this reason, when a man is indicted for murder, if upon the evidence there does not appear malice prepense either expressed or implied, the party accused shall have his clergy. And for the same reason, though it be death to maim or disfigure another, yet if it be done on a sudden heat, the party shall not dye for it; for in these and the like cases the law thinks him to be more blame worthy who gave the provocation, than he that was so provoked; because it was not the effect of an evil mind, but of passion; et actus non sit reus nisi mens sit rea. If therefore it be true which I have heard, that the king promised my lord Devonshire, that coll. Culpepper should never come to Whitehall, it will then follow, that my lord Devonshire's striking coll. Culpepper was the effect of passion, and not of intention, because he could not expect to meet him where he did. If so, I conceive with submission, that the punishment and offence don't in any measure bear proportion.

But I am persuaded, that the judges were resolved upon what they have done before they heard the cause, in case my lord was found guilty; and the rather, because my lord chief justice was haranguing the offence beforehand; for when my lord Devonshire appeared 6. May, he told him, that to strike in the king's palace was little less, or next door to pulling the king out of his throne. Indeed, on the last day of the term he did explain them thus; that the time and circumstances might be such, as it would be little less than the assaulting the king in his throne. But several have told me, who heard him, and they say, the first words of time and circumstances were not mentioned by him 6. May; and in particular, a noble lord of this house is one from whom I had my information; and if it were so, those words favour too much of a prejudging the cause.

There is no doubt, but in case of a fine set, the court may commit the party, in case of obstinacy, for not paying the fine into court. Yet this is to be taken cum grano salis; for if the fine be immoderate, or else he has not the money then ready, but either offers security to pay it, or else prays for some time, and in the interim to stand upon his recognizance; in either of these cases, to commit for not paying the fine into court is not justifiable.

First, because it is to punish for not doing an impossibility, for lex non cogit ad impossibilia.

Secondly, it is not justifiable, because if the fine be paid, the law is as much satisfied if it be paid five years hence, as if it be paid then immediately into court; for the law does not suppose, that the most wealthy man does carry so much money about him.

Thirdly, it is very unreasonable, because it does in a great part disable the person to pay the fine; for if he be a man, that manages his own affairs, his writings, that are necessary to make the security, may be so disposed of, that it will be difficult to come at them. Besides, there being a necessity upon him to have the money, those of whom he is to have it will be very apt to hold him to harder terms; for the world is so unnatural and brutish, that one man is but too prone to make his advantages upon the misfortunes and necessities of another; and that proverb, homo homini lupus, is in no case more true than in the business of money.

Proceedings in the House of Lords on the Case of the earl of Devonshire after the Revolution, extracted from the Journals of the Lords.

22 April 1689.

THE earl of Huntingdon reported from the committee of privileges the case of the earl of Devon, which was read, viz.

Ordered to report, that their lordships are of opinion, that the proceedings against the earl of Devon, in the court of King's Bench, in Easter-Term, in the third year of king James the second, upon an information for an assault upon Mr. Culpepper, wherein his lordship's plea of privilege of parliament was over-ruled, and he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and thereupon committed to the King's Bench in execution, was a great violation of the privileges of the peers of this realm. Their lordships are likewise of opinion, that those judges, who sat in the said court, when the said judgments were given, and the said commitment made, should be required to attend at the bar of this house to answer for the great offence which they committed thereby.

Hereupon the house made these orders following, Ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the clerk of the Crown-Office in the King's Bench do bring into this house the records of that office, wherein the proceedings in the court of King's Bench against the earl of Devon are entered in Easter-Term, 3 Jacobi secundi, upon an information for an assault upon Mr. Culpepper, on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

To Sir Samuel Astry, clerk of the crown in the King's Bench, his deputy and deputies, and every of them.

Upon report from the committee of privileges concerning the prosecution of the earl of Devon, upon an information in the King's Bench, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the keeper of the prison of Newgate be and is hereby required to bring in safe custody to the bar of this house Sir Robert Wright now in his custody, on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

To the keeper of Newgate, his deputy and deputies, and every of them.

Upon report from the committee for privileges concerning the prosecution of the earl of Devon upon an information in the King's Bench, it is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that Sir Richard Holloway be and is hereby required to attend this house on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and hereof he may not fail.

Ordered that Mr. Patt and Mr. Bradbury do attend this house on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

Ordered that Mr. justice Powell do attend this house on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

3 May 1689.

Ordered that the keeper of the prison of Newgate be, and is hereby required to bring in safe custody, to the bar of this house, Sir Robert Wright now in his custody, on Monday the 6th day of May instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

To the keeper of Newgate, his deputy and deputies, and every of them.

Ordered that Mr. Patt and Mr. Bradbury do attend this house on Monday next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

This

principal. This interest was accordingly paid till 1683; but it then became in arrear, and continued so at the revolution; and the suits, which were commenced to enforce the payment of these arrears, are the subject of the following case.

The first proceeding was a petition to the barons of the Exchequer for payment of the arrears of the annuities granted; to which petition the attorney-general demurred. Two points were made, first whether the grant out of the Excise was good, and secondly whether a petition to the barons of the Exchequer was a proper remedy. On the first point the whole court agreed, that in general the king could alienate the revenues of the crown; but Mr. baron Lechmere differed from the other barons, by thinking, that this particular revenue of the Excise was an exception to the general rule. But all agreed, that the petition was a proper remedy. Judgment was therefore given for the petition, by directing payment to the complainants at the receipt of the Exchequer.

A writ of error was brought on this judgment by the attorney-general in the Exchequer-Chamber. There all the judges, who argued, held the grant out of the Excise good. A majority of them, including lord chief justice Holt, also approved of the remedy by petition. But lord chief justice Treby was of opinion, that the barons of the Exchequer were not authorized to make order for payments on the receipt of the Exchequer, and therefore that the remedy by petition to the barons was inapplicable. In this opinion he was seconded by lord keeper Somers, who distinguished himself by one of the most elaborate arguments ever delivered in Westminster-Hall. A doubt then arose, whether the lord chancellor and lord high treasurer were at liberty to give judgment according to their own opinion, in opposition to that of a majority of the attendant judges; in other words, whether the judges called by the lord treasurer and lord keeper were to be considered as mere assistants to them without voices. The opinion of the judges being taken on this point, seven against three held, that the lord treasurer and lord chancellor were not concluded by the opinions of the judges; and therefore that the lord keeper in the case in question, there being then no lord treasurer, might give judgment according to his own opinion. Lord Somers, concurring in this idea, reversed the judgment of the court of Exchequer. But the case was afterwards carried by error into parliament, and there the lords reversed the judgment of the Exchequer-Chamber, and affirmed that of the Exchequer. However, notwithstanding this final decision in favour of the bankers and their creditors, it appears by a subsequent statute, that they were to receive only one half of their debt; the 12 & 13 W. 3. after appropriating certain sums out of the hereditary Excise for public uses, providing, that, in lieu of the annuities granted to the bankers and all arrears, the hereditary Excise should after the 26th of December, 1701. be charged with annual sums equal to an interest of three per cent. till redeemed by payment of one moiety of the principal sums. 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 12, & 15. Why such a composition of the debt, after prevailing in the suits commenced to enforce payment, should be accepted, we are unable to account. — It is observable, that part of one article of the impeachment of lord Somers is founded on his reversing the judgment of the Exchequer without calling the barons before him; the 31 E. 3. c. 12. particularly requiring, that they should be called to give the reasons of their judgment. The same article crimines him for saying, that particular subjects might have rights and interests without any remedy for the recovery, unless by petition to the person of the king; a position to which effect occurs in the course of his argument in this case of the bankers. See 3 Chandl. Deb. Comm.

There are several printed reports of this case. Mr. Freeman, afterwards lord chancellor of Ireland, gives a short note of the arguments in the Exchequer. The fifth volume of Modern Reports contains a full state of the pleadings in the case, and of the arguments of the chief justices Holt and Treby in the Exchequer-Chamber. Holt's argument is also in Skinner's Reports, 601. Lord Somers's argument in the Exchequer-Chamber was printed separately in 1733. All these, except the report by Skinner, we shall introduce in their respective order. We shall then add a copy of the printed case which was delivered to the lords by the plaintiff on error in parliament; for which we are obliged to the kind communication of Mr. Serjeant Hill, whose valuable treasure of parliamentary cases is well known to gentlemen of the law. It was out of our power to give the printed case on the part of the crown; it not being in the collection, to which we were permitted to have recourse, though esteemed by far the most perfect of any existing. The whole of what we shall offer to the reader will conclude with the judgment in parliament, and the protest entered upon the occasion, both taken from the journals of the Lords.

About a year after the determination of the case of the bankers by the Lords, a controversy arose about the disposition of the forfeited estates in Ireland, in the course of which the question as to the right of the king to alienate the hereditary estates and revenues of the crown was considered. Dr. Davenant commenced the dispute, by publishing his discourse on grants and resumptions. The object of the discourse was to evince, that the grants made by king William of the Irish forfeitures should be resumed, and that those forfeitures should be applied towards payment of the public debts. In enforcing this advice, though the author argues for the propriety of a parliamentary resumption of royal grants, when they are exorbitant, and the necessities of the state are urgent, yet he rather insinuates a doubt of than directly denies the ancient right of the crown to alienate its hereditary estates. But then he cites a record of parliament of the 11 Hen. 4. which never occurred in the argument of the case of the bankers, and which he construes to be a statutory prohibition of future alienations, except when the king shall be out of debt; adding, that the force of this law had been evaded by clauses of non obstante, but that these were condemned by the bill of rights. The great ability and learning conspicuous in this performance rendered it of too much importance, not only to those interested in the grants of the Irish forfeitures, but to all deriving under regal alienations of a modern date, to suffer the impressions from it to remain unresisted. The subject was accordingly undertaken by a writer, whose name is not transmitted to us, but whose work proved him very adequate to the contest. The piece we allude to was published early in 1701, by the title of "Jus Regium, or the King's Right to grant Forfeitures, and other Revenues of the Crown, &c." It is reprinted in the 2d volume of the collection of State-Tracts for the reign of king William. The author lays a great stress on the concurrence of all the judges in the case of the Bankers, that in general the king could alienate; and gives a short history of the several opinions advanced in the progress of that case. He also denies the application of the record of 11 Hen. 4. cited by Davenant. The result of the controversy was unfavourable to the grantees of the Irish forfeitures: for by an English act of parliament, such lands as had been forfeited since the revolution were vested in trustees to be sold for the public benefit; all previous grants of the forfeitures were made void; and the rents, directed to be reserved to the crown on sale by the trustees, were appointed to be for support of the government of Ireland, and to be unalienable. 11 and 12 W. 3. c. 2. Such readers, as are disposed to inform themselves further on the contest in parliament about these Irish forfeitures, may consult Mr. Harris's life of king William, and the Journals of the English parliament for the years 1699 and 1700, with the 2d volume of State-Tracts during the reign of king William. The "Bankers case by Mr. Turnour," which we have referred to in the preceding part of this note, was published by that gentleman soon after the first stoppage of payment to the bankers, in order to expose the injustice and illegality of that measure, and to persuade the re-opening of the Exchequer. It is written with great ability and learning, and well deserves to be read by every lawyer. The author animadverts on those, who advised shutting the Exchequer with great severity; but at the same time observes great decorum towards the king personally.

Extract from Freeman's Reports, vol. 1. p. 331.

Upon the petition of Hornbee, Williamson, Smith, and Stone. Hill. 1691.
In Scaccario.

KING Charles the second, having taken up great sums of money of the petitioners, or their testators, who were bankers, in consideration thereof granted to them and their heirs several annuities, chargeable upon the hereditary revenue of excise, given to the king by the statute of 12 Car. 2. cap. 24.

The said annuity being for many years arrear, the petitioners exhibited their petition to the barons of the Exchequer for the said arrears; whereupon two questions did arise, 1st question. Whether this grant of the king were good to bind the successor, so as to continue a charge upon the said revenue?

2d question. Whether the petitioners had taken their proper remedies for recovery of the said arrears?

Ad primam Quæst', Atkins, Turton and Powell, were of opinion, that the grant was good to charge the successor.

It was admitted, that the king could not grant away his kingdom, nor put it in vassalage or subjection to the pope or any other, as is said in 4 Inst. 13, 14, 83, 202, 357.

That the king may grant an annuity or charge his revenue. 2 Cro. 78. 5 Co. 56. 7 Co. 21. 9 H. 7. 12. 2 Inst. 58. Vaugh. 161. 4 Inst. 29. Dyer 92. 9 H. 6. 12. Bro. Quinz. 7. 2 Rol. 176, 198. 19 H. 6. 6. 4 Inst. 126. 6 Co. 73. 1 Rol. 98. Moor 833. 2 H. 7. 8. Reg. Orig. 193. 266. 307. 21 Ed. 3. 47.

That it must be said of whose hands to be received, or else it is not good, for he cannot charge his person. Nat. Brev. 52. Dy. 92. Hob. 148.

Obj. That it was out of an incorporeal inheritance.

Ans. It is good notwithstanding. 1 Inst. 47.

Obj. It was pretended, that the king was deceived in his grant, as to the consideration.

Ans. If the king be deceived in a consideration real executory, it will void the grant, but not in a consideration personal executed. Plow. 454. Lane 3. 76. 108. 10 Co. 47. 6 Co. 56. 1 Co. 43. Talv. 1. 11 Co. 90. Hob. 230.

That there have been acts of resumption shews that the grants were good, because they could not be avoided but by act of parliament.

Obj. This is but an authority, and so void by death, because revocable.

Ans. It is an interest; and a licence coupled with an interest is irrevocable. Dy. 176. Nat. Brev. 223. Plow. 457. Palm. Rep. 171. 172. Dyer 49.

Ad secundam Quæst', all the barons held, that the remedy by petition to the barons was a proper remedy, and that it was in their power to relieve the petitioners, and give judgment for them. Kielw. 178. Stamf. 73. 75.

A petition of right lies as well for a personal as a real due, Plow. 377. 434. Wroth's case, and Nevil's case, 9 H. 6. 13. 1 roll. 539. Lane 38. 4 Inst. 415.

Baron Lechmere e contra: that the king could not alien or charge this revenue. Fleta 183. 3. 549. Selden, Grotius, Pryn. 9, 390. Vindication of the liberties of Engl. Freeman.

1. It was given in lieu of a revenue unalienable but by act of parliament, viz. the court of Wards.

2. If the king may alien part, he may alien all, and then the subjects will bear the burden, for they must grant new supplies to support the crown.

3. This charge was granted by the king at a time when he had no occasion for money, but merely for to gratify his prodigality, being at a time when the parliament rained golden showers into his lap.

It appears by the answer Edward the third gave the pope, that it is not in the power of the king to alien his kingdoms, &c. 4 Inst. 13. 14.

4. The very words of the act of parliament shew, that it was the intent of the parliament it should continue in the crown unalienable, there being the words for ever hereafter to remain to the king and his successors several times in the act.

5. A power in the act, to enable the king to lett to farm for three years, shews the parliament never intended he should have power to alien as he pleased.

6. Where the parliament intended a power in the king to alien, it is otherwise worded; as in the acts that give monasteries to the crown it is said, to do therewith as he pleased.

But judgment was given for the petitioners, upon the opinion of the other three judges.

Charles the second, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas since the time of our happy restoration, we have been involved in great and foreign wars, as well for the safety of our government, as for the vindication of the rights and privileges of our subjects; in the prosecution whereof, we have been constrained for some years past, contrary to our inclination, to postpone the payment of the monies due from us to several goldsmiths and others, upon tallies struck, and orders registred on, and payable out of several branches of our revenue, and otherwise: and although the present posture of our affairs cannot reasonably spare so great a sum as must be applied to the satisfaction of those debts, yet considering the great difficulties which very many of our loving subjects, who put their monies into the hands of those goldsmiths and others, from whom we received it, do at present lie under, almost to their utter ruin for want of their said monies; we have rather chose, out of our princely care and compassion towards our people, to suffer in our own affairs, than that our loving subjects should want so seasonable relief: and having seriously considered of the way and means to effect this our present purpose, we could not find any more effectual and less prejudicial to us in the present posture of our revenue, than by granting to each of them the said goldsmiths and others, to whom we are indebted as aforesaid respectively, and to his and their heirs and assigns, an annual sum or payment answerable, in value yearly to the interest of their respective debts, at the rate of six pounds per cent. per annum, for all such monies as are due unto them: the consideration whereof induced us to command our high treasurer of England, to cause all the accompts of the said goldsmiths to be stated and made up by Richard Aldworth, esq; one of our auditors, to the first day of January, 1676, which having been accordingly cast up and settled, it appears thereby that there is due and owing by us unto our trusty and well-beloved subject, Joseph Hornby of London, goldsmith, the sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred forty-eight pounds, five shillings and sixpence. In satisfaction whereof, according to our intent in these presents expressed, we have resolved to grant unto him the sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-three pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence per annum, out of that part of our revenue of Excise which was granted to us, our heirs and successors for ever, by an act of parliament made in the twelfth year of our reign, intituled, an act for taking away the court of Wards and Liveries and tenures in capite, and by knights service and purveyance, and for settling a revenue upon his majesty in lieu thereof. Know ye therefore, that we, for the consideration aforesaid, and in satisfaction or lieu of the said debt, or sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred forty-eight pounds five shillings and sixpence, by us owing to the said Joseph Hornby, and of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant unto the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, one annual or yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, of lawful money of England, to be yearly had, received and taken by the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns for ever, out of the rents, revenues, profits and perquisites, emoluments and payments reserved, arising, accruing or coming, or that hereafter shall or may be reserved, arise, accrue or become due or payable to us, our heirs and successors, out of, for or by reason of the duty of Excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, within our kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, by virtue of the said act of parliament; the said sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence per annum, to be paid quarterly at the four most usual feasts in the year, that is to say, at the feast of the As-nunciation of the blessed virgin Mary, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Michael the archangel, and the birth of our lord God, commonly called Christmas, by even and equal portions, in trust for such of the creditors of the said Joseph Hornby, as within one year next ensuing the date hereof shall, upon notice of these presents, deliver up their securities, and accept of assignments of proportionable parts of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, for satisfaction of their respective debts, according to the true intent and meaning of the covenant in that behalf herein after contained, for so much as their proportionable parts shall amount unto, and in the mean time shall not sue or prosecute the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs, executors or administrators, for such their debts: and the residue and overplus of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, to remain and be to and for the proper use and benefit of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, without any trust or account whatsoever; the first payment of the said sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, to commence from the feast of the birth of our lord God one thousand six hundred seventy and six. And we do hereby, for us, our heirs and successors, authorize, direct and appoint our high-treasurer, chancellor, under-treasurer, chamberlain and barons of our Exchequer, and the high-treasurer and commissioners of the treasury, chancellor, under-treasurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and successors that hereafter shall be, and all other officers and ministers of the said court, and of the receipt thereof, now being, or that hereafter shall be, that they and every of them, in their respective places, do from time to time, upon request of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, respectively perform all acts necessary for the constant and due payment of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, to the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, as the same shall grow due and become payable, and of every such part and parts as the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, shall grant or assign to any person or persons from time to time, according to the trust and agreement in that behalf herein contained; and as occasion shall be, levy or strike, or cause to be levied or stricken in the receipt of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and successors from time to time, tallies of pro or assignment, or other tallies, as the case may require, and as shall be desired, upon the commissioners, treasurers, receivers, collectors or farmers of the said duty and revenue for the time being, or upon such other person or persons as ought to be charged or chargeable therewith, or accountable to us, our heirs and successors for the same, who are hereby required and directed from time to time to make due payment thereof accordingly, so that the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns respectively, of all or any part or parts thereof, may certainly and duly, and on every of the said quarterly feast days aforementioned, for ever hereafter have and receive the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, hereby granted out of our said revenue, without any further or other warrant to be sued for, had or obtained from us, our heirs and successors, in that behalf, and without any accompt, imprest, or other charge to be set upon the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, or any of them, for the same. And if it shall happen at any time hereafter, that the rents, issues or profits of our said revenue shall be paid into the receipt of our Exchequer, or elsewhere, to the use of us, our heirs or successors, before the levying of such tallies, or before payment be made to the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns respectively, of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, or any part thereof, according to the true intent of these our letters patents; then and in such case our express will and pleasure is, and we do hereby of our further especial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, for us, our heirs and successors, authorize and require the high-treasurer and commissioners of the treasury, chancellor or under-treasurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and successors for the time being, and all other officers and ministers of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, that they or such of them to whom it appertains, do from time to time, as often as need shall be, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns respectively, out of such monies as shall be so paid into our Exchequer, or elsewhere, to the use of us, our heirs and successors, all such or so much of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, as shall from time to time be in arrear or unpaid after the feast days or times of payment aforesaid, or any of them, without any further or other warrant to be sued for, had or obtained in that behalf, and without any accompt, imprest, or other charge to be set upon him the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, for the same or any part thereof. And these our letters patents, or the exemplification, entry or inrollment thereof, shall be unto the high-treasurer, commissioners of the treasury, chancellor and under-treasurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and successors, and all other officers and ministers of the said Exchequer, and to the commissioners, treasurer, receivers, collectors, farmers, and all other officers and ministers of our said revenue of excise, a good and sufficient warrant and discharge for all and whatsoever they or any of them respectively shall do or cause to be done in or about the premises, pursuant to our will and pleasure herein before declared. And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, grant, direct and appoint, that all such tallies of pro or assignment, or other tallies as shall be hereafter levied or struck upon our said revenue of excise at the instance and desire of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns respectively, for or towards the satisfaction or securing the payment of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, or any part thereof, shall be well and truly paid and satisfied out of the said revenue quarterly, and every quarter as aforesaid, and shall be preferable and preferred before any other quarterly payments out of the same, by virtue or colour of any warrant, order or direction whatsoever of any after-date, excepting only such yearly sums as are necessarily payable for the management of our said revenue, and except the yearly sums amounting to twelve thousand two hundred and nine pounds fifteen shillings and fourpence halfpenny or thereabouts, payable thereout unto our dearest consort the queen, as parcel of her jointure, and the yearly sum of twenty-four thousand pounds payable to our dear brother James duke of York; which said several sums, we will and do hereby direct, shall be paid and satisfied unto our said dearest consort, and to our said most dear brother, out of the said revenue, duly, constantly, and in the first place before any of the said payments, or any other payments whatsoever to be made out of the same. And our will and pleasure is, and the said Joseph Hornby, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, grant and agree, to and with us, our heirs and successors, that he the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, shall and will at any time or times, within one year next ensuing the date hereof, grant and assign proportionable part and parts of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, unto such of his creditors or others by their appointment, as will be content to deliver up their securities, and take such assignments in satisfaction of their debts, according to the trusts herein before expressed; and that he the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, shall not, nor will, during the said space of one year, make any grant or assignment of all or any part of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, unto any person or persons but such as are creditors of the said Joseph Hornby, or others by their appointment as aforesaid: and that if any difference shall at any time or times, within the space of one year and an half now next coming, arise between the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or any of them, and the said creditors, or any of them, touching the assigning or disposing of all or any part or parts of the said annuity or yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, that then the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, shall and will from time to time submit themselves, and all matters and things relating thereunto, to the comptrol of the lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of the treasury for the time being, and shall and will observe and fulfil all such order and directions as the lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of the treasury, shall from time to time make or give concerning the same. Provided always, and our further will and pleasure, intent and meaning is, and is hereby declared to be, that all assignments to be made as well before as after the said space of one year, of any part or parts of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence hereby granted, shall, within the space of thirty days next after the execution thereof, be enrolled before the auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, or the clerk of the Pells for the time being, to the end it may appear what assignments have been granted, and payments may be made thereupon according to the intent of these presents, and that every assignment not so enrolled, shall be of none effect. Provided also, that when we, our heirs or successors, shall at entire payments have actually paid the full sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred forty-eight pounds five shillings and sixpence, of lawful money of England, to the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, and to such person or persons to whom such assignment or assignments shall be made as aforesaid respectively in proportion amongst them, after the rate of one hundred pounds principal money, for each and every six pounds per ann. which they, every, or any of them respectively shall or ought to have and enjoy of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, hereby granted by virtue of these presents, or such assignment or assignments as shall be made and inrolled as aforesaid, and so after those proportions and rates for greater or lesser sums as the respective cases shall happen, and also the arrears of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, if any be; that then these presents, and the grant of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, shall cease and be void, any thing herein before contained to the contrary notwithstanding. And we do hereby of our further especial grace, certain knowledge and meer motion, for us, our heirs and successors, grant unto the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns; and our express pleasure is, that these our letters patents, and every clause, article, and sentence therein contained, whereupon any ambiguity or doubt shall or may arise, that the same shall be at all times expounded and taken most favourably and beneficially for the advantage of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns; and that these our letters patents shall be good and effectual in law, and shall be available to the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns respectively, for his and their receiving and enjoying the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, with all the arrearages thereof in manner aforesaid, notwithstanding the not reciting or not mentioning, or not truly and certainly reciting or mentioning of any act or acts of parliament, whereby the said revenue was given and granted unto us, our heirs and successors, or by what title we have received or enjoyed the same: and notwithstanding the not reciting or not mentioning in this our grant, any lease or leases, grant or grants, charge or charges, made of or upon, or out of the said revenue, or any part thereof alone on the said revenue, or on the same, and any other part or parts of our revenue of excise, or generally on our revenue, or the date or contents of such leases or grants, or of the persons to whom the same are made: and notwithstanding that no mention be herein of the direct and certain yearly and other rents and profits of the premises, or of the certain, true or direct nature of such rents and profits, or how or in what manner they arise, become due, or payable unto us, our heirs and successors: and notwithstanding the not mentioning how, and in what manner the said debts due from us to the said Joseph Hornby ariseeth particularly, or any mistake in the stating, or in the quantity or sum of the aforesaid debt due, or herein mentioned to be due by us to the said Joseph Hornby: and notwithstanding the statute of Henry the fourth, late king of England, published in the first year of his reign: and notwithstanding standing the statute of Henry the sixth, late king of England, made and published in the eighteenth year of his reign: and notwithstanding the statute of Henry the eighth, late king of England, made and published in the twenty-sixth year of his reign: and notwithstanding the statutes or acts of this present parliament, made and published in the twelfth year of our reign, whereby the said revenue was, or was mentioned or intended to be granted, settled, and confirmed unto us, our heirs and successors, or any article, clause, sentence, or restraint therein contained: and notwithstanding any defect in this our grant, or any act, statute, ordinance, proclamation, provision or restraint whatsoever made or provided, or any other act, matter, or thing whatsoever to the contrary hereof, in any wise notwithstanding. And lastly, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby of our more abundant grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, for us, and our heirs and successors, covenant and grant to and with the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, that due payment shall be made of the said yearly sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, hereby granted, and all other things hereby directed to be done on our part, shall be from time to time done and performed, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents: and that if at any time hereafter, any defect or question shall be found or made of or in the validity of this our present grant, that then upon the humble petition of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs and assigns, we, our heirs and successors, will be graciously pleased to make such further grant, assurance and confirmation of the said yearly rent or sum of one thousand three hundred fifty-two pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence, to the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, as by our attorney-general shall be approved of and advised, and by the council learned in the law, of the said Joseph Hornby, his heirs or assigns, shall be advised and desired, and with such beneficial clauses therein to be contained, as shall be thought expedient and most conducing to the performance of our will and pleasure herein before declared. In witness whereof, &c.

The argument of lord chief justice Treby.

THERE are two points in this case:

1. Whether these letters patents are valid in law, and sufficient to bind the king?

2. Whether that the remedy that these petitioners have taken be proper?

As to the first, I am of opinion, that the letters patents are valid and sufficient to bind the king.

It is objected, that the word [successors] in the statute by which this revenue is given, intends that it shall be fixed in the crown, and unalienable. To this I answer, that there are several other statutes by which lands and other revenues were given to the king by the same words that are in this statute; and yet the kings of England had always power to alien them, as appears by Berkley's case in Plowd. and by the statute of monasteries, Vaugh. 62. 2 Roll. Abr. 198. &c. So king Charles II. having an estate of inheritance in this branch of his revenue, had the same power to alien this, as he had to alien any other part of it.

It has been strongly objected, that if the king should have a power to alien all his lands and revenues, it might be of pernicious consequence to his subjects; and that then our Exchequer in England would be like the Spanish Exchequer, of which it's said that it receives taxes and revenues from the general, only to pay them out to some particular persons.

To this I answer, that this might be some reason to induce the making an act of parliament to restrain the king's power of alienation; but since here the parliament has thought fit to give the king such a power, we ought to acquiesce and submit to it.

But that, which I shall chiefly proceed on, is the judgment, which I think to be very extraordinary, and such as the barons could not give; for I do not think, that they can award the king's treasure out of the Exchequer. Then I take this judgment to be very erroneous and deficient in several particulars.

1. It leaves out the treasurer, who is the chief officer concerned in disposing the king's money.

2. The chamberlain of the Exchequer ought to have been mentioned as well as the treasurer; and so is the judgment in Neville and Wroth's case in Plowd. and also in Cotton's Records.

3. This judgment appoints tallies to be struck from time to time, and orders the method of payment of the several sums of money, which I take it the barons cannot do; for they seem to undertake to do what is proper work for an act of parliament, which only can appoint the treasurer to make payments in such an order. 9 H. 4. 28.

In the next place, I take it that this judgment cannot be amended, because these are faults in substance, and the law is very nice and curious in judgment. So if a misericordia be entered for a capitur, the judgment is erroneous. So it is if it be concessum est, instead of consideratum est, &c. Latch. 177. so is Poph. casu ultimo.

Now I come to the remedy, which I take to be the great and difficult point of the case.

And I am of opinion, that no judgment can be given upon this petition to the barons; for I do not think that the court of Exchequer has any power to dispose of the king's treasure, and therefore I cannot see how this judgment can have any effect. Indeed it's said, that the petitioner will have a writ to the officers of the Treasury, or to the treasurer himself; and if they do not obey this liberate, that then they will enforce it by action. But this they cannot do; for I hold that the treasurer may choose, upon a bare warrant, to pay in what order he thinks fit.

Then they have shewn no precedent that ever any such action was brought; though indeed my lord Coke, in his 4th Instit. 116. seems to hint at it, and so does Plow. Com. 186. and 2 H. 7. 8. 9. 10. But there the liberate always went to the subordinate officer, but never to the treasurer himself. By the treasurer, I mean the treasurer of the Exchequer, and not the lord high treasurer of England; for that great officer has long been discontinued; and when he was in being, the greatest use of him was when he had the honour to have been your lordship's colleague in this place.

So that I take it, that the treasurer may if he pleased pay these annuities to the petitioners; but whether he will do it or no, is left to his conscience and discretion; but he cannot be compelled to it but by authority of parliament.

Then this remedy is not warranted by the course of the Exchequer. If there were any such usage there, I agree it would be the law of the land; and so is Rawlin's case, 4 Rep. and Plow. 32. But there has been no such usage there; and in this point I concur with my brother Lechmere, who perhaps has the greatest experience in the court of Exchequer of any judge that ever sat there; for I think I lately heard him say, it was sixty years since he practised there.

I have reason to think, whatever Mr. Plowden says, that these liberate's were granted upon petitions to the king himself, and not to the barons. You may see abundance of them in Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria. It appears indeed in Broke, tit. Talley de Exchequer pl. 4. that upon delivery of this writ to the officer, and assents in the Exchequer, an action lay against the officer for non-payment. But that ever it could be brought against the treasurer or chamberlain, was never heard of.

But, say they, there is a clause in the patent, which empowers the treasurer, &c. to make payments, &c. and this they call a perpetual warrant.

But this makes against the petitioners: for if it is so, why do they prefer a petition to the barons of the Exchequer? If they can have their debt without a petition barely upon this patent, where there is a grant, a command, and warrant to the treasurer and officers to pay the money, (which, say they, amounts to a liberate), then it's a vain thing to sue in the Exchequer for a judgment: for it cannot be presumed, that a liberate under the seal of the Exchequer, testifies chief baron, should be of more force than a liberate under the seal of England, testifies missis. Reg. 192.

To clear this point, it's necessary to enquire into the power of the court of the Exchequer.

I do agree that they are supreme auditors, and have authority over the king's treasure; but it is in transitu, as upon the sheriff's accounts, or any other of the king's officers concerning the bringing in of the king's revenues into the Exchequer; but when the money is there, it is in its center, and the barons have nothing to do with it. They are only conduits, but not producers. 2 Inst. 197. 4 Inst. 115. And it would be of dangerous consequence for so many to have to do with the treasury, lest (as Kerou says in his book) there be too many leaks in the cistern.

I confess, the court of Exchequer does use to enrol charters in the Exchequer, and that is the foundation of the accounts, &c. and so is Plowd. But whether the barons of the Exchequer have a power to comptrol and command the treasurer is a great and arduous point. It is in effect, whether the barons shall have the power to turn out the treasurer when they please; and whether the petitions, that were formerly preferred to the king, shall be now exhibited to the barons of the Exchequer? Which matters I must own I cannot be brought to imagine, though I would think as favourably as possible in this case; for I give this opinion, not because I would, but because I must.

But I take this power in the barons, to be against the nature and institution of the court of Exchequer; for they are originally empowered by the king to get in his revenue, and 'tis for the sake of the revenue that they have any thing else to do. And all they do is to convey the king's treasure to its proper place; but they cannot dispose of it; for there is no correspondence between the barons and the officers of the treasury.

Upon reversal of attainders, we know there is no restitution of the money paid to the king; and the reason is, because the barons cannot in such case comptrol the treasury. I remember several years since, there was a solicitor, who brought the rolls of a forfeited estate in dispute into court; and they ordered the money to be put into the hands of the Remembrancer; for they said, if it was once paid into the treasury, there was no getting it out again.

The case in short is no more than this:

Suppose the king be indebted to the petitioners, and also to the army, the fleets, &c. Now who shall direct the payment of these debts, the barons, or the treasurer? Who is the best judge of the state of the kingdom, and of its necessities? So that suppose there was only 4000l. in the Exchequer, and we were threatened with a foreign invasion, how shall this money be disposed? Says the treasurer, to raise men to pay the army and our fleets, that by their assistance we may prevent the enemy from coming amongst us. No, say the barons, we must pay the bankers with this money, though at the same time we open the gates, and let in Hannibal to our utter ruin and destruction. My lord Coke, in his 4th Instit. treating of the court of the Exchequer, takes notice of the oaths taken by the treasurer, and also by the barons. In the treasurer's oath it is mentioned, that he is to keep and dispense the king's treasure safely; but in the baron's oath, there is not a word of this matter taken notice of: which to me is an argument that the treasurer is judge in point of issuing money, whether it be due and payable or not, and to whom, in what manner, and when it shall be paid, &c. And this I take to be the true reason why no action can be brought against the treasurer, because he acts as a judge, and not as a minister of the court; for he is not attendant to it, as sheriffs, bailiffs, &c. are. So I take it, "may be paid," is enough for the barons to say; but "must be paid," is only for the treasurer to say.

The nature of his office. Vide Moore 475. 11 Co. 90. 92.

Cro. El. 545. Babington's case.

Then it is treason to counterfeit the great or privy-seal, because they only have to do with the king's revenue; but it was never thought treason to counterfeit the Exchequer seal, which has nothing to do with it. Plowd. Com. 223.

In the contests heretofore between the king and people, what was meant when they complained that the king's treasure was mispent and misemployed? Not that 'twas paid away without letters patents, or taken away without the king's grant; but it was this. They blamed the treasurer, because he paid away the king's treasure to persons unworthy, to minions and favourites, though they had grants from the crown by letters patents: but yet it was left to the treasurer's discretion to have paid them or not; which he should not have done, when perhaps the public good required it.

Now I come to our authorities in our books.

I shall begin with 2 Ed. 3. 25. & 38 Aff. pl. 20. wherein it's said by the chief baron, that we shall take consufance of all matters that may turn to the king's advantage, but not a word concerning the disposal of the treasury. Vid. 19 H. 6. 62. 63. and 2 Roll. Rep. 301. are exprefs.

So in Stradling and Morgan's case, Plowd. 207. it's said, that no pleas shall be held in the Exchequer, but for the advantage of recovery of the king's debts, and bringing in his revenues; so that the Common Pleas in the Exchequer, are only founded on getting in of the king's revenue. I choose to cite Mr. Plowden, because his book is so mightily relied on the other side, I mean the case of Nevil and Wroth.

I believe it was the authority of those cases that raised all this dust, but I shall answer them by and by; and at present shall only observe, that there is not one law book that gives these cases the credit to mention them, I mean as to this point of proceeding by petition to the barons, &c.

So in the earl of Devonshire's case, 11 Rep. 92. there is no notice taken of Nevil's or Wroth's case, though there was opportunity enough to have mentioned them, if they thought they had been of any weight and authority. So 2 Roll. Abr. 160. and 180. and 183. the resolution in the earl of Devonshire's case is cited, but not a word of Nevil's or Wroth's.

In the next place, I shall mention some treatises concerning the court of Exchequer.

1. There is Gerardus Thiburtius de rebus in scaccario gestis; who sets forth the jurisdiction of the court of Exchequer, but mentions nothing of this power in the barons to comptrol the treasury. The capitalis iusticiarius Anglie had indeed a comptrol over the treasurer himself, as appears from Spelm. Gloss. 71. 331. So when Hugo de Burgo, who was the last great justiciary, was in disgrace, he was charged to render an account of the mispending of the king's revenue, which shews that he had a power over the treasurer. But ever since this great office has been discontinued, the treasurer has acted according to his own discretion.

The next book, that I shall quote, is called the Diversity of Courts. It's mentioned in my lord Coke's preface to the 10th Report; but there is nothing of this power in the barons mentioned there, neither is it taken notice of in the Mirror of Justice, c. 1. sect. 14. 4 Inst. 110. Flou. lib. 2. c. 25. Britt. 2. 6. Compt. Jurisdiction of Courts, 105. which book was printed 15 years after Mr. Plowden's, nor in a Inst. 551. nor in a Inst. where the full authority of this court is fully set forth. And I can but also observe, that Mr. Prinn, in a book which he printed on purpose to animadvert on my lord Coke, 4 Inst. does not take notice of any such power. I shall beg leave also to mention Vernon's Consideration on the Court of Exchequer, and Mr. Cambden and Mr. Tho. Smith, who were great and learned men, though their books I confess are not of authority. But if there had been any such power in the barons of the Exchequer, 'tis probable they would have taken notice of it.

Next, there are Savil's Reports, Lane's and my brother Hardress's Reports, which treat chiefly of the court of Exchequer; but yet they give not the least countenance to any such power. So in 1 Rel. Abr. 528. 539. in Lane's case, 2 Rep. 2 Rel. Rep. 294. there is not one syllable of it.

I shall conclude this point with this observation: that since there were two great powers in the barons, (as is pretended) one of bringing in money into the Exchequer, and the other of paying it out, that yet these books should be all silent as to the greatest power of paying it out, is very strange and unaccountable: which indeed does induce me to believe, that there is no such power in the barons, and that those petitioners have mentioned in their petition the only way of having their annuities; that is, as their former payments were made (viz.) by warrant from the lord treasurer.

Now I come to the objections.

1. They quote Ryly's Pla. Parl. pa. 251. 253. 257. 262. 337. 526. 529. &c. but, if I can apprehend them, those words make against the petitioners.

Then Margery Parker's case, 9 H. 6. 12. 13. was mightily insisted on; and indeed at first I thought there was something in it; but, upon a strict perusal, I find it's consistent enough with my opinion. Indeed Babington mentioned here a remedy by petition to the barons, but this was only a word slipped out; but the court gave no regard to it, and were of opinion against it, that there was no such remedy. And it's observable, that Brook in his Abridgment takes no notice of Babington's opinion, though he does of all the rest of the case.

The next thing objected is, that the barons do every term send a liberate to the officers of the treasury under the Exchequer seal, to pay money for paper, pens, and other necessities for the court of the Exchequer; the charge of which, I am told, comes to 2 or 300l. per ann.

To this I answer, that first this writ goes without any judgment at all: so that according to this, the petitioners needed not have had any judgment. But the true reason of issuing forth this writ is grounded on this. In the treasurer's commission there is this clause, that he shall pay out such sums of money as are required pro necessariis scaccarii: but of this writ they take no further notice than as a certificate, when they make up their accounts.

Now for the precedents.

The court of Exchequer is guided by multitudes of precedents, 2 Rep. Lane's case, Mo. 565. but here they have not one precedent for such a power over the king's revenue, to which the law has so great a regard; for there is nothing in the law so fenced, and so guarded, and so secured, as the king's inheritance. Where that is concerned, there must be petition de droit, an inquisition found, besides searches, &c. so careful is the law of the king's inheritance and revenue.

But now here the king must lose his freehold without trial, which his subjects shall not do, as appears by magna charta.

In the next place, I shall answer the cases which indeed give life to the present case, and are the foundation of it. First, as to Nevil's case, I observe the petitioners council do not agree in their title to it. Some say, it was grounded on a petition of right; others, that it was a monstrans de droit; and others, that it was a complaint against the officers of the treasury. But true it is, Mr. Plowden is precise and express in the point, though it seems to me to be but his own private opinion: and I must take the boldness to say, that he is mistaken, as will appear from these books, 13 H. 7. Pl. 15. 4 Ed. 4. 23. b. 1 Leo. 190. 1. And. 253. Savile 125. all which cases happened but twelve years after Nevil's, and yet are contrary to it. By the same books and the same reasons it appears, that Wright's case ought to have no more weight than Nevil's, &c.

Therefore I conclude, that this judgment given by the barons of the Exchequer is an erroneous judgment, and ought to be reversed.

Vide infra, the argument of the lord chief justice Holt, contra.

The argument of the lord chief justice Holt.

Holt. Ch. 7. In this case, here have been two points made:

1. Whether this grant be good.
2. Whether here be a proper course taken by the patentees.

There has indeed been a third point started by my brother that argued last, and that does respect the entering of the judgment.

As to the first question, I hold the grant to be good; and all, that have argued here, have concurred in the same opinion. I do confess this is the great point of the case; but so much has been said to it, that little more can be added: but I must say something to it, though I cannot but repeat.

I hold, that king Charles II. might charge this branch of his revenue, and my reason for my opinion is but short.

It is, because the king was seised of an estate in fee of this revenue; for to such an estate a power of alienation is incident. Lit. Sect. 360. And I take it to be the intent and the express words of the act, that the king should have a right and liberty of alienating and charging this estate.

It is no objection, that this revenue was given to the king under a trust; for notwithstanding that, he might alien it. So several kings of England have founded corporations of charitable uses, and yet these persons incorporated might, notwithstanding such trust, alien their estates; so may a dean and chapter theirs; so may a bishop with the consent of dean and chapter; so a parson, with the consent of the patron and ordinary, might have aliened the land of which he was seised in the right of his church: but the king has no body required to consent to his alienations. To say, that he may alien by the consent of the estates of the realm, is as much as to say, he cannot alien without an act of parliament, which he may clearly do.

And indeed this revenue comes to the king by purchase; for he gave a recompence for it, (viz.) part of his standing revenues, it being the profits that did arise from his wards and liberties.

But it is objected, that this power in the king of alienating his revenues may be a prejudice to his people, to whom he must recur continually for supplies. I answer, that the law has not such dishonourable thoughts of the king, as to imagine he will do any thing amiss to his people, in those things in which he hath power so to do.

But that which I insist on is, that it is absurd in its nature to restrain the king from a power of alienating his revenues of which he is seised in fee. It is against the nature of the being of a king, that he should have less power than his people; for before he was king, he had power to alien. Now when the crown descended upon him, he is seised in jure coronæ; and shall he then have less power over those very lands than he had before the descent of the crown? Shall he now be disabled to alien by being a king? This would be against a common principle of law, that the descent of the crown takes away all disability. Pl. 105. Digg.

Then it is repugnant to the constitution of the government. Suppose a king should be under a present danger of being invaded: if the king could not raise money by alienating his revenue, the nation might perish; for he cannot otherwise raise money than by an act of parliament, for which there might not be time: and therefore heretofore the kings of England have borrowed several sums of money by mortgaging their lands. Cotton's Posthum. 175.

And there ought to be a power in all governments to reward persons that deserve well; for rewards and punishments are the supporters of all governments; and it has been the constant usage of the kings of England to reward persons deserving of the government out of the crown revenues, by pensions, and giving estates to support the titles of earl and other dignities. Seld. Tit. of Honour 838. 7 Rep. 12. Calvin's case. And this has been allowed of by act of parliament, as appeareth by 34 H. 8. c. 20.

But some perhaps will say, I have been talking little to the purpose; for that they do not deny that the king might alien his own demesnes, or any lands that came to him by descent or purchase: but say they, this revenue was settled by act of parliament on the crown, and therefore it cannot be aliened. But I do not find any such distinction in our law-books, nor any authority from common or statute law, that restrains the kings of England from aliening any sort of their revenues.

As for the lands in ancient demesne, they seemed most appropriated for the king's use of any of his revenues; for they had several privileges, all relating to the king; as, not to be impleaded out of the manor, to be free of toll for all things concerning their sustenance and husbandry, not to be impanelled on any inquest. And yet notwithstanding all this those lands were always alienable: and if these lands are alienable, what estates in the crown are not alienable? And our books do take notice that these estates are alienable; and so is Fitz. N. B. 13. c. 166. f. 226. Staunford Prer. 38.

Then what reason can be given why some estates should be aliened, and others not? Why may not the king as well alien these estates as he may the flowers of his crown, as appears in the abbot of Strata Marcella's case? For he may grant a county-palatine, which has jura regalia; so he has granted a power to pardon treason or felony, &c. Indeed these prerogatives are reassumed to the crown by the statute H. 8. but the grants were not void.

Then if an estate be settled on a subject by act of parliament, it will not be denied but that he may alien such estate; and why shall not the king have the same privilege? It appears in fact, that he has always done it. So all the lands that belonged to the abbies and monasteries were aliened by the king, and yet they were given to him by act of parliament, and by general words, as it is here. So the customs have been always granted and charged by the king, and yet they were granted to him by act of parliament. The authorities in our books are full to this purpose, as 21 Ed. 3. 47. 29 Ed. 3. Pl. 1. 2. 4 Inst. 45. Davis 7. 14. Knighiton 1684.

But it is objected, that this revenue was given in lieu of inheritances that were unalienable, (viz.) the wards, liveries, purveyances, &c.

Tho' how the nature of these inheritances can affect inheritances of another nature, I cannot see. But even these inheritances were always in effect alienable, for they might have been released. The king's grant to be free of prisage, for Thomas Waller's case; and so were services in capite, and purveyances, &c.

Some opinions have been urged, which say that the crown revenues could not be alienated, as Fleta and Bracton. But these books are only ornaments to the law; they are not looked on as authentick, especially where the practice has been always to the contrary. But Briss. 87. is otherwise, and so is Selden 549. and 552. And Bracton himself in his second book, c. 57. seems to be of another opinion, where he saith, that even res sacre are alienable by the common law, tho' perhaps by the canon law they are not to be aliened. So the statute of Bigamis, c. 7. also admits, that the king may grant away his revenues. Partesius in his book de Laudibus Legum Angliæ says, that the government is not only regal, but legal and political, and then discourses of the particulars wherein the regal power is restrained: and if our constitution had been so that the king could not alien his lands or revenues, it cannot be imagined but that he would have mentioned a thing so remarkable, especially in a time when there were so many grants made by the crown, tho' indeed at that time there were many acts of resumption made, as there were before and after, as in 6 H. 4. 14. and in the time of king Henry the eighth, &c. which are a great demonstration that those grants could not be revoked or avoided but by act of parliament.

It is objected, that the fee-farm rents in the time of king Charles the second were granted by act of parliament. But they might have been granted without that act. It was only made to encourage purchasers, to make good the letters patents beyond all scruple, and so give power to sue for the arrears of rent, and to distrain, &c.

Then

Then it's objected, that if this grant of the revenue should be alienable to the subjects, that then the king's officers of excise would be the subjects officers.

But that does not follow; they are only a means to convey to their fellow subjects their right, and that which is granted to them by the king's letters patents. So the justices in eyre, and of oyer and terminer, &c. are the king's justices; and yet they convey justice to the people. 4 Inst. 162.

As for these letters patents themselves, it's plain by the whole tenour of the patents, that the king was not deceived in his grant; and the consideration being executed, though it be false, yet that will not avoid the grant. Plow. 554.

So that I conclude this point, that these letters patents which charge this branch of the revenue, are good and firm in law.

I come now to the second point; and that is, concerning the remedy taken by the patentees.

And I hold they have taken a very proper and legal remedy. We are all agreed that they have a right; and if so, then they must have some remedy to come at it too.

The remedies at common law, to recover against the king, were by petition, or monstrans de droit.

Indeed, there is a new remedy now given by stat. 2 Ed. 6. c. 8. and that is by way of traverse to the king's title, 4 Rep. 54. 2 Inst. 688.

But first, a petition of right is not necessary in this case: not but that a man may proceed in this way, and admit himself out of possession if he pleaseth. But it's not necessary, for two reasons;

1. Because a petition of right is grounded always upon a naked matter of fact suggested, and not of record; and upon such a suggestion, there is a commission issues out of Chancery. Cok. Entr. 462. 9 H. 4. 4.

But here the title is derived by letters patents which are of record; so that here is no matter of fact to be enquired of.

2. The patentees do not endeavour to destroy the king's title: but petitions of right do so, and are generally inconsistent with the king's title.

Then this annuity is not turned to a right, as if there had been an attainder, &c. Therefore why should there be a petition of right?

I take this remedy to be by a monstrans de droit; and this remedy is to be sued at common law, when the party's title appeared of record. Kell. 178. Monstrans de droit; or ouster de maine, (which is all one in effect) always lies where the title or right of the subject appears as well by matter of record as the king's title; and this appears fully, Sadler's case, 4 Rep. and Hob. 334.

Also it's plain, that a monstrans de droit lies in the Exchequer: I think there is no doubt of that.

It is objected, that the petition should be first sued to the king: but by the records in Riley's Placita Parl. 351, 257. Staundf. 72. it appears, that these petitions of right have been sued to the court of King's-Bench. But indeed this petition differs from those; for this being only by way of complaint, there needs no indorsement, as in the other cases.

The next objection is, that in this precedent there was a liberate.

1. This writ is in its nature a writ of allowance, Reg. 192. But this writ does not give any manner of jurisdiction; for the court may hold plea, and proceed without it.

2. But the next answer that I give to this, and which may be satisfactory to any body, is the statute of 5 R. 2. c. 9. which directs the barons of the Exchequer to answer every demand, without any writ or letter from the king. So is 4 Inst. 110. So that I take it to be very plain, that the barons might proceed here without any writ at all.

But it is objected, that the writ should have been directed to the treasurer, &c.

But this needs not be; for the treasurer hath nothing to do with civil pleas. Reg. 137.

Indeed, Fitzh. N. B. 129. doth mention the treasurer: but that is a common error, and the writs need not be so directed.

It's true, as my lord Coke observes, that the legitimization of any case may be suspected that has no case of kin to it; and I agree to that rule. But I think I have found out some kindred to this present case, and that is the case in Coke's Entries, 93. vii. Claim of Liberties; for there the barons did allow certain liberties, and also the payment of a rent-charge granted by the king to my lord Hunsdon. So the case of Margery Parker in 9 H. 6. 13. is a considerable authority to this point. She had an annuity out of the Magna Custuma of London, granted by the queen out of a sum assigned for her dowry to receive of the customers. The queen shall not have action against the customers, but must sue to the barons of the Exchequer; and Margery Parker may sue for it in the Exchequer, in the same manner as the queen might for her portion. Then there is my lady Broughton's case; which happened in 25 Car. II. My lady Broughton forfeited the keeper's place of the New-Prison to the king, who thereupon made a seizure: upon this the dean and chapter of Westminster came into the court of Exchequer, and claimed the inheritance; and the king's hands were removed. Indeed this matter was first stirred in the King's-Bench, for they gave judgment to seize the prison. Now if the court of King's-Bench might hold plea there of a monstrans de droit, because the seizure was there; why may they not as well proceed in the Exchequer by monstrans de droit, because the money is there?

'Tis true, money comes into and issues out of the Exchequer without the barons; but, with submission, the right of bringing in, and issuing out of the money, belongs to the barons. And if you make the barons only judges of the right of coming in of the king's money, you make them judges but of half their business which belongs to that court; for the barons have the judicial power over the whole court of Exchequer. And to say that the treasurer and his officers have no correspondence with the barons, is not true; for all the books take notice of them, as persons that all belong to the Exchequer.

Some have objected, that this court ought regularly to hold pleas only where the king is party; and that this court used to be prohibited to proceed in any pleas that do not concern the king. 2 Inst. 551. There you may see what pleas they may hold.

But here the plea does concern the king; for here is the king's grant, and the suit is to the king: and this determination of the barons in this case is not thus any judgment of their own; but the king himself, by reason of such his letters patents, hath obliged himself to make such payments. As in the case of an obligation where debt is brought upon it, and a recovery is had; 'tis not so much the judgment of the court as binds the property, as the obligor himself; who by his bond has subjected his property to be determined by the judgment.

Now as to the authorities which seem directly to govern this point, and the objections against them.

1. There is fit Tho. Wroth's case in Plowden; which I rely upon as a clear and full authority in this case, notwithstanding all the objections that have been made against it.

King Hen. VIII. had appointed sir Tho. Wroth to be gentleman-usher of the privy-chamber to prince Edward; and he granted to the said sir Thomas for the exercise of the same office an annuity of 20 l. to be had and yearly taken to the said sir Thomas, from Lady-Day then last past, during his natural life, by the hands of the treasurer of his court of Augmentations of the revenues of the crown for the time being, of such his treasure of the same revenues, as should remain in the hands of the treasurer at two times in the year, &c.

The chief objection against this case is, that there the grant was under the seal of the court of Augmentations, which was incorporated with the court of Exchequer. But that I deny, for that court was never legally united to the court of Exchequer, as was adjudged in Dier, 216. So that the objection, that sir Tho. Wroth's grant was under the seal of the Augmentation court, and under the survey of it, is gone.

Then it does not appear to me, that ever the court of Augmentations had any power expressly given them to relieve the grantees of such rents. I have looked over the act of parliament, by which that court is constituted, but I cannot find any such power. But I think, the court of Augmentations did proceed in such manner, that it might be also reputed a court of Exchequer; and the court of Augmentations is by express words made a court for the new revenues that should come to the crown, which are exempted from the jurisdiction of the other court: but that which I infer from hence is, that if this new court of Exchequer did in some cases relieve grantees of rents, &c. certainly the old court of Exchequer shall have the same privilege.

There are other courts which have also proceeded in the same manner; as the court of Wards did usually hold plea of these matters, 2 Croke 78. Queen Elizabeth granted to Allen under her great seal, an annuity of 40 l. per ann. to be paid by her receiver of the court of Wards. This, being payable by the receiver, is in the nature of a rent-charge. So the court of Surveyors, erected by 33 Hen. 8. did proceed in the same manner, and did relieve grantees of rent-charges, &c.

As to Nevil's case, also in Plowden, I take it likewise to be a full authority in point. An yearly rent-charge of 3 l. 10 s. was granted to sir H. Nevil and another for the exercise of the office of keeper of a park, out of a manor for their lives. One is attained. The manor comes to the possession of the king. The king shall neither have the office nor the rent: and the arrears of the said annuity were paid to sir H. Nevil at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the treasurer and the chamberlain. I grant that those lands were also under the survey of the court of Augmentations; but that I conceive makes nothing against me for the reasons before-mentioned.

There are several other records which have been already quoted, but I shall not trouble you with the repetition of them. I shall only mention some few which I think have been omitted, as Trin. 1^o. Mar. Rot. 120. 2 El. Rot. 145. Mich. 13. 2 Rot. 347. Hill. 13 El. Rot. 143. P. 1 2 Rot. 108. In all these records it also appears, that money issued out of the Exchequer by order of the court of Exchequer, and it is highly reasonable that they should have such a power.

Suppose the king purchased land that is charged with a rent, the king must take the land together with its burden; but in such case it would be too hard to drive the grantee of the rent to his petition of right to the king. No, certainly he may come to the court of Exchequer by way of petition to the barons, who may give him relief.

It has been objected, that money which once comes into the Exchequer can never be taken out. Reg. 193. But if this is true in a general sense, that none of the king's revenues that are brought into the Exchequer can be paid out, this would destroy all annuities, rent-charges, and other payments which the crown is obliged to make.

'Tis true, if a man be outlawed in the King's-Bench, and the party's goods are seized into the king's hands, and then the outlawry is reversed, there can be no restitution. The reason of this is, for that the court of King's-Bench cannot send a writ to the treasurer; and the court of Exchequer have no record before them to issue out a warrant for a restitution. So if an attainder be reversed, the mean profits taken into the Exchequer cannot be restored for the same reason; and also for that the king cannot be made a disseisor, and the statute gives a remedy only as to parliament.

There remains after all a great objection, had it any weight, and that is, cui bono? If the patentees should have judgment for them, what will it signify if they cannot come at any money?

As to this, I do think, that as soon as the writs are delivered to the officers of the Exchequer, I mean the treasurer and chamberlain, the property is altered, and the officers become debtors to the parties, as appears by 2 H. 7. So as soon as a fieri fac. is delivered to the sheriff, and upon it goods are levied, the property of the goods is altered, and the sheriff becomes a debtor to the plaintiff. So an action of debt will lie upon a liberate, and so it has been adjudged.

I shall only observe one thing more, and so conclude; and that is in answer to my brother who argued last, for he struck very hard at the judgment given by the barons. He thought that it was very erroneous, and therefore void. But with submission, I take this judgment to be as well as it can be. And whereas it is said in the judgment, that the money shall be paid by the commissioners and chamberlain of the Treasury, it must be understood of the receipt of the treasury, and not of the lord high treasurer, which office is long since expired.

As for the levying of the tallies mentioned in the judgment, it does not hurt; it is at most but surplussage. But that which I insist on is, that though this judgment, in respect of form, or any material point of it, should be erroneous, yet if your lordships should be of opinion in the two first points with me, you will then give a new judgment, such as the court of Exchequer ought to have given; for that is the law of this place, as appears by 31 Ed. 3. c. 12. And this last point was so ruled upon a debate in the house of lords, and was the case of the King and Saintbell, 30 Car. 2.

(a) To avoid repetition we have omitted Skinner's report of Holt's argument. But we think it proper, to apprize the reader, that in several parts it is more full than the report which we have extracted from 5th Modern. EDITOR.

The argument of the lord keeper Sommers, on his giving judgment in the bankers case: delivered in the Exchequer-Chamber, June 23, 1696.

THE four following causes depending in the Exchequer-Chamber, stood for the judgment of the court.

The attorney general against

Joseph Hornby,
Robert Williamson,
Thomas Smith, and
Sir Jeremy Snow.

LORD KEEPER. THESE cases differ in several particulars; but as to the points which have been chiefly spoken to, they are the same.

I shall therefore only put the case, as it stands upon the record where Williamson is party; which I will do shortly, because it has been opened so often already, upon the several arguments.

Robert Williamson comes before the barons, and exhibits letters patent under the great seal, dated 30 April, 29 Car. 2. granting to sir Robert Vyner, his heirs and assigns, the yearly rent or sum of 25,003*l. 9s. 4d.* to be yearly paid, received, and taken, of the rents, revenues, and profits arising to the king, his heirs and successors, out of the duty of excise, by virtue of the act made 12 Car. 2. for taking away the court of wards and liveries, &c. and settling a revenue in lieu thereof; and prays that these letters patent may be inrolled of record.

The barons cause them to be read and inrolled; and the letters patent are set forth at large in the record.

The effect of them is,

The king takes notice, that he had been constrained to postpone the payment of monies due to the goldsmiths, and others, upon tallies and orders registered.

That he could not spare such a sum, as would satisfy those debts; but was willing to grant to the persons to whom he was indebted, an annual sum answerable to the interest of their debts, after the rate of 6*l. per cent.*

To that end, he had commanded the accounts to be stated to the first of January, 1676; whereupon there appeared due to sir Robert Vyner 416,724*l. 13s. 1½.* In satisfaction whereof, the king resolved to grant him 25,003*l. 9s. 4d. per annum*, to be had and taken by him, his heirs and assigns, out of the rents, revenues and profits, which should arise or become due or payable to the king, his heirs and successors, out of, for, or by reason of the duty of excise, and by virtue of the said act, to be paid quarterly, in trust for such of his creditors, as within a year after the date of the letters patent should deliver up their securities, and accept assignments of proportionable parts of the said yearly sum, in satisfaction of their debts respectively due, and in the mean time should not sue sir Robert Vyner for their debts; the residue thereof to the use of sir Robert Vyner and his heirs.

The king directs the high treasurer, chancellor, under-treasurer, chamberlains and barons of the Exchequer, which then were, and the high treasurer, commissioners of the treasury, &c. which should be, and all other officers and ministers of the court of Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, in their respective places, upon request, to perform all acts necessary for the due payment of the said rent to the said sir Robert Vyner, his heirs and assigns; and to strike tallies of pro, or assignment, or other tallies, as the case shall require, or as shall be desired, on the commissioners, treasurers, receivers, collectors, or farmers of the duty, who are required to make due payment accordingly; so as the said yearly sum may be received without other warrant. And if the profits of the said revenue should be paid into the receipt before the levying such tallies, or payment made, then he authorises and requires the high treasurer, and commissioners of the Treasury, chancellor, under-treasurer, chamberlains, and barons, and other officers and ministers of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, to whom it appertains, to pay out of such monies as shall be paid into the Exchequer, the said yearly sum, without other warrant; and the letters patent shall be a sufficient warrant for the purposes aforesaid.

That tallies of pro, or assignment, or other tallies struck upon the excise, at the desire of sir Robert Vyner, his heirs or assigns, shall be preferable to other quarterly payments; except such yearly sums as are payable for the management of the said revenue; and except certain sums payable to the queen, and the duke of York, which are to be paid in the first place.

Sir Robert Vyner covenants at any time within a year, to make assignments of proportionable parts of the said rent to such of his creditors as will take the same in satisfaction of their debts, and will deliver up their securities; and that he will not, during the year, assign any part of the

So that upon the whole I am of opinion, that the judgment given by the barons ought to be affirmed.

But afterwards the lord keeper was of opinion to reverse the judgment, and accordingly it was reversed. The ground upon which he gave his opinion was, that the patentees had not taken a proper remedy by petition to the barons, who have no power or controul over the king's treasury, &c. and that their only remedy was by petition to the king himself. He insisted much upon the same reasons and grounds which my lord chief justice Treby went on. (a) Petition to the king, and not to the barons.

said yearly sum, except to creditors, or others by their appointment; and if, within one year and an half, any difference arise between him and his creditors, touching the assigning any part of the said yearly sum, to submit the matter to the high treasurer, or commissioners of the Treasury, and to perform such orders as he or they should make.

It is provided, that all assignments be inrolled within thirty days after the execution thereof, before the auditor of the receipt, or clerk of the pells; to the end it may appear what assignments have been granted, or otherwise to be of no effect.

And also, that when the king, his heirs or successors, shall, at entire payments, have paid the sum of 416,724*l. 13s. 1½d.* to sir Robert Vyner, his heirs or assigns, in proportion among them, after the rate of 100*l.* principal money, for every 6*l. per cent. per ann.* and also the arrears of the said yearly sum of 25,003*l. 9s. 4d.* then the grant should be void.

The letters patent are to be favourably taken for sir Robert Vyner, his heirs and assigns; and to be good non obstante the not reciting of that act of parliament, whereby the revenue is granted, or the not mentioning any former grants or charges of or upon the said revenue, or the not mentioning the certain yearly rents or profits of the said revenue, or the certain nature thereof, or how the debts due to sir Robert Vyner did particularly arise; and notwithstanding the statute 1 H. 4. or 18 H. 6. or 26 H. 8. or the act of 12 Car. 2. whereby the revenue was granted, or any other defect.

The king covenants, that due payment shall be made, and all things done on his part: and that if there be any defect in the present grant, he, his heirs and successors, upon petition, will make a further grant, as the attorney general shall advise.

Then Williamson sets forth, that by virtue of the letters patent sir Robert Vyner was seized ut de feodo & jure, and was indebted unto him in 1000*l.* And that the 9th of April, 32 Car. 2. by deed of assignment (which he brings into court,) reciting that he had delivered up his securities to sir Robert Vyner, and had discharged him, the said sir Robert Vyner, grants and assigns to him and his heirs 60*l.* part of the said yearly sum, being his proportionable part, in satisfaction of the said debt, under the condition in the letters patent; and prays the assignment may be read and inrolled, which is ordered, and the tenor is entered.

Williamson further says, that he delivered up his securities and accepted the assignment, in satisfaction of his debt, according to the intent of the letters patent; and that he never after sued sir Robert Vyner; and that the assignment was inrolled within thirty days before the auditor of the receipt; and that the principal sum is not paid; and that the arrears of the yearly sum of 60*l.* were paid to Lady-day 35 Car. 2. and that from that time 405*l.* is due for six years and three quarters, ending at Christmas last. Then he prays the letters patent and assignment may be allowed, and the arrears paid, and the yearly sum paid for the future; and that tallies may be struck as it becomes due; and that he may have the benefit of the remedies and powers mentioned in the letters patent: and avers that at Christmas last there was sufficient to pay his arrears, besides what was payable for management, and to queen Catharine, and the duke of York.

To this the attorney-general demurs; and Williamson joins in demurrer.

Whereupon the barons of the Exchequer give this judgment: that the letters patent to sir Robert Vyner, and the assignment to Williamson, juncta tenorem & effectum eorundem videm Roberto Williamson allocutus: and that the sum of 405*l.* being the arrears to and for Christmas 1 W. & M. so as aforesaid in arrears, be paid to him at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the commissioners of the Treasury, and chamberlains of the receipt who now are, and by the hands of the commissioners of the Treasury, treasurer and chamberlains of the receipt for the time being, out of the treasure arising from that part of the excise in the letters patent mentioned to be granted to king Charles II. his heirs and successors, and in the hands of the commissioners of the Treasury now being, and in the hands of the commissioners of the Treasury and chamberlains for the time being; to be paid after, and besides the necessary sums for the management of the said revenue, and the annual sums payable to the queen dowager and the duke of York. And that the said yearly sum of 60*l.* from Christmas 1 W. & M. be paid to Williamson and his heirs, at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the commissioners of the Treasury, treasurer and chamberlains of the said receipt for the time being, out of the said treasure arising from the said hereditary revenue of excise in their hands being, ultra & post, &c. And that tallies toties quoties, &c. be struck at the said receipt, for the said yearly sum upon the commissioners, treasurers, receivers, collectors or farmers of the said here-

* The stat. meant, seems to be 6 H. 8. cap. 13. for there is no stat. of 26 H. 8. applicable to the case: but the patents have been searched, and in them it is 26 H. 8.

† i. e. For the remainder of the reign of king Charles II. and the whole reign of king James II. and not quite a year of the reign of king William and queen Mary.

itary revenue of excise, by the officers of the receipt of excise to whom it belongs, upon request, &c. according to the letters patent, and the course of the Exchequer, salvo jure domini regis, & domine regine nunc si, &c.

Upon this judgment the writ of error is brought.

There have been two principal questions made in the arguments upon these cases.

1st. Whether the grants, made by king Charles II. of the several annual sums out of the hereditary excise, to the goldsmiths, their heirs and assigns, be effectual in law, and do charge this revenue in the time of his successors?

2^d. Whether the remedies which the parties have pursued in this case be proper, and such as are warranted by law, or justified by the course of the court of Exchequer?

I do not take notice at present of the objections which have been made to the form of the judgment, as it is enter'd, that being a matter of a different consideration; because, admitting the law to be for the parties who demand the arrears and growing payments of these annuities in this manner, if there be any error in the entering of the judgment, that is to be reformed in this court, and we are to make it such as it ought to have been in the court of Exchequer.

The first general question has been divided, as well by the council at the bar, as by my lords the judges, who argued this case, into two points.

1st, If this revenue of excise be such an inheritance, that the king could alien the whole, or any part of it, in perpetuity from the crown?

2^{dly}, Admitting that he might, whether it be effectually done by the grants to the goldsmiths?

My lords the judges, who have argued these cases upon the writs of error, have all agreed in opinion, that the letters patent are good in law to pass an interest to the patentees and their heirs, and to bind king Charles II. and his successors.

Mr. baron Lechmere was of another opinion in the court of Exchequer.

The first of these points is a subject of the highest importance, at least as to the consequences of its determination either way; and perhaps, is not to be discoursed of adequately to the extent of it in an ordinary court of law.

As to my own part, being extremely desirous, as far as is possible, to avoid the repetition of what has been already said very often; and having formed the opinion which I shall deliver in these cases, upon the second general question; I shall not speak at all at this time to either part of the first question.

As to the second general question, whether this manner of suit, and the proceedings in it, be warranted by the course of the Exchequer; so that the parties here can come immediately to the barons, and demand their annuities, and thereupon the barons by their judgment, can in a regular course prescribe to the treasurer and chamberlains to issue money out of the receipt?—this is what I cannot hitherto be convinced of, either by what I have heard in the debate of this matter, or by what I have been able to observe upon the best endeavours I could use to inform myself, in which I have spared no pains.

I take this to be a point of as great moment as ever came to be discussed in Westminster-hall: not so much in respect of the value of what is in demand, and of what does depend upon the same question, (tho' that amounts to about 42,385*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per annum, besides the arrears;) as because it does in so high a degree concern the government, and disposal of the publick revenue, and the treasure of the crown; whereof the law has always had a superlative care, as that upon which the safety of the king and kingdom must, in all ages, depend.

I esteem it a great unhappiness, that I cannot be so far convinced in my thoughts upon this point, as to concur with the greater number of the judges who have assisted in this court: for tho' my own understanding must be my guide, which I am bound to follow in delivering my judgment; yet I am so sensible of my defects as to distrust myself exceedingly, when I differ from so many learned men; and should be extremely well satisfied, that my opinion was not to be the measure by which the judgment is to be given in this case.

And therefore, having heard that some judges have made a doubt of this matter, I have already proposed it as a point for the consideration of all of them; whether in this court the judgments ought to be affirmed or reversed according to the opinions of the chancellor, or the chancellor and treasurer, when there is one; or according to the opinions of the majority of the judges, who are called to assist?

Before I proceed to deliver the reasons, upon which I think myself obliged to conclude the same way with my lord chief justice of the Common Pleas as to this second question, I will take notice of two things.

1st, That the nature of the debate as to this question seemed to me to be very much changed upon his argument.

All the judges who spoke before him, did, as to this point, in a manner rely upon the two cases of Nevil and Wroth to warrant their opinions. These cases, which are reported in Plowden's Commentaries, I shall be oblig'd to put at large hereafter, and do therefore only name them at present.

My lord chief justice Treby particularly applied himself to shew, that the proceedings in those cases were adjudged upon particular reasons, and not at all upon the course of the Exchequer, or any power lodged originally in the barons by the common law; and were therefore not applicable to the cases before the court; and therefore, as he express'd himself, proceeding upon new topics, he differed from them in the conclusion.

My lord chief justice of the King's Bench only has had the opportunity of saying any thing in answer to his arguments. What weight they have had with any of the other judges, I do not know.

2^{dly}, The second thing I will take notice of is, that in several of the arguments much was said of the subjects property; how it was concerned in the event of these cases, and what regard there ought to be had of it.

With this I do readily agree. No man can be more tender of property, and careful to preserve it than I have been always, and always shall be: but I freely own, that we, who are concerned in judicature in this reign, ought to ascribe less merit to ourselves for our care of property, than most of those who went before us. We run no hazard in doing of it: no man has cause to think he shall be ill looked upon for giving his judgment for the subject according to law, though it be against the interest of the crown.

No man can think more hardly than I do, of the arbitrary shutting up of the Exchequer, as it is commonly called, which was the unhappy occasion of raising the present question: no man can have more commiseration for the persons concerned; I mean those who only trusted the goldsmiths with their money, and had no share in the temptation to trust, from the unjust and unreasonable profit which was made from the crown.

But I think the word property could hardly be brought into any case less aptly than it is into this.

There has been no difference of opinion, as to the interest and property which the subject takes by the letters patent, amongst the judges who have argued in this court.

We are all agreed that the subject has, in this case, all the same remedies for recovering his right, which in any such case the common law of England did ever allow, or which are given to him by any statute; so that the subject is as safe in his property, and as secure in the method of coming at it, if it be detained from him, as by the English constitution he ought to be.

The only question is, whether this be such a remedy as the law allows, for recovering from the king the arrears, and growing payments of the annual sums in question?

If it be not, I am sure none of us ought to make the parties case better than the law has made it. We must judge of property according to the rules which the law has fixed, and can make no new ones, nor invent new remedies, however compassionate the case may appear, or however popular it may seem to attempt it.

The question then is, if an annual sum be granted by the king, under the great seal, out of any branch of the revenue, to a subject and his heirs, in the manner of these grants, and the annual payments happen to be in arrear; whether by any law, now in force, the party may come to the barons of the Exchequer immediately, and they upon prayer to them, may inroll and allow the letters patent, and may thereupon order the treasurer and chamberlains to pay, out of the Exchequer, the arrears, and also the growing payments for the future?

I think it may be proper to premise, that we are not now speaking of the Exchequer in general, as it comprehends that great college of the revenue made up of all the officers of the upper and lower Exchequer; nor of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer-Chamber before the lord treasurer and chancellor; nor of the court of Equity before the treasurer, chancellor, and barons; but only of the authority of the court of Pleas holden before the barons: nor is the question now of the barons' power over the receivers, collectors, and other officers of the revenue; but of their power over the king's treasure, when it is lodged in the receipt of the Exchequer, and over the treasurer and chamberlains, in whose custody it is.

In speaking to this matter, I shall proceed by these steps:

First, to observe that no authors ancient or modern, who have wrote of the jurisdiction and business of the court of Exchequer, have mentioned any such power to be lodged in the barons of the Exchequer, as will be sufficient to warrant the judgments in these cases.

Secondly, that these judgments cannot be defended by any thing which I can find, upon the best search I can make, in any records or acts of parliament:

Nor thirdly, by any authorities in our law books.

I. As to the first, I will not go about to repeat a catalogue of writers who have published particular discourses of the court of Exchequer. My lord chief justice of the Common Pleas was very large in this matter, and I will avoid the affectation of naming them over again: I believe I have perused all of them. I have also looked over several manuscripts, yet unpublished, treating of that court, which were written in the time of king James the first, and king Charles the first: and I can no where find the least mention of any power in the barons, to command the issuing of any money out of the receipt of the Exchequer.

Since then so many authors of learning and judgment have set themselves to write, with express design, of the jurisdiction of the court of Exchequer, and not one of them but does treat in particular of the power of the barons, in bringing in the treasure and revenue of the crown, and of their power over it whilst it is in transitu, tho' some of them more largely than others; and yet there is not one word to be found in any of them, which implies a power in the barons over the treasure, when it is once lodged in the receipt; what can be more reasonably inferred, than that such a power was wholly unknown to them?

It must be admitted, that the power to command the issuing of the king's treasure is of the highest nature, and of the greatest consequence; and therefore it cannot be believed that it was forgotten by all of them, or if it had been remembered, that it could be passed by without remark or observation.

By what was said in some of the arguments in this case, it seemed to be taken, as if the barons of the Exchequer had been invested by law with a general superintendency over the treasure of the crown, and were to take care to see it distributed and answered to all such, at least, as made any just demand upon it, whether it was or was not brought into the king's coffers: but this is to make them much greater officers than the law has yet made them.

My lord chief justice Coke, when he comes to treat of the court of Exchequer in his fourth Instit. 2. 11. seems to choose out two ancient authors, who had wrote of that court, as the foundation of his discourse; which is, for the most part, as a commentary upon them: I mean Britton, and the Mirror of Justice.

Britton's account is shortly this; our treasurers and barons from henceforth shall have jurisdiction of all causes, which touch our debts, and our fees, and the incidents thereof, and to take conscience of debts which are owing to our debtors, that we may come at our debts the sooner.

When my lord chief justice Coke has set down these words, he then proceeds to set down the words of the Mirror; viz. that the Exchequer is only ordained for the king's profit, to hear and determine torts done to the king and his crown, in right of his fiefs and franchises, and the accounts of bailiffs, and of the receivers of the king's money, and the administrators of his goods, by the view of a sovereign, who is the treasurer of England. Mirr. cap. 1. § 14.

These words of the Mirror are a short, but effectual description of the court of Exchequer; and my lord chief justice Coke comments upon and expounds them in their full extent: nothing falls from him as if this account were defective, or did include only one part of the business of the court.

In the Mirror, cap. 1. § 14. we are told what is the use of the seal in the Exchequer, viz. to make acquittances, and to seal writs and estreats under green wax, issuing out of this place pour le prou le roy, i. e. for the king's profit. The use of the seal, to command the treasurer and chamberlains to issue monies out of the receipt, was unknown when the Mirror was wrote, or this was a very defective account.

II. And as these ancient authors have thus confined the business of the court, so it does appear, in the second place, by the ancient records, that the barons of the Exchequer have not intermeddled in other matters, than what my lord chief justice Coke, and these ancient authors assign to their jurisdiction: unless as their power has been from time to time enlarged by acts of parliament; or in cases where they have acted by particular authority given to them by writs under the great or privy seal; or where they have acted by virtue of the king's answer indorsed upon petitions made to his person, either in or out of parliament; which answers to such petitions generally order a writ to issue out of Chancery, which gave a jurisdiction to the treasurer and barons respectively, to act according to the effect of the answer. And upon this ground it is, that amongst the abuses and usurpations in the several courts, which are enumerated in the Mirror, in that chapter which is entitled, Abusio de la Commen Ley, this which follows is mentioned for one; abusio est que les ministres del escheque eient jurisdiction de autre chose que des deniers le roy, de ses fiefs, & ses franchises, sans bre' original de le chancery south blanche cere.

It is so far from appearing by any ancient author or record, that the barons of the Exchequer had such a power as is contended for in these cases, that on the contrary it appears, their authority was very much restrained in that which was immediately their business, viz. matters of account depending before them; in which they could make very few allowances, however just and reasonable in themselves, without a particular authority under the great or privy seal.

By the statute of Rutland, 10 Ed. 1. notice is taken, that upon suggestion of the king's bailiffs, writs for divers allowances had been made to the king's grievous damage; it is therefore ordained, that of such allowances to be made from thenceforth, view shall be in our Exchequer; and the same view being faithfully made, the same treasurer and barons shall certify our chancellor of the due allowances so to be made, and that writs of allowances shall be made according to the same certificate.

The statute directs that it should be considered in the Exchequer, what allowances were proper to be made, and that the treasurer and barons should certify the lord chancellor what they found was justly to be allowed; and after all, the great seal was to issue thereupon to warrant the allowance.

Here was a new use appointed for the seal of the Exchequer, viz. to make the certificate; but the parliament would not innovate so far as to make the Exchequer seal more than a certificate, whereupon the chancellor might issue a writ of allowance under the great seal.

This would have been a strange circuit, if it had been imagined at that time, that the barons could have made the allowance by their own jurisdiction, and have sent a writ accordingly to the treasurer and chamberlains.

There are many instances to be found how much the jurisdiction of the barons was restrained, even in particulars, which one would think to be most properly of their cognisance.

I will at present only instance some few, which are printed in Mr. Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria.

The executors of John Basin petition the king, that whereas the king remeatur diēto Joh'i in 34l. for wax delivered to his use, by the hands of Roger Lisle clerk of the great wardrobe, and for which they had a bill signed by the then master of the great wardrobe; and that a like sum of 34l. was demanded of the said Basin by extents of the green wax, quod placeat d'no regi diētorum debitorum hinc inde debitam facere allocationem: the answer is, habeant bre' de Cancellaria thes. & baronibus de scacc. quod si ipsi inveniant debitum esse clarum, quod tunc faciant allocationem de uno deb'o ad aliud. 35 Ed. 1. Ryley 334.

An answer of the same nature is given to another petition, very much of this kind, made by the executors of Robert de Basinges. Ryley 326.

The citizens of York petition for an allowance of 8l. 4s. 10d. and 102l. 12s. 11d. with which they are charged in the Exchequer, for wine sold to them by Robert de Dacre the king's butler, who had acknowledged the receipt of the money before the barons: the answer is, mandetur per bre' de Cancellaria thes. & baron' quod scrutatis rotulis videant, si recognitis sit sic facta ut dicunt, tunc exonerentur cives de eadem pecunia & Robertus de Dacre inde oneretur. 33 Ed. 1. Ryley 252.

In the same year, Ryley 248. Harcla petitioned the king for an allowance of his arrears for the time when he was sheriff of Cumberland, for that he could not levy the same by reason of the waste and destruction which the Scots have made; and also for an allowance of 38l. which the king owed him for wool taken to the king's use; and the answer is, de damnis que sustinuit valeat gratiam per bre' de cane thesaurario & baronibus de scaccario dirigendum secundum discretionem thesaurarii & baron'. Et de tanis capis exonerentur & alioquin in arre' agant suis. Et super hoc fiat breve de Cancellaria thesaurario & baronibus de scaccario.

In the same book, pag. 249, 250, 258, there are petitions for allowances of sums laid out for the king's use, and writs under the great seal ordered, requiring allowance to be made by the treasurer and barons.

Plomier petitioned that he might be permitted to account for the time he was custos of the Templars land in Essex; & unde incepit computari coram Rogero de Wingfield sub cujus sigillo rotuli sui adhuc restant signati. The answer is, habeat bre' de cane thes. & bar' de scacc' in quo contineatur ista peticio, & per idem bre' mandetur, quod inspecta petitione, si suggesta vera sint, procedant ad computum suum audiend' & ulterius faciant in hac parte justitiæ complementum. 14 Ed. 2. Ryley 419.

Upon petition of the tin merchants, to be allowed two days for payment of their coinage, this being also certified to be for the king's profit; the answer is, let there be a writ to the treasurer and barons for that purpose, and the like to the sheriff of Cornwall. Ryley 248.

Upon petition for installment of debts, the answer is sometimes, let a writ go, commanding the treasurer and barons to do it, juxta discretionem. Ryley 291. and at other times, quod scrutari faciant debita, & inde certificent regem, & quod interim habeant respectum, sed non atterminetur sine rege. Ryley 254.

And that the jurisdiction of the barons was originally very restrained, will appear yet plainer, by the statute made the 26th of Edw. 1. Ryley 225. Whereby it is enacted, that the treasurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer make a roll indented of all sums of money delivered for the king's use, without warrant, since the beginning of the war between the king and the king of France; one part to remain with them in the Exchequer, and the other part with the chancellor, 'pro warranto suo ad faciend' super hoc bre'ia in debita forma predictis thes. & camerariis de predictis parcellis.'

I might proceed to very great numbers of instances where the subject was put to his petition, for the allowance of just and reasonable pleas by way of discharge, upon accounting in the Exchequer; some few I thought necessary to mention; but I will not enlarge on this matter, because I think the statute 5 R. 2. cap. 9. which increased the authority of the court of Exchequer in this point, shews plainly, how defective the jurisdiction of that court was, before that time, even in that which seemed absolutely requisite for the doing justice upon accounts.

That statute takes notice, that persons impeached in the Exchequer of debts and accounts, tho' they have offered to plead for discharge of those impeachments according to law, have not always been received thereto heretofore, without having express commandment by writ or letter of the great or privy seal, to their mischief and delay, and no advantage to the king. And it is thereby ordained, that the barons shall from henceforth have full power, to hear every answer of every demand made in the Exchequer, so that every person, that is impeached or impeachable of any cause by himself, or by any person, shall be from henceforth received to plead, sue, and have his reasonable discharge, without tarrying for, or suing any writ or other commandment.

By this act of parliament, a power for the future is given to the barons of the Exchequer to allow a lawful discharge when pleaded. The natural inferences which were to be drawn from this statute were so plain, that, to elude the force of them, two things have been urged in the speaking to these cases.

1st, That this act gives no new power, but was only made in affirmance of the common law.

2dly, That this act might be extended so as to give an authority to the barons of the Exchequer, to relieve the subject in the cases which we have before us.

But I think both of these assertions are mistakes; at least it must be yielded, upon second thoughts, that if this act was merely a declaration of what was law before, such declaratory laws are not to be extended by equitable constructions beyond the words themselves.

As to the first, to prove that this act did not introduce a new law, my lord chief justice Coke, in his fourth Inst. fo. 110. has been cited: I confess in that place he says two things upon occasion of this statute.

1st, That it does appear by this statute that the parties ought, by law, to have been received to have pleaded their discharges, without any such writ or letter.

2dly, That from thence it may be collected, that such course of the Exchequer as tends to the disquietness, mischief, and delay of the subject, and no advantage to the king, is against law.

The first of these two conclusions of his, upon this act, is contrary to his observations immediately preceding in the same page, viz. that so great care was taken by the court of Exchequer, (which is the center of the king's revenue and profit,) that no man might plead for his discharge of any debts, account, or other demand, without having an express commandment by writ or letter of the great seal.

As to his second conclusion, it is not very easy to apprehend what is meant by saying, that a conclusion may be drawn from this act, that such course of the Exchequer, as tends to the delay of the subject, and no advantage to the king, is against law. If the meaning be no more, than that such course is fit to be remedied by a law, it may be justly collected from the act, which was made expressly for that purpose: but that it can be inferred from that act, either that any thing can be the course of the Exchequer which is against law; or that the act declares it to be against law, to refuse the receiving such pleas without being authorized under the great or privy seal, may be denied upon good grounds; because there is nothing to be found in that act, to warrant either of those inferences.

1st, That the act was introducing of a new law, as to one point, viz. the admitting of persons to plead by attornies in the Exchequer, (which they could not do before, unless by a special writ under the great seal,) is agreed by my lord chief justice Coke; and is plain that it was so, by the Mirror of Justices, Abusio N^o 29.

2dly, The words of this statute are enacting, and not declaratory. They give a new power; from henceforth the barons shall have power, and every person that is impeached shall be from henceforth received.

3dly, The words seem to be mistranslated from the original French, tous voyes n'ont mye este receuz, which should not be rendered have not always been received; but thus, always have not been received; that is, have never been received.

But, 4thly, The petition of the commons, upon which this act is framed, and which is Rot. Parl. 5 R. 2. N^o 97. shews this matter plainly beyond all question.

The petition does not complain of any abuse in the barons, or officers of the Exchequer, but of a defect in the law, which the commons pray may be amended for the ease and quiet of the king's people.

And it is remarkable, that as the preamble of the statute is drawn up, as far as it goes, almost in the words of the petition; so the enacting part is framed in the words of the king's answer. As the words are printed in English in the statute-book, they run thus; when they offered to plead in discharge according to law, they have not been always thereto received heretofore: But the original French words of the petition are, n'ont mye este a ce receveur nient foits devant ces heures, i. e. they have never heretofore been received; which, as to this point, is a very material variance, and shews plainly how the French words in the statute itself ought to have been translated.

The petition does in express terms give as a reason why they had heretofore never been received; viz. that the barons of the Exchequer declared, that they had no power to hear the pleas and answers of the said impeachments without writs or letters of the great or privy seal, commanding the treasurer and barons to do right to the said parties impeached. This is what the barons had then declared to be law; nor is this declaration complained of by the petition, nor censured by the parliament; but a law is made to remedy this for the future, giving the barons a new power: and therefore this act, one need not doubt to say, was more than an affirmation of the common law.

The next chapter of this statute, 5 R. 2. cap. 10. is a farther explanation of the matter we are now speaking of.

Notice is taken, that persons retained to serve the king, received money at the receipt, or elsewhere by assignment, which sums had been put upon them as received by way of loan; and altho' they, or their heirs, or executors, have demanded to be admitted to account of the said sums, the same had not been granted, but they were constrained to pursue their grant by the great or privy seal to the treasurer and barons, commanding them to account with them in that behalf, &c. And it is ordained, that of all persons, who shall be retained to serve the king, their covenants shall be put into writing, and sent into the Exchequer to remain on record: so that when persons come to account thereof at the Exchequer, they shall be received, and have allowance on their account, according to the contents of their covenants; so that by the sight of the same the barons shall do right to the party, according as reason demandeth. And if any thing be due to them on the said account, that thereof, by certificate of the same Exchequer, the treasurer and the chamberlains shall make payment or assignment, without any other warrant by the great or privy seal.

This shews what the course was before; and in this particular case makes a provision which is wholly new, viz. that upon a certificate of the barons the treasurer and chamberlains may pay: in all other cases the law is left open, and a great or privy seal is requisite to warrant a payment, notwithstanding any certificate of the barons.

So much to shew the stat. 5 R. 2. did introduce a new law.

As to the other thing which was mentioned, as if the stat. 5 R. 2. might be extended by an equitable construction to give the barons power to order the payment of money out of the receipt, in such manner as in the cases now before the court; I must say, I cannot see any the least colour for such a notion.

The power is most directly restrained to the receiving of pleas in discharge of persons impeached for debts, or accounts; and can never be extended to cases where parties come as plaintiffs, to recover demands originally against the king: nor is there the authority of any law-book pretended to warrant such interpretation.

If then the power of the barons was so short and restrained, in matters relating to the taking and stating the accounts of the revenue, (which is acknowledged to have been their antient and proper business,) that they were in so very many cases to expect an additional authority under the great or privy seal; can it be thought, that at the same time they were intrusted with such a jurisdiction as is now contended for, of sending orders requiring the treasurer and chamberlains to make payment at the receipt, when persons demanded of them to inroll and allow their grants and order such payments?

I have caused the liberate rolls, and the bundles of petitions at the Tower, to be searched from the beginning of king John's time, as low as the records there go, and have had some extracts made of them; and during all that time, I cannot find that any payments were made at the receipt of the Exchequer, but by warrant under the great or privy seal.

There are infinite numbers of writs to be found, for payment of sums of money for wages, for service done, for debts owing, and for almost all occasions which can be imagined to occur; but for every one of these, how small soever, the warrant is either a great or privy seal.

In like manner, the warrants for payment of all annuities, fees, and salaries, tho' granted by letters patent under the great seal, yet were, from time to time, directed to be paid by writs under the great or privy seal.

If the payment was, by the letters patent, to be at the receipt of the Exchequer, the liberate went to the treasurer and chamberlains: if it was to be paid by the customers, or the sheriff, there was a liberate directed to the officer who was to pay, and a writ de allocatione facienda, directed to the treasurer and barons, to allow of such payment by the sheriff or customer, which writ of allowance recited the liberate. Reg. 192, 193.

Rot. lib. 43 H. 3. m. 1. There is a liberate de thesauro nostro dilecto & fideli nostro Hugoni de Bigod, justiciario nostro mille marcas, que sibi per magnates de concilio nostro sunt premissa, percipiend' per annum ad scaccarium nostrum, ad se sustentandum in officio justiciarii nostri.

The great station of the person, and the authority by which the annuity was granted, was not enough without a particular warrant for payment from the king under his seal.

So all along in the liberate rolls, 55 H. 3. m. 1. 1 E. 3. m. 3. 1 E. 2. m. 4. 4 E. 3. m. 3. &c. there are liberates for the salaries of judges: liberate de thesauro nostro dilecto & fideli nostro Stephano Heyne, uni justiciar' nostrorum in banco, viginti lib' de termino S. Mich' prox' præterito de annuo feodo suo 40 librar', quas ei concessimus percipiend' per annum ad scaccarium nostrum ad sustentationem suam in officio justiciar', quamdiu steterit in eodem. Nay the barons of the Exchequer themselves, in those ages, never once thought of directing the treasurer and chamberlains to pay annuities and salaries, tho' granted to themselves under the great seal; but pursued the same method that others did, and procured liberates for their salaries of 40 marks, as all other subjects, in the like cases, did.

Rot. lib. 1 Ed. 2. m. 2. Liberate Will'o de Carlton, uni baron' nostrorum de scaccario nostro, viginti marcas de termino pasche prox' præterito, de annuo feodo suo quadraginta marcarum, quod ei concessimus per literas patentes percipiend' in officio suo supradicto.

The like are to be found, 4 Ed. 1. m. 3. 1 R. 2. m. 15. 1 H. 4. m. 7. 1 H. 5. m. 6. And when payment was not made according to the command of these writs, the method was not then to go to the barons of the Exchequer, but to apply to the king by petition for another writ to enforce the former. Rot. lib. 2 Ed. 1. 20. m. 4. Mandamus vobis, quod dilecto & fideli nostro Roger de Brabazon, nupur capitali justiciario Edwardi, quondam regis Angliæ, patris nostri, ad placita coram eodem patre nostro, liberetis, juxta tenorem brevium dicti patris nostri de liberate que penes vos inde resident in scaccario antedicto.

And the like writ may be found to enforce a former liberate in the case of the earl of Oxford, Rot. lib. 1 Ed. 3. m. 11 and in other places.

The like course also appears to be taken in the case of the converted Jews. 2 Ed. 2. Ryley 517.

I will make mention of one more precedent, which is the letters patent granted 2 H. 6. which are to be found in the patent rolls of that year, and also in a schedule annexed to the parliament roll. In which the king takes notice of the treaty of peace between his father and grandfather, the kings of England and France; and also of the marriage articles of his mother, queen Katherine, the French king's daughter, with king Henry the fifth, A. D. 1420; whereby it was agreed, that she should have for her dower to the value of 40,000 scuta per annum, of which two were to make a noble; which treaty and articles were confirmed in parliament: and then proceeds, by consent of parliament, to grant to the queen divers lands, parcel of the duchy of Guernsey, and county palatine of Chester, and also several annuities out of the alnage, and 2274 l. 18s. 1½d. out of the first profits of the sheriffs and escheators at the receipt of the Exchequer, and out of any other revenue that should be order'd there, to be paid by the hands of the treasurer, in full of her dower, until the king, or his heirs, should grant to her lands and tenements to the same value: et quod eadem mater nostra habeat tot & talia brevia de liberate current', & allocat' dorman', ac alia brevia & warran', quot & qualia ei in hac parte, pro solutione summarum sibi, ut præmittitur, concessorum & assignatarum, & pleniori executione præmissorum, necessaria fuerint & opportuna: et quod cancellarius noster Angliæ, ac custos privati sigilli nostri, & heredes nostrorum, pro tempore existent', brevia & warranta illa de tempore in tempus, quancumque & quotiescunque ex parte præfat' matris nostræ rationabiliter fuerint requisiti, tenore præsentium fieri faciant indilate.

Per ipsum regem in concil' in parl'.

It appears by these, and the former records mentioned, what was the antient and constant method of proceedings in these cases; and that it was not enough to have letters patent under the great seal, for granting the annuity or sum, but that there must be an authority under the great seal or privy seal, to warrant any payment thereupon: otherwise the parliament, when they had been making such an extraordinary provision for the security of the queen, would have taken a shorter method, and have sent her to the barons of the Exchequer for ready payment in case of arrears.

I might also mention the case of another queen, Johan' the relict of Hen. the 4th, who in her petition in parliament, in the second year of Hen. the 6th, Rot. Parl. 2 H. 6. 11, 35. (whereby she prays to be restored to her dower, which had been seized in the seventh year of Hen. the 5th, and was afterwards ordered to be restored in the tenth year of his reign, but could not be done effectually without the assistance of an act of parliament,) concludes with a prayer, that for the time to come she may have, en la cancellerie nostre seigneur le roy, & ses heirs & successeurs, si bien lettres de liberate currentes, & allocate dormanx, come autres lettres patentes, & choses en celle partie al dite royne besoignable; which is granted.

This was then the method, and has been continued to this day; and no treasure is, or can be issued out of the receipt, without such a warrant under the great or privy seal.

'Tis true, in time liberates current, and dormant writs of allowance grew more common, so that the suing out of new writs in every particular case became less frequent. And it is also true, that of later times, more general privy seals have been brought into use, authorizing at once the issuing of several payments; which has been practised especially since the beginning of the reign of queen Elizabeth. But the thing in substance is the same: no money is issued out of the receipt, without the authority of the great or privy seal; nor is there any more waiving the applying to the person of the king than before: no payments being made upon those general privy seals, but by virtue of the king's particular warrants counter-signed by the lord treasurer, or commissioners of the treasury.

I have shewn what were the methods anciently taken by subjects for obtaining payment of annuities granted by the crown; and that these methods, in the manner I have mentioned, have been continued down to this time.

It has also been observed, how narrow the jurisdiction of the barons of the Exchequer was at common law; unless where their authority was enlarged by writs under the great seal, or by the king's answer to petitions in parliament: and that the enlargement of their jurisdiction by the stat. 5 R. 2. added no new powers in relation to the matters in question.

The next statute, which does considerably enlarge the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, is that of 33 H. 8. c. 39; which gives several new powers, ers, of great consequence, to the Exchequer, and to several other courts which were then in being: but I did not observe that it was insisted on, that any of the clauses of that act extend to this case; and therefore I will not go about to answer what is not, nor I think can be objected.

Indeed, if I did not mistake my lord chief justice, he insisted that the power which the barons of the Exchequer have taken upon them to exercise in this case, must be warranted by the common law, as originally incident to a court of revenue.

But, upon the best search I could make into the records of the Exchequer, I have not found any thing which does in the least countenance this power supposed originally incident to a court of revenue, which has been exercised in these cases, but was never exercised before: unless about the time of the dissolving of the court of Augmentations, in the first year of queen Mary, and the annexing it to the court of Exchequer; when somewhat of this nature was done in the court of Exchequer, with respect to some cases which were formerly under the survey of the court of Augmentations; the reason of which I shall shew hereafter, and that the same is no way applicable to the causes before us.

I do not forget that it was urged, as of weight to prove this power in the barons, that the course is, at the end of every term, for the barons to send liberates down to the receipt for necessities of the Exchequer. But of that an account was given by my lord chief justice of the Common Pleas; and I shall shew yet more clearly, that the writ imports no more than a certificate of the quantum of the expence, and has been never look'd upon as a warrant for the payment.

It is strange, if this power was vested in the barons by the common law, that no subject should once apply to them for relief. It is plain there were occasions for such applications. Annuities we see were in arrear, and writs of liberate were disobeyed; and yet nothing does appear, before the first year of queen Mary, that the barons sent down writs to the treasurer and chamberlains to do their duty, and issue money out of the receipt.

Since the 15th of queen Elizabeth, when sir Thomas Wroth's case was, one hundred and twenty years are past; and since that time, especially since the beginning of the reign of king James the first, more and greater annuities and pensions have been granted than from the foundation of this monarchy, and with as full and liberal clauses as in the cases now in question; and annuities and pensions have been worse paid than in ancient times. Yet no man, since that time, has come to the barons to recover his arrears, according to these precedents of Nevil and Wroth: and yet, the remedy (admitting the law to have been so settled in those cases) is more ready and easy to be had than in any action against a common subject in any case. Admitting this jurisdiction might have slept unobserved in the more ancient times, yet after two cases settled so solemnly as those of Wroth and Nevil, it seems very strange that no patentee, who was unpaid, and could not recover the arrears of his annuity any other way, should once think of desiring the barons to inroll and allow his letters patent, and order payment to him out of the receipt.

As therefore a constant and fixed course of the Exchequer is the law of that court, and indeed the law of the land; so the negative argument hath its force, that what has not been at all practised in the court, especially in relation to cases which happen very frequently, cannot be taken to be the law, or course of the court.

So far are we from having infinite precedents, (which, by what is said in the case in Plowd. 321. a. and Land's case, 2 Co. 16, 17. and in Agard's case, Mo. 565. appear to be requisite to give a practice the denomination of the course of the Exchequer;) that we are to seek for a precedent; except some few cases, which, as I said, happened upon the union of the court of Augmentations to that of the Exchequer: and of these not one has been cited in any law book, as an authority to prove this jurisdiction in the Exchequer; which is the matter for which they have been so much urged in the arguing of these cases.

III. And now I will proceed to the third thing I mentioned, which was, that as none of the authors, who wrote ex professo upon the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, asserted any such power as this in the barons, and as nothing did appear in any act of parliament, or by any record, which did make out such a power; so I conceived, that no authorities were to be found in any of our law books, which did warrant the judgments in these cases. I shall reserve myself as to the cases of Nevil and of Wroth, and the precedents about that time till hereafter; and shall at present speak to the other cases, which have been urged as authorities, more ancient in point of time.

And those, as I remember, were three; Everle's case, the abbot of Warden's case, and Margery Parker's case.

Some others were spoken of, but they are (as I think) directly against what they were brought to support; and as these three only have been insisted on by my lord chief justice, I shall not think it worth while to take any notice of the rest.

Everle's case was 33 Ed. 1. and is in Ryley 251. The case is this. He petitions king Edward the first, that he would command that an annuity of ten marks, which king Henry, father of the king who now is, had granted to him, and John his brother, et quod donum rex nunc eis per literas suas confirmavit, et unde habet breve currens de liberate in custodia thesaurarii & camerarii de seaccario, should be paid to him with the arrears. — Ita responsum est, habeat breve de cane thes. & baronibus de seaccario, quod videant cartam & faciant justitiam, habito respectu ad breve currens.

Upon this case two inferences were made.

1st. That the court of Exchequer might hold plea of an annuity granted by the king, and might relieve the party.

2dly. That the court of Exchequer might compel the treasurer and chamberlains to make payment of such an annuity.

Let us see if either of these conclusions are warranted from this case; and whether upon examination it will not appear to be a strong authority to shew, that there is no legal course to enforce the payment of an annuity, though granted under the great seal, without applying to the person of the king by petition.

No circumstance is wanting to make that case stronger than the cases before us.

There was a grant of an annuity under the great seal from the king's predecessors, as there is in this case: there was also a confirmation from the king then reigning, which is wanting in the cases before the court: and, more than that, there was a liberate current lodged with the treasurer and chamberlains.

If in any case of a demand of the arrears of an annuity, granted by the crown, the party might go to the barons for an order for payment, Everle was ripe for it.

But such a method of enforcing payment was unknown at that time, as has been shewn already, and therefore Everle proceeds in the common course: he applies by petition to the king, and the king endorses the petition, that a writ under the great seal should be directed to the treasurer and barons, empowering them to consider the letters patent, and do him right, respect being had to the liberate.

No jurisdiction in the barons can be inferred from thence, nor power of commanding the treasurer. The great seal is the commission by which they act. The same writ, which impowers the barons to consider the letters patent, impowers the treasurer to issue the money; and that not as the barons should appoint, but it was to be with respect to the liberate, which was to determine where the payment was to be made; whether at the receipt of the Exchequer, or by levying tallies on the inferior officers concerned in the receipt of particular branches of the revenue.

But to take off the force of such an answer, it was urged, that this petition was not a petition of right, but of complaint against the king's officers. And to shew that it was so, it was said, that if it had been a petition of right, it must have had another indorsement, viz. soit droit fait al partie, and then have been sent into Chancery; and that in such cases the petition is the original upon which the proceeding is; and that petitions of right must be so answered.

As to this; in the first place, there needs not much labour to shew that this was not a petition of complaint. It imports nothing like it. The petitioner states his case; he prays what he wanted, and what was necessary, and it was granted him; that is, a warrant under the great seal, empowering the respective proper officers, the barons, to see if he had right, and the treasurer, if it were so, to pay him his arrears. Nobody is complained of in the petition, and nobody is blamed in the answer: a writ is to go, the charter is to be seen, and justice is to be done.

In the second place, the answer given to this petition is a very proper answer to a petition of right. And therefore there was no ground to say that this was not a petition of right, because the answer was not general, soit droit fait.

There are more petitions to the king in Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria, than in all the books which are printed; and throughout the whole book there is not one in twenty which is so answered; and yet nothing is so plain as that these were petitions of right.

It were endless to cite particulars, there being scarce a leaf in the book which does not shew what I assert.

And if more authorities were wanting, the bundles of petitions in the Tower, which I have caused to be looked into, are full of petitions of right, otherwise answered than in those general words.

The truth is, the manner of answering petitions to the person of the king was very various: which variety did sometimes arise from the conclusion of the party's petition; sometimes from the nature of the thing; and sometimes from favour to the person: and according as the indorsement was, the party was sent into Chancery, or the other courts.

If the indorsement was general, soit droit fait al partie, it must be delivered to the chancellor of England, and then a commission was to go to find the right of the party; and that being found, so that there was a record for him, thus warranted, he is let in to interplead with the king: but if the indorsement was special, then the proceeding was to be according to the indorsement in any other court. This is fully explained by Stamford in his treatise of the prerog. cap. 22.

The case Mich. 10 H. 4. n° 8. is full as to this matter. The king recovers in a quare impedit by default against one who was never summoned; the party cannot have a writ of deceit without a petition. If then, says the book, he concludes his petition generally, que le roy luy face droit, and the answer be general, it must go into the Chancery, that the right may be inquired of by commission; and, upon the inquest found, an original writ must go directed to the justices to examine the deceit; otherwise the justices, before whom the suit was, cannot meddle: but if he conclude his petition especially, that it may please his highness to command the justices to proceed to the examination, and the indorsement be accordingly, that had given the justices a jurisdiction. They might in such case have proceeded upon the petition without any commission, or any writ to be sued out; the petition and answer indorsed giving a sufficient jurisdiction to the court to which it was directed. And as the book I have mentioned proves this, so many other authorities may be cited.

Ex Bund. Pet. Parl. an. 4. Ed. 3. n. 64. John Ibe, abbot of Feverham, petitions the king, setting forth that his predecessor, in the reign of Ed. 2. in regard of the good service of sir Barth. de Baddlesmere, had released to the said sir B. B. for his life 4 l. 16 s. 4 d. of the rents, customs and services of 300 acres which he held in gavelkind of the abbot and convent; and that the land remained in the king's hands by the forfeiture of the said sir B. B.; and that the rents and customs were in arrear, after the death of the said sir B. B. for four years whilst the land so remained in the king's hands: and prays, that the king would be pleased to send to the barons of the Exchequer, that if by inquest to be taken, it should be found that this rent was due to the abbot and his successors, as the right of the church, after the death of sir Bartholomew, the king's officers, who were in possession of the lands during the minority of the heir, might answer them the rent for that time. And the petition is indorsed, soit coste petition.

petition manda as tresorer & barons de l'eschequer, que eux appellez que sont estre appellez, & oyes les raisons, facent droit.

To the like effect is the answer to the petition of Manent Franceys in the same year, n. 9.

And as the indorsements upon petitions of right were various, according to the nature of the case, so above all others they were different in the cases belonging to the revenue; and, I think, there is not an instance to be found where such petitions were answered, soit droit fait aux parties.

Sometimes the indorsement is, mandetur ista peticio thes. & bar' de scaccario & sequatur coram eis. Ryley 408. Or, sequatur coram thesaur' & baronibus de scaccario & ibi faciant eis justitiam super contentis in petitione. Ryley 408, 423.

So upon the petition of the abbot of Feverham the indorsement is, soit ceste petition manda devant tres' & barons del eschequer, & manda a eux que oye la pleynte le dit abbe, face droit. Ryley 646.

Sometimes, mandetur per breve de magno sigillo thes. & baron' de scac' quod contineat effectum petitionis, &c. Cottingham's case, Ryley 402.

Sometimes, habeat bre' de can' thes. & baronibus de scac' quod fiat secundum formam petitionis, & ita rex vult. Walter's case, Ryley 259.

When there was no doubt likely to arise of the parties title, as in Aynsham's case, (who petitioned for money due for work done at Carnarvan castle,) the barons are not taken notice of, but the answer is, fiat bre' de can' de liberate thesaurario & camerariis quod liberent ei tantam summam & onerent Hugonem Camerarium de Carnarvan. Ryley 251.

Sometimes the chancellor of the Exchequer is joined: as in Ryley 249. The bishop of Ely petitions the king, that one Pecche his tenant, who held of him four knights fees, parcel of his barony, had granted the same fees to the king; and that he, the bishop, was ready to make out his title: the answer is, sequatur coram thesaurario cancellario & baronibus de scaccario, & si ita sit tunc thes. & bar' conveniant cum eo super hoc, ita quod ecclesia conservetur indemnis, & super hoc fiat bre' de can': et prius inquiratur per que servicia maneria tenentur & de quo &c. cum omnibus circumstantiis.

Sometimes the justices are joined, as in the case of the abbot and convent of Hide, Ryley 256. Who petition, that they had, by mistake, acknowledged the king's title upon a quare impedit brought in the king's name; and pray that they might be admitted to prosecute their right to the said advowson, or that the king upon a gracious fine would restore them to the advowson: the answer is, fiat bre' can' thes. & bar' de scac' quod vocatis justiciariis audiant rationes abbatis. Et si abbas ostendere poterit coram eis per cartas vel monumenta vel alias evidencias quod habet jus in dicta advocacione, tunc vult rex quod thes. & bar' per consilium justiciariorum copiant aliquem finem de abbate & conventu, & reddatur eis dicta advocatio non obstante judicio inde prius reddito pro rege.

And in the like manner on the petition of Floria, the widow of Thomas Belhouse, the answer is, habeat bre' de can' thes. & bar' de scac' quod visa carta sua de conjuncto feofamento &c. faciant secundum quod de jure fuerit faciendum, & secundum quod hactenus usitatum fuerit in regno: et quod hoc fiat per consilium justiciariorum. Ryley 253.

That these were petitions of right of several natures is not to be denied, and yet the general answer is given to none of them.

So that when Everle's case is considered, it seems to be a good authority to prove, that in cases of this nature the subject had a proper remedy by a petition of right to the person of the king. And if in these cases now depending, the parties had taken the course to have sued by such petition, and had been so answered, Everle's case might have been properly cited as an authority: but then, as in almost an infinite number of other cases, the answer to the petition is a warrant for a writ under the great seal; and that writ gives a jurisdiction to the treasurer and barons to act according to the tenor of it.

The next case insisted on, was the abbot and convent of Warden's case. Ryley 262. That case is thus: the petitioners pray a remedy, quod ubi rex Henricus, pater regis nunc, per cartam suam eis concessisset viginti marcas annuas pro damnis que fecit in boscis ipsorum tempore obsidii castri de Bedeford, de quibus viginti marcas annuis seisis fuerunt ad totam vitam dicti regis Henrici, & etiam tempore regis nunc usque ad viginti annos ex nunc, &c. The answer is, veniant per bre' ad scaccarium & ostendant cartam, & ubi assignatio facta fuit ejusdem pecunie, & fiat justitia per thes. & bar'.

Here was an annuity granted upon a valuable consideration by the king's father: it had been answered during the time of the king who granted it, and for thirteen years during the reign of king Edward himself; and yet the payment had been stopped for twenty years together. No other remedy was then thought of for the grantee, but to apply by petition of right to the king: and the king's answer is, let a writ under the great seal go to the treasurer and barons; let the charter be produced; let the petitioner shew upon which branch of the revenue the annuity is charged; and let them do justice.

One might challenge any body to produce a case in itself more like the present cases than this of the abbot of Warden, or more different in the remedy taken by the parties. If the same method had been pursued in the cases before us, as was by that abbot and convent, this case would have been a good precedent. But here the suitors pass by the king, and come directly to the barons; who proceed to act without being authorized under the great seal, as in that case, and command their superior officers, who, according to the precedent, ought to have been authorized, together with them, to have done their respective parts for the relief of the petitioner.

The next book that was cited was Trin. 9 H. 6. 12, 13. Margery Parker's case; and this was an authority upon which much weight was laid. The case, as it appears in the book, was thus.

Margery Parker brought a writ of annuity against the queen, for 20l. which she had granted to her for life, to receive de quadam summa assignata in partem dotis ipsius regine de magna custuma London; by the hands of the collectors of the same customs.

The question in the case was, if this grant, so worded, was an annuity, and did charge the person of the queen.

In the debate of that question it is said by Babington, that the letters patents, in that case, were no more than an acquittance to the customers to discharge them of so much; and that if the customers did not pay the queen, she had no action against them, but must sue for her payment to the barons of the Exchequer.

Cotesmore says, if that be so, then the queen's person must be charged, otherwise the grantee would be without remedy.

Rolf said, the grantee might sue in the Exchequer for her pension, as the queen might.

But after all this discourse amongst them, the plaintiff had judgment to recover the annuity and the arrears: so that no regard was had to this supposed remedy mentioned by Babington, but the judgment was given against the queen.

This, at most, was but a thing dropt by Babington, in the debate of the case, and seems to be very crude and undigested: for he neither says how she was to sue, nor whether he meant more than that she was to sue by a motion to the court, (in which vulgar sense sometimes the word suit is taken, as my lord chief justice Treby observed;) nor what remedy the barons could give her.

It appears to be but a sudden saying: and, perhaps, the judges of the Common Pleas might not be so perfectly ready in the course of proceedings relating to the revenue, upon the sudden starting of the question.

All that can be concluded of certainty from that case, as far as I see, is, that Margery Parker brought a writ of annuity against the queen, and had judgment to recover.

IV. Having insisted thus far in shewing that I have met with nothing in the authors, who have wrote upon the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, or in the law books, or in the records, which countenance such a power as is assumed by the barons of the Exchequer in these cases; I shall mention a fourth thing which confirms my opinion, viz. that in the oath of the barons, there is nothing expressed which does relate to any such trust lodged in them.

And, perhaps, there is not a better measure to be taken of what is the natural and proper business of these ancient officers, than what is compendiously and significantly expressed in the oaths, which have with great care and wisdom been formed and instituted for them to take.

The oath of the lord chancellor, the oath of the lord treasurer, and of the treasurer of the Exchequer, (which are both the same,) of the keeper of the privy seal, of a privy councillor, of the chamberlains and other officers of the Exchequer, are as adequate descriptions of the duty and business of those several officers, as can be met with elsewhere.

The oath of the judges does amount to a very conclusive account of their duty: and the barons of the Exchequer have a known and undisputed jurisdiction as to all matters contained in the oath which they take.

They are truly to charge and discharge the people: they are upon no consideration, nor by any ingene to let the king's right; nor to disturb or respite the right of any other persons contrary to law; nor to put the king's debts in respite, where they may be levied: they are to speed the king's business before all others: for no gift to conceal, disturb, or let the king's profit: to take nothing of any person to delay or deliver the people, but to do it, as they may, without hurt to the king: to redress what they think may turn to the prejudice of the king, and if they cannot to discover it to him.

But this great and important point of commanding the treasurer, and other officers of the receipt to do their duty, and to issue money out of the receipt of the Exchequer, according to their opinions, is not mentioned in the oath; nor such guard, for the king's security, set upon this transcendent power as there is upon all the rest of their business: and yet, if they have such a power, it is of a higher nature, and much greater consequence, than all the rest of their duty taken together.

The public treasure is of the highest estimation in the consideration of the law. Sir Edward Coke, 11 Rep. 91. b. says, it is the ligament of peace, the sinews of war, and the preserver of the honour and safety of the realm: consequently the power of issuing this treasure is of the highest importance.

The lord treasurer (whose known business it is,) is expressly sworn truly to keep and dispend the king's treasure; but if this notion prevails, he must from time to time dispend that treasure according to the opinion and directions of other officers, who are unsworn in that point.

V. In the fifth place I shall observe, that to suppose a power lodged in the barons to issue writs requiring the lord treasurer, or the treasurer of the Exchequer to do their duty, is to suppose a direct absurdity in the original institution of the Exchequer; since it is to invest the barons, who are subordinate, with a right of commanding their superior officers.

In the Mirror cap. 1. § 14. it is said, that the business of the barons is done under the view or inspection of a sovereign, who is the treasurer of England.

The words of Gervasius Tilburienfis, speaking of the treasurer in his chapter of that officer, are; in omnibus enim & per omnia, que vel in inferiori scaccario vel in superiori geruntur, ipsius sollicita diligentia necessaria est. Dial. de Scacc. lib. 1. c. 5.

Upon the constitution of a treasurer, there goes a writ under the great seal to the barons, as well as other officers, to be attendant upon him, as my lord chief justice Coke sets it down, 4 Inst. 105.

The phrase that he uses to the barons is, we will and require you; so it appears ex parte Remem. regis, pasch. 3 Ed. 6. Rot. 4. where sir Roger Cholmley brings into court a writing under the seal of the duke of Somerfet, then lord treasurer, in that form.

The next officer in order is the treasurer of the Exchequer, who is commonly the same person with the treasurer of England.

These two offices have gone so long together, that it is no easy matter to distinguish what is the proper business of the one and of the other. It seems to be the treasurer of the Exchequer, to whom the record, which is cited by sir Edward Coke, 4 Inst. 105. is to be applied; because he mentions that his letters patent are recited in the writ: for it is the treasurer of the Exchequer who is constituted by letters patent; as the lord treasurer is by delivery of the white staff, and, as the same sir Edward Coke says, in former times by delivery of the keys of the Treasury. 4 Inst. 104.

Mich. 14. Eliz. Rot. 355. ex parte Remem. reg. The queen sends her writ to the barons, informing them that she had constituted sir William Cecil, lord Burleigh, treasurer of the Exchequer, and commands them to be attending upon him, prout decet.

I might add, if it were necessary in a matter so very plain, that his superiority appears in all the writs directed to them, in all which he is first named.

The next officer, in point of order, is the chancellor of the Exchequer.

After him are the chamberlains; which was antiently an office of very high dignity, and trusted to persons of the highest quality in the kingdom: but the office being such as might be executed by deputies, the chamberlains by degrees made themselves useless, by leaving all the business to their deputies; the consequence of which was, the office itself sunk by degrees to little more than a name. This might be easily shewn, if it were not to digress; but that they are named before the barons in divers writs and acts of parliament is certain.

The act of 26 H. 8. c. 3. which gives the first-fruits to the crown, observes that order throughout, treasurer, chancellor, chamberlains and barons.

I could mention many other acts and authorities. But I am sensible it is but an ungrateful subject to be lessening the rank of officers, who preside in one of the great courts of Westminster, and at the same time that this is not very necessary; since it will be granted that the treasurer of England, and the treasurer of the Exchequer, are certainly superior to the barons; which is enough for me to found myself upon, in saying that it carries a very great absurdity, that superior officers, in the proper business of their office, should be under the command of other officers of the same court, who are acknowledged to be inferior to them.

It must be confessed to be true, as my lord chief justice observed, that if my lord chief baron has a suit in the court of Exchequer, he must submit to the judgment of the barons: and I readily own the treasurer himself, and every body else who comes into that court as a suitor, must submit to the judgment of the court; for as a suitor he can be considered no otherwise than any other private person; and is not acting in his office. But then it must be granted, that all the other barons together have no power of commanding the chief baron as such; and consequently nothing can be inferred from thence to take away the absurdity which must ensue in supposing that the barons of the Exchequer, who in the order of the Exchequer are placed below him, can command the treasurer to do his duty, and issue out the king's money according to their judgments.

It has been said upon this occasion that it is not the barons, but the king's writ, which the treasurer must obey. And it is most true, when the king's pleasure comes signified to him under the great or privy seal, he must obey it; because these are the fixed methods whereby the king's pleasure is to be known for the issuing of money: but that is no answer to the impropriety of his being commanded to act by writ, which comes to him under the seal of his subordinate officers only; nor a proof that such writ is an authority for him to act by, much less an obligation upon him to act according to the tenor of it.

I will only add, to shew the absurdity of the notion that the barons can command the treasurer by their judgment, that even that judgment of theirs is put under the correction of the treasurer; for the law has made the lord chancellor and treasurer the judges, who are to determine whether the judgments of the barons be erroneous, or not. Can any thing be more incongruous than to say, the barons by their judgment can require the treasurer to do a thing, and the treasurer can review that judgment, and determine whether it be fit for him to do it, or not?

It was said further, that the treasurer of the Exchequer is inferior to the court held before the barons, and that he is only ministerial as to Common Pleas. All that I shall say to this assertion is, that it was only said, and not proved; and therefore, till I shall hear upon what reason the assertion is founded, I will consider it no further.

VI. The sixth thing which I shall mention is, that the Exchequer, if it be considered as it comprehends the whole business of the revenue, as well relating to the exitus as the introitus, may be taken as one entire body, of which the treasurer is the head, and all the subordinate officers are parts and members; and in this extent and latitude it is treated of by Gervasius Tilburyensis: but if it be considered in its several parts, as to what is entrusted distinctly to the treasurer, and chamberlains, and what is put under the direction and government of the barons, it comprehends distinct courts, and such as have no proper communication one with another; tho' perhaps, as to some things, the treasurer, chamberlains, and barons, are intrusted jointly; as my lord chief justice Coke, 4 Inst. 105. says they are with the custody of the judicial records.

That the Receipt of the Exchequer is a court, and wholly under the treasurer, appears by the oaths of the officers belonging to it.

Particularly in the Black Book, the oath of the writer of the tallies is, truly to write all the tallies, and counter-tallies of all payments and assignments in the Court of Receipt; and to give attendance and dispatch, according to the ancient custom of that court.

Officers of the receipt are sworn to be faithful and true to the lord treasurer; as appears by the oath of the lord treasurer's clerk, or auditor of the receipt. Book of Oaths, 20. 21.

The under-treasurer is sworn to serve the king in the Exchequer, and in the receipt of the same; and to survey and order the receipts of all sums of money paid to the king's use in the said receipt, and the issue of the same. Book of Oaths, 212.

The chamberlains are to enter and ingross the receipts of all monies received to the king's use at the receipt, as also the payments of the same; and not to assent to the deliverance of any of the king's money in the Treasury, without sufficient warrants. Book of Oaths, 219.

If any orders are fit to be abolished or altered in the receipt, or any new orders to be made, it is to be done by the lord treasurer; and usually with the concurrence of the chancellor and under-treasurer; but the barons are not consulted, or consenting. This appears in the Black Book, fol. 76. 13 Eliz.

If the king thinks fit to command by privy seal, which has been often done, that any new order or method should be observed in any part of the receipts, it is usually directed only to the treasurer and the chancellor and under-treasurer. And if it be thought proper that it should be published and inrolled in the court of Exchequer, to the end that all officers and accountants might the better take notice of it, the lord treasurer and chancellor and under-treasurer come into the court of Exchequer, and the treasurer commands it to be published and inrolled, together with his own assent to it, and the assent of the chancellor and under-treasurer. But no notice is taken of the barons, tho' present, in any part of the business.

The whole form of this is particularly mentioned in the Black Book, fol. 82. 39 Eliz. when the lord Burleigh was treasurer.

Add to this, that according to the constitution of the Exchequer, the barons are not at all privy to the state of the treasure in the receipt, nor by law ought to be made privy; so that all they act must be merely as suitors apply to them, without any knowledge of what there is in the receipt to answer the writ, or of the publick occasions of the state, from which it may be fatal to divert the money in the king's coffers.

VII. Seventhly, this method of proceeding does directly break through several received notions, which have been looked upon, in all ages, as maxims and rules of law.

As first, that no part of the king's treasure could be issued but by warrant under the great or privy seal; for which reason it is, that the law has put such guard upon these seals, that the counterfeiting them is high treason.

Gervasius of Tilbury, says in direct terms, Dial. de scacc. lib. 1. c. 6. thesaurarius & camerarii, nisi regis expresso mandato, vel presidentis justiciarii, susceptam pecuniam non expendant: oportet enim ut habeant auctoritatem rescripti regis de distributa pecunia. The president justiciarius was the custos regni; that great officer was sometimes called by that name, and sometimes by other names. And lest there should be a mistake of what is said of the president justiciarius, he is careful to set the matter right by adding, that what was said as to him is only to be understood de brevibus presidentis justiciarii cum rex absens sit, & cum sigilli ejus impressione jura regni statuuntur. Ibid.

I will not trouble myself to cite authorities to prove so known a position, as that no money can be issued out of the receipt but by warrant of the great or privy seal. I will only mention what was said by my lord chief justice Coke, in his report of sir Walter Mildmay's case, in the earl of Devonshire's case: and I choose to mention it, because the reporter was cotemporary to the judgment, given in the case of Wroth, if not in that of Nevil; and that his book was published several years after those judgments were given.

Sir Edward Coke says, 11 Rep. 91. b. That it was resolved in that case, that no officer of the king, nor all of them together, can issue out or dispose of the king's treasure ex officio, tho' it be for his honour or profit, unless by a warrant from himself. These words are as apposite to the present occasion, as if they had been framed on purpose to destroy such a notion as is contended for in the cases before us.

The law has intrusted the king himself only with his treasure, when once it comes into his coffers, which is the receipt; and only he, or such as are empowered by his warrant, can dispose of it: no court has any thing to do with it.

This case of sir Walter Mildmay was adjudged, Mich. 37 and 38 Eliz. after the two cases of Nevil and Wroth; but not so long after as that it could be possible either of those cases should be forgotten: and therefore, the barons, who had sir Walter Mildmay's case before them, could not but know it, if the point, now in question, of the authority of the seal of the Exchequer, had been settled in those cases of Wroth and Nevil; or if in the debate of those cases it was taken to be known law, and the course of the Exchequer. According to sir Edw. Coke's report, the question was directly before them, what seals of the king might be a sufficient warrant to issue out the king's treasure. One would think upon such a question they should not have forgot the seal of the Exchequer, which, as it seems now to be insisted on, is not only a sufficient warrant, but a better and higher authority than any other, and such as can enforce the issuing of the king's treasure, when the great seal itself fails. Yet there is not the least notice taken of the Exchequer seal in the book. It is laid down there first negatively, that every warrant of the king's is not sufficient: as for instance; his warrant by word of mouth is not; his warrant under the signet is not; and yet, as it is observed there, in some cases the law takes notice of the signet: then affirmatively the book says in express words, the warrant which is sufficient in law to issue the treasure of the king, ought to be under the great or privy seal. 11 Co. 92. a.

To evade the force of this argument, it has been suggested, as if what was found in the law books, to the effect which I have mentioned; was to be understood only of the common and ordinary methods of issuing the king's treasure.

The truth is, if the method now insisted on was a legal method, one would wonder it should not have been a very usual and ordinary one, since it is so very easy and ready for the subject.

I think it might be a sufficient answer to this suggestion to say, that it is an evasion to serve a purpose only, and has no proof or foundation for it to be found in the books.

But if the case, which was then before the court, be considered, there will appear to be no pretence for such a surmise. For the question there was, whether a warrant under the hands of the treasurer, and under-treasurer of the Exchequer, directed to the four tellers, for the payment of 100*l.* per annum to the chancellor of the Exchequer for his extraordinary and necessary services, was good in law; payments having been made according to such a warrant, and the money being demanded back again of the executors of the chancellor of the Exchequer.

Nothing could have been more natural than to have taken notice, upon such an occasion as this, that tho' the treasurer and under-treasurer could not by their warrant empower any payment out of the receipt, yet the barons by their judgment, and by issuing thereupon a writ under the Exchequer seal, could do it. And if the barons, on so fair an opportunity, had omitted to assert this power, yet it is very unlikely that sir Edw. Coke (who in his Reports does not confine himself to the case before before the court, but does generally lay together all the learning in the law which comes under that title, so as to make them in the nature of common-places, should omit to take notice of it: and 'tis yet more unlikely, that he should again make the same omission in his fourth Institutes; where he particularly treats of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, and where it was not only proper but necessary to take notice of it, if he did not intend to leave his work imperfect.

There was another thing said by way of answer to this objection: that, in the case now depending, the judgment of the barons was not properly an issuing of the king's revenue, but that the revenue was issued by virtue of the great seal, and the authority of the letters patent: so that what the court did was but a determining of the right, a judgment that the letters patent were legal, and did bind the successor; and therefore the barons command that the revenue be issued out according to the letters patent.

If it be so, that the letters patent, and not the judgment of the court, are the warrant for issuing the money in this case, then the authority of the barons, as to the issuing of money out of the receipt, is given up.

But what then becomes of the authority of those cases of Nevil and Wroth? What was the warrant upon which the money was issued there? For in neither of those cases was there a warrant of the great or privy seal. And therefore, either those judgments must be founded upon some particular reason proper to those cases; and consequently those cases are not to be applied as precedents for warranting the judgments now in question; or else they prove a direct power in the barons of commanding the treasure out of the receipt, by no other warrant but the Exchequer seal.

If this answer be considered the other way, and it be taken, that the great seal is to be the warrant to the commissioners of the Treasury, in this case, for issuing the money, and not the judgment, or the Exchequer seal, what does this whole proceeding signify? What is done by this judgment? And what is to be done by the writ that is to issue upon it?

The authority of the great seal for the issuing money was the same before the judgment as it continues after: the judgment is drawn up in the words of the letters patent; and what was said before under the great seal, is now said again under the seal of the Exchequer; a seal much less considered in the law: and if after all it be admitted, that the money, if issued, must be by warrant of the great seal, the consequence then must be, that after all these proceedings the thing is but just where it began.

If it be understood, that this writ is no more than a certificate to the lords of the Treasury of the barons opinion, that the letters patent are good in law, and continue in force in the time of the successor, it is perhaps what the barons might properly do: especially, if the question had come judicially before them in any suit depending; or, according as the ancient course was, if a direction had gone under the great seal to the treasurer and them, to have looked into the letters patent, and considered of their validity. But then, it is but a certificate: it is not a judgment upon which a writ of error will lie; and we are all in a mistake, while we are debating here as if a proper judgment was regularly brought before us.

Therefore, I take it for granted, this was said only to make the thing a little more plausible. It looked not only new, but harsh, I will not say absurd, to affirm directly, that if the barons issued out a writ under the Exchequer seal, commanding the lord treasurer to pay a sum out of the receipt, he must obey it; and therefore the letters patent were mentioned. But I think it is plain, unless a writ under the seal of the Exchequer be a good warrant and discharge to the treasurer and chamberlains in point of law if it be obeyed, and be compulsory upon them to obey it, the whole proceedings in this case are ineffectual, and carry things no farther than just where they were when the suits began.

Secondly, The judgments given by the barons in these cases, are not consistent with another known maxim; that when once money is paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, no court has any power over it, nor is there any legal method to fetch it back again; altho', in several cases, if it had not been actually paid into the receipt, it might have been restored to the party.

To this purpose nothing can be more strong than the common cases of reversals of outlawries and judgments; where, tho' by the judgment of reversal, the party is to be restored to all that he has lost; yet whatever has been actually brought into the receipt of the Exchequer is gone past redemption: and yet when the outlawry, or judgment is reversed, it is to all purposes as if it had never been. And these are cases of restitution which are most favoured in law, and the relief extended as far as possible.

In like manner, when upon an office, or inquisition, a title is found for the king, and the mess profits are paid into the receipt, if upon a traverse, or monstrance de droit, judgment be afterwards given for the subject, and an amoveas manus awarded, yet as to profits paid into the receipt there shall be no restitution.

This is so known, that in cases before the barons, where there is a question touching the profits of an estate whereof the title is found for the king, if they conceive a doubt upon a suggestion of a subject's right, which may hereafter appear, they will in discretion direct the money to remain in the chamberlains hands for a time, and not to be paid immediately into the receipt; because when it is once there, it is out of their power, and cannot be brought back again.

It cannot be but that in these cases the law is so. But my lord chief justice endeavoured to assign several reasons, which might distinguish these from other cases. He said, that judgments and outlawries are reversed in the King's Bench, and that the King's Bench cannot send a writ to the treasurer and chamberlains requiring them to pay money out of the receipt; 'tis only the barons can do it: nor can the barons do it in those cases, because the record of the judgment is in the King's Bench, and there is only a transcript in the Exchequer, upon which they cannot send a writ.

I can easily agree, that the King's Bench cannot send a writ to the treasurer and chamberlains to command money out of the receipt of the Exchequer; and I think I have proved there is no such power in the barons: but if the barons have such a power in any case, I am inclined to think it would be no good reason why they might not exercise it in these cases, that they have not the record itself, but only the transcript of the record; because the process of the Exchequer issues every day upon assizes, which are transcripts, or indeed extracts of records only.

As to the other cases, of money levied upon offices or inquisitions found, my lord chief justice observed, that there was a difference between a judgment upon a petition of right, and a judgment upon a traverse, or a monstrance de droit. That in the first case, the judgment was general, that the king's hands should be removed, and the party restored to the possession: but in the other case the judgment was, that the party should be restored una cum exitibus & proficiis inde medio tempore perceptis: and so he compared a judgment on a petition of right to a real action at common law against a subject, in which there were no damages; and a judgment on a monstrance de droit to a possessory action, in which damages were recovered at common law.

To this I answer, that the cases of subjects are not to be compared to the case of the king; and that at the common law, before the statute of articuli super chartas, the subject, in no case of an amoveas manum, could have any judgment for restoring issues, however false the office appeared, as sir Edward Coke expressly affirms. But be that as it may, yet this distinction makes nothing to the present question. For in cases of monstrance de droit or traverses, where the judgment is to restore the party to the mess profits, it is generally expressed unde dicto domino regi nondum est responsum; and where these words are omitted, the same are understood. If the profits remain in the tenants hands, or if they are in transitu in the hands of the receivers, though the receivers have accounted for them, the party is restored to them; but if they are answered into the receipt, they are lost to him. This is affirmed by my lord chief justice Coke, in his commentary upon the statute of articuli super chartas, c. 19. which act was made 28 Ed. 1. and the statute of eschetoribus, which was made the year following. And yet the words of the statute are very full, that upon an ouster le main, because there was no cause to seize, soient les issues pleinement rendus a celui a que la terre demurt, & avera le damage rescueve.

It is not a very difficult matter to find out a seeming reason to support a conclusion one is determined to make; but it is lost time to dispute of the strength of such arguments, where it is easy to come to as much certainty as is consistent with the nature of the thing.

There are many of these judgments upon traverses and monstrance de droit to be found upon record, where the party is to be restored to the possession, una cum exitibus & proficiis inde medio tempore perceptis. If it could be made appear, that upon any such judgment money was paid back out of the receipt of the Exchequer, or if any writ could be produced, requiring the treasurer and chamberlains to make restitution, it would be to me a much more cogent argument, than any new plausible reason which may be assigned. But of this there is no footstep in any antient or modern book. If it never was done, the old known reason will best serve our turn, that it was because the money was paid into the receipt, and then no court had power to intermeddle with it.

VIII. Eighthly, This does seem to be an extraordinary and anomalous method of proceeding, and such as has nothing like it in any other court, either when the subject sues the king, or any other subject.

This method of proceeding takes from the king all possibility of making a defence: for the attorney-general does not come in till the barons have commanded the letters patent to be enrolled; after which the attorney-general could not plead non concessit, as he might have done before; or if he could have pleaded that plea, no venue is laid, and consequently no trial could be had on such issue. And a proper defence being thus taken away, or, which is all one, the trial of it rendered impracticable, no course of any court can make such a proceeding good.

It was confessed, that the legitimization of a case is to be suspected unless there be another like it.

But it was said, that in other courts cases might be found, which might properly be resembled to the proceeding in this case; and the case in Co. Ent. 93. was instanced. I will put that case as it stands upon the record.

A claim is put in by the lord Hunsdon, to a sum of 18 l. 11 s. 8 d. which is charged upon the accounts of the several sheriffs of Kent and Dorset for the last year, for issues out of the Common Pleas and King's Bench; and for fines and amerciaments before the justices of assize; and for issues and amerciaments before the barons of the Exchequer, &c. (the particulars are expressed in the claim;) which were severally set upon his tenants, or resiants within his manor and hundred of Sevensokes, and Coddesheath: all which he claims to belong to him, the persons, upon whom they were severally set, being tenants or resiants within his manor and hundred, as the said sheriff of Kent had testified upon his account.

And he sets out letters patent of Ed. 4. granting to the archbishop of Canterbury, and his successors, the return of writs, and all fines and amerciaments of tenants and resiants within the manor, &c. and so proceeds to shew a title in the archbishop to the fines, &c. with which the sheriff was charged: and then shews the inrollment of these letters patent in the Exchequer, in the third year of Ed. 4; and that Cranmer was seized, in right of his archbishoprick, of the said manor, hundred, and liberties, &c.

Then he sets forth the act for erecting the court of Augmentations, whereby all manors, &c. which H. 8. should purchase, were put under the government of that court: after which act, Cranmer by deed inrolled conveyed the manor and liberties to H. 8. and his heirs; which grant was confirmed by the prior and convent of Canterbury. And then he sets forth the act of 32 H. 8. c. 20. for reviving and continuing liberties and privileges in the hands of the king; by virtue whereof, &c. H. 8. was seized, and died seized: and so conveys a title to Ed. 6. and queen Mary: and that upon her death queen Elizabeth became seized; and that she granted the manor, hundred, and liberties, to him and his heirs males; and that he entered and was seized. He then proceeds to plead an allowance in the Exchequer of these fines and amerciaments to the archbishop of Canterbury, in the time of Ed. 4: and so makes his claim; which the attorney-general confesses.

And thereupon, on view of several records, and for that the sheriff of Kent, upon oath, did testify the matter of fact, that the several persons, on whom the fines and amerciaments were set, were tenants and tenants in the manor and hundred of the lord Hunsdon, the barons adjudge, that the sheriff of Kent should be discharged of 10*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* with which he stood charged upon his account; and that the same be allowed to the lord Hunsdon; and thereupon the sheriff had his quietus.

Upon this case I observe.

1st, That it has no relation to any money in the receipt of the Exchequer.

2^{dly}, This is a proceeding in discharge of the sheriff upon his account: the question being only, if the sheriff should be charged with so much as payable to the king, contrary to what he had testified upon his account on oath. So that this question was the proper business of the barons to determine.

3^{dly}, This claim of the lord Hunsdon's was by way of defence to a demand on the king's part, and not by way of suit of the subject to recover from the king: and this demand, on the king's part, is so far from being founded on the record, that it is contrary to what the sheriff had sworn upon his account.

4^{thly}, This was not a claim which came at that time originally before the court; but was founded upon antient allowances, before made in the court of Exchequer.

5^{thly}, Here was no positive record for the king; it being only a general charge upon the sheriff, and he having discharged himself by oath.

6^{thly}, This is a case directly within the statute 5 R. 2. which empowers the barons to allow the matter pleaded by way of discharge upon account.

By all which it appears, that there is no manner of resemblance in that claim of my lord Hunsdon, to the cases before the court; where the subject comes originally as a plaintiff, and makes a demand of money out of the receipt of the Exchequer.

Another case, cited by my lord chief justice, as a proceeding that might be resembled to the cases now before the court, was that of the lady Broughton; which is entered Trin. 24 Car. 2. Rot. 38. B. R.

There an information was exhibited against the lady Broughton, for divers misdemeanours committed by her, as keeper of the Gatehouse prison at Westminster. Upon not guilty pleaded, a verdict was found against her; and judgment was given, that she should be fined 100 marks, Et quod officium custodis prisonæ prædictæ capiatur in manus domini regis, quousque curia hic consiterit cui et el quibus officium illud de jure spectat, vel quousque curia hic ulterius ordinaverit, salvo jure cujuscunque, &c.

Whereupon the dean and chapter of Westminster come in, and set forth their title to be a corporation; and that king James I. granted to them and their successors, habere prisonam & arrestacon' & imprisonament' omnium hominum arrestat' infra civitat' & libertat' Westm' adeo libere quiete & integre ac in tam amplis modo & forma prout ultimus abbas, &c. in præmissis habuit, to hold to them and their successors to their use for ever, &c. by virtue whereof they were seized de libertatibus habendi prison' & arrestacon' & imprisonamentum omnium hominum infra civitat' & libertat' Westm', ut de feodo & jure, in jure ecclesiæ, &c.

And then they set forth the grant by them to sir Edward Broughton and Mary his wife, of the office custod' prisonæ sue prædictæ, simul cum omnibus feodis, &c. habend' to them, their executors and assigns, for forty years; by virtue of which they were possessed, &c. and that sir Edward died: and that Mary, as survivor, was possessed; and for divers offences, by her committed in the execution of the said office, (whereof she was convicted,) forfeited the said office, prout the record.

Et ea de causa prædictæ dec' & capitul' petunt & calumniant libertat' habendi & disponendi officium prædictæ, &c. Et petunt allocationem libertat' prædictæ, secund' concessionem sic ut prefertur factam; and make the proper averments. The attorney-general confesses their claim, and thereupon they have judgment.

I acknowledge that I am much to seek as to any thing appearing in this record, which is in the least to be resembled to the cases before us.

Judgment was given against the keeper of a prison, of forfeiture of the office for a misdemeanour: by that judgment the office was vacant; but it did not appear to the court in whom the right was of disposing, or exercising the office. Upon such an avoidance, it was necessary for the sake of publick justice, and to prevent the escape of the prisoners, that the office should be taken into the king's hands, till it might appear to the court in whom the right was; but it was only quousque, and with a salvo jure. So that no title to the office is found, or so much as alledged for the king: and when the dean and chapter, in pursuance of the very direction of the judgment, come in, and set out their title, the attorney-general confesses it, and they are put into possession.

I do not see but, notwithstanding either of these two instances, the cases before us stand by themselves; and that the argument against these kind of proceedings does still remain in force, because they are unusual, and of an unprecedented nature, and such as the counsel can scarce find a name for.

In their arguments upon these cases some of the counsel said, that the proceeding was in the nature of a monstrance de droit.

Others, with more circumlocution, styled it, an application to the court of Exchequer, setting forth a right to part of a revenue in charge before them, which the officers under their power refuse to pay.

Others said it was neither a petition, nor a monstrance de droit; for those were only proper when the suit is in disaffirmance of the king's title, but here the subject claims from the king, and complains only of the officer; but they gave it no name.

My lord chief justice was pleased to say that this suit was a monstrance de droit; and, I think, I may affirm that to be the first time it had a certain name. Plowden calls sir H. Nevil's case, a report of a judgment given by the barons, upon the exhibiting to the court of Exchequer, by sir H. Nevil, a deed of grant of the office of keeper.

Vol. XI.

My lord chief justice said, that a monstrance de droit was a common law remedy. He owned, that though several statutes had enlarged the relief, which the subject might have in many cases where there was occasion to interplead with the crown; yet the cases in question did not come within the relief of any of those statutes, but remained the same as at common law. But he said, this suit was a monstrance de droit maintainable at common law, and was the subject's proper remedy when his title appeared upon record. And that the party might in this case maintain his monstrance de droit, and was not put to his petition of right to admit himself out of possession.

1st, Because the right he claimed is not grounded on a matter of fact, but by matter of record; Williamsen claiming by a deed inrolled, and that inrollment directed by the letters patent, which is a matter of record.

2^{dly}, Because the party does not go about to destroy the king's title, but his claim subsists upon the king's title to the excise.

3^{dly}, Because his annuity is not turned to a right, nor devested; and therefore it was not necessary he should go by way of petition.

I will not, at this time, enter into the particular consideration of those reasons. Though I cannot but say, in the first place, it is far from being clear to me, when letters patent direct, that the assignment of one subject to another should be inrolled within thirty days before the auditor of the Receipt, or clerk of the Pells, for a particular purpose, (viz. that it may appear what assignments have been granted,) that such an inrollment does make a record; much less such a record as is equal to that record which intitles the king. And if it be not a record of as high a nature, the subject is put to his petition, and in no case can have a monstrance de droit; as is resolved in Piers Partifield's case, 29 Aff. 31; and is agreed, and declared to be law in the commonalty of Sadlers case. 4 Co. 55. b. and 56. a.

In the second place, I cannot understand, but that a person, who sets up a title to the inheritance of a part of the Excise, and seeks to recover it from the king, does go about to defeat the king's title to that part of the revenue.

Nor will I, in the third place, enter into the debate, whether, as this case is, the annuity be devested or turned to a right. Though I cannot but observe, that a writ of annuity, (and this suit is in the nature of such a writ,) is the highest writ which such a person can pursue; and the judgment given upon that writ is for the whole inheritance, for the time to come, as well as for the arrears: and therefore it might seem, that he who brings it doth admit himself to be devested of the whole.

But I will very plainly own, that after consideration of this argument, with the best application I could use, several doubts remain with me as to the force of it.

As, 1st, Whether a monstrance de droit, in the sense it is now taken, and commonly understood, and as it seems to be applied to these cases, did lie at the common law.

2^{dly}, If that were to be admitted, because I would not dispute about words or names, yet I am not satisfied that this suit can properly be called a monstrance de droit.

3^{dly}, Let this suit have what name it will, yet I think it is not the proper common law remedy, to which the subject was entitled in a case of this nature; but that the party was put to his petition of right.

I. The first thing I shall do, is to shew why it seems doubtful to me, whether such a suit as a monstrance de droit, as it is now understood, did lie at the common law.

I will not be thought to mean, that the subject had not, in several cases, a proper way of defending himself at common law against the king, and by proper application to the courts to obtain an ouster le main. But I do say, wherever the king had a direct title of freehold, or inheritance, appearing for him by matter of record; (whether that record was judicial, or ministerial; or was a conveyance of record; or was a matter of fact found by office of record;) the subject at common law was put to his petition of right, and could not interplead with the king, either by traversing the king's title, or avoiding it by setting up any title of his own: and in this I say no more than what was agreed in the commonalty of Sadler's case. 4 Co. 55. a.

'Tis very true, if the office did not entitle the king to the possession, but only to the bringing of a fire facias; (as if a cessavit per biennium, or a fine by collusion, or the committing of waste, was found against the king's tenant by inquisition;) upon a fire facias brought, the party at common law might come in and defend the possession, by shewing his title, and denying the matter found against him. For it was what the writ itself expressly required; and it would have been very absurd to say he should not be admitted to do that which the very writ required him to do: and by the fire facias he was made privy, and had a day to plead. Kelw. 155. b. 158. a. b.

And therefore such a traverse, or, if that name be better liked, such a monstrance de droit, lay at common law.

In like manner, where the office contained the whole special matter; so that tho' there might be such matter found; as, if it stood alone, would make a title for the king; yet, if there was also found, in the same office, sufficient upon the whole to shew a good title in the subject, the subject might insist upon this matter, and might pray an amoveas manum: because in truth the very record, upon which the king seized, made a title for the party.

As suppose it to be found, that A. did disseize me of lands holden of the king, and that A. aliened in mortmain, or died without heir; in this case, I may pray an ouster le main upon the very record. So, if it be found that the king's tenant, at the time of his death, held an acre of land of me by lease for his life. Kelw. 156. b. 157. a. 158. a.

In like manner, if the title found for the king appears, by the record, to be determinable upon performance of a condition, and that condition appears upon the record to be performed, the party might take advantage of it. 4 Co. 55. a. b.

But as the common law stood, wherever a title for the king only was found by matter of record, tho' it was false, the party could not traverse it.

So

So where a title was found for the king which was true, but it was disclosed in the record, that the subject had a good right, which would avoid the title found for the king; yet in that case the subject could not have been admitted to shew it, but was so far concluded as to be put to his petition of right. 4 Co. 56. a.

Lib. 1. c. 9. I need not mention Bracton's words for this purpose.

Stamford's opinion is expressly, that a monstrance de droit was given by the statute 36 Ed. 3. and did not lie at common law.

Prer. Reg. cap. 21. fol. 71.

And in the case of the corporation of Sadlers, which has been mentioned before, as it is reported by my lord chief justice Anderson, 1 And. 180. 181. num. 216. it is expressly affirmed, that the traverse and monstrance de droit are both given by that statute. Nor do I see, that any thing to the contrary of what I have said is affirmed in the report of this case, by my lord chief justice Coke. Unless it be, that he gives the name of a monstrance de droit to those proceedings, which were always admitted to have been at the common law; that is, where the special matter was so found, as that, upon the same record, it did appear, that the right was in the party, and not in the king: whereas, in proper speaking, it is not the subject there who comes in and shews his right, but the king's own record shews it.

But I think it very plain, that the statute 36 Ed. 3. cap. 13. which gives a traverse in case of offices found, does also give the monstrance de droit; which my lord chief justice Coke himself, in the commonalty of Sadler's case, does agree was not given by the statute 34 Ed. 3. cap. 14. For tho' that statute gave the subject a traverse in some cases, where the office was found by virtue of a writ, or a commission; yet it was defective, even in those cases: for upon the traverse taken, tho' the issue was found for the subject, yet no judgment could be given without a new commission de procedendo ad iudicium. 4 Co. 56, 57.

The words of the stat. 36 Ed. 3. are, that if any one will put in a claim to lands seized by office, the escheator is to send the inquest into Chancery, and a writ is to be delivered to him to certify the cause of the seizure there. And there the party soit oye sans delay de traverser l'office, ou autrement monstrer son droit, & illonques maunde devant le roy, a faire final discussion sans autre maundement.

These words, as I take it, gave the name of monstrance de droit to that sort of proceeding; and I think I may affirm, with Stamford, that no book before this statute did treat any thing of a monstrance de droit. Stamf. c. 21. prer. regis.

That it was this statute which gave the subject a right of interpleading with the king, where an absolute title was found for the king by office; and that the subject is still put to his petition in all cases out of the remedy of that statute, (as in all cases where the king is entitled by a judicial record;) is what appears plainly by the lord Hungerford's case, which is 4 Ed. 4. 21. 22. and also by 9 Ed. 4. 52. and 13 Ed. 4. 8. and by many other cases. I need not be at the trouble of citing them all.

II. But in the second place, suppose it should be admitted, that a monstrance de droit did lie at common law, yet still it remains a doubt to me, how the proceeding in this case can be called by that name.

In cases where an office is found by which the king is entitled to the possession, by the stat. 36 Ed. 3. (and take it for granted at present, in some cases at common law,) the subject may come in and interplead with the king; either by denying the title found for the king, or by shewing his own right, whereby he does avoid the title found for the king.

This is that kind of proceeding which is called a monstrance de droit. And in this sort of proceeding, the subject is in the nature of a defendant, and comes in and pleads to a title found for the king: and the judgment is, quod manus domini regis amoveantur. This appears 1 Co. 157. Digg's case; 4 Co. commonalty of Sadler's case; and by the cases in Co. Entries. So is the case of Coningsby and Malham, in Kelway's Reports, 154. In which case it is said, that the amoveas manus is the end of every suit, where a man comes in to interplead with the king; for without that judgment the land will still remain in the king's hands. Kelw. 158. a.

And therefore, where that judgment cannot be given, the party shall not be admitted to traverse a false office, or to interplead with the king, tho' the case be otherwise such as comes within the remedy of the statute of 36 Ed. 3.

As, where a man has a remainder, or reversion, expectant upon an estate of freehold, without any rent, or profit, and a false office is found of the dying seized of such a remainder, or reversion; he shall not be admitted to traverse this false office, because the judgment cannot be given, quod manus domini regis amoveantur: as was adjudged in the case of the countess of Rutland. 2 Inst. 688.

But in these cases before us, neither does the party ask any such judgment; nor are the judgments, which are brought before the court by these writs of error, any thing like it.

If this be a monstrance de droit, the judgment ought to be such as the law hath ordained in cases of that nature: but here the suit is plainly in the nature of a writ of annuity; the party concludes his demand in the same manner as in a declaration for an annuity, and the judgment is given accordingly.

III. The third thing I will consider is, supposing it were taken for granted, that a monstrance de droit did lie at common law; and that this suit of Williamson's is such a monstrance de droit, whether yet this monstrance de droit be the proper remedy maintainable at common law in a case of this nature? For, as Fineux says, in the case of Coningsby and Malham, Kel. 157. b. 160. the parties have ever so good a right, yet they must come to the possession of what they have a right to by the ordinary method of law; for, says he, if a man owes me money, I cannot take it out of his purse, nor can I recover it by an improper action.

Let us see then what this suit is for; and what was the course taken at common law to recover a thing of this nature.

The suit is for the arrears of an annuity, granted to sir Robert Vyner and his heirs, by the king's predecessors, out of a branch of the hereditary revenue of the crown, and by him assigned to Williamson; as also for the growing payments, that they may be answered from time to time, as they become due.

Now, as far as I can find, by the common law, in all cases where arrears of an annuity, or annual rent or sum, were demanded by the subject from the crown; (whether it was originally granted by the crown out of any part of the revenue; or was issuing out of lands which afterwards came to the crown;) the only remedy, which the subject had for recovering thereof, was by petition to the king.

The authorities are very express and full in this matter.

Suppose a man hath a rent-charge, or a rent-service, or other rent, issuing out of land by prescription, or grant; and this land comes to the king by grant, or forfeiture: in all such cases the owner of the rent is put to his petition to the king, and hath no other remedy whatsoever.

In like manner, if a man be seized of land, and acknowledges a statute, or recognizance, and before execution taken, the estate comes to the king by attainder: or the tenant grants to the king by deed inrolled: in either case the conuzee is put to his petition, and has no other remedy; unless the whole matter be specially found in the office. 4 Ed. 4. 23. Stamford de prerog. regis 75. c. 22. Kelway 155. b.

A man holds lands of the king in chief; and other lands, by knights service and rent, of other lords; and dies, leaving his heir within age: the king seizes the body and lands held in chief; and also the other lands, which the ancestor held of other lords. The heir shall pay his relief to the other lords when he comes to age: and as to the rent during the nonage of the heir, the lords shall sue to the king by petition to have the rent of the lands which are held of them by the heir, who is in ward to the king; and shall have it by this means. So is 13 H. 7. 15. pl. 11. 24 Ed. 3. 24. pl. 5.

And that the law is so, is affirmed in all the abridgments of the case; and particularly Bro. Title Pet. 43. makes a special reference to the statute 2 & 3 Ed. 6. c. 8. of offices.

And that the law continued so till the making of that statute, does sufficiently appear by the statute itself. For in the seventh branch of that act, it is expressly taken notice of, that, in the case abovementioned, the mesn lords would spare the rents due to them for the lands holden of them during the king's possession; and after the heir had sued his livery, would disfranchise him for the arranges, where they should have sued by petition to the king's majesty, to have obtained the same out of the king's hands. And that statute enacts a new relief for the mesn lords; that they should receive the rents, during the wardship, from the king's officers appointed to receive the profits of the ward's lands: and that such officers payment, and the acquittance of the mesn lord, should be a good discharge to the officers.

From hence it is plain, that, before this act, there was no remedy for the mesn lords, but by petition. And it may be observed, that the remedy given is by sending them to the receivers in the country, and not to the receipt of the Exchequer. And this clause does explain the general words of the preamble of that statute: which takes notice, that persons having any rent, common, fee, or other profit appender, out of lands, or tenements, specified in such offices, or inquisitions, were without remedy to obtain or have the same, by any traverse, or other speedy mean, without great and excessive charges, during the king's interest therein.

And since that statute, in the case of Wicks and Dennis, 31 & 32 El. 1 Leon. 190. it was holden by the whole court, that during the queen's possession of the land, the rent-charge issuing out of it is only recoverable by petition: altho' the demand of the rent was agreed to be good; because in his petition the party must shew that he did demand the rent.

And as the law is plainly so, where a person has a title to a rent, by grant of a subject, out of lands which come to the possession of the king; so the case is to all purposes the same, where he has a title to a rent, or yearly sum, by letters patent from the crown.

13 Ed. 4. 5. pl. 15. The king grants a rent out of his manor: the manor is not charged, but the king by petition. These are the words of the book.

And as that book is an express authority that this was the law, so was the practice accordingly.

In 18 Ed. 1. Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria 52. the abbess of Fonte Eboraldi sues to the king by petition for the arrears of an annuity of 10l. per ann. granted by H. 3. to the abbess of that place, and her successors.

In 35 Ed. 1. Ryley 329. is the petition of John Hernigod for the arrears of a rent of 7s. 8d.

So also was Everle's case, and the abbot and convent of Warden's case, before-mentioned.

In like manner, it appears by the same book, that the same method was to be taken for recovering a rent, &c. granted by a subject out of lands which afterwards came to the crown.

33 Ed. 1. Ryley 256. 257. Elfsend's case; & 245. the abbot and convent of Osney's case. So, where Pecher, the tenant of the bishop of Ely, who held of the bishop, as part of his barony, four knights fees, granted these lands to the king, the bishop was put to his petition to recover his services. 33 Ed. 1. Ryley 249.

Upon the exile of the Jews, in the time of Ed. 1. divers lands came to the king's hands by way of escheat: the chief lords, of whom those lands were holden, had no remedy to recover their services in arrear, but by petition. 21 Ed. 1. Ryley 129.

By all these authorities, and by many others which I could cite, both ancient and modern, it is plain, that if the subject was to recover a rent, or annuity, or other charge, from the crown; whether it was a rent, or annuity, originally granted by the king; or issuing out of lands, which by subsequent title came to be in the king's hands; in all cases the remedy to come at it was by petition to the person of the king: and no other method can be shewn to have been practised at common law.

Indeed I take it to be generally true, that in all cases where the subject is in the nature of a plaintiff, to recover any thing from the king, his only remedy, at common law, is to sue by petition to the person of the king. I say, where the subject comes as a plaintiff. For, as I said before, when, upon a title found for the king by office, the subject comes in to traverse the king's title, or to shew his own right, he comes in in the nature of a defendant; and is admitted to interplead in the case with the king in defence of his title, which otherwise would be defeated by finding the office. And to shew that this was so, I would take notice of several instances.

That, in cases of debts owing by the crown, the subject's remedy was by by petition, appears by Aynesham's case, Ryley 251. which is a petition for 19l. due for work done at Carnarvan castle.

So Ryley 251. the executors of John Efrateleng petition for 132l. due to their testator for wages. The answer is remarkable; for there is a latitude taken, which will very ill agree with the notion that is taken up in this case: Habeant bre' de liberate in canic' thes. & camerar' de 32l. in partem solutionis.

So the case of Yerward le Galeys for 56l. Ryley 414.

In like manner, in the same book 253. 33 Ed. 1. several parties sue by petition for money and goods taken for the king's use; and also for wages due to them; and for debts owing to them by the king. The answer is, Rex ordinavit per concilium thesaurarii & baronum de seccario, quod satisfiet iis quam citius fieri poterit; ita quod contentos se tenebunt. And this is an answer given to a petition presented to the king in parliament; and therefore we have reason to conclude it to be warranted by law. They must be content, and they shall be paid, quam citius fieri poterit.

The parties, in these cases, first go to the king by petition: it is by him they are sent to the Exchequer; and it is by a writ under the great seal, that the Exchequer is empowered to act. Nor can any such writ be found, (unless in a very few instances, where it is mere matter of account,) in which the treasurer is not joined with the barons.

So far was it from being taken to be law at that time, that the barons had any original power of paying the king's debts; or of commanding annuities, granted by the king or his progenitors, to be paid, when the persons applied to them for such payment.

But perhaps it may be objected, that it is not to be inferred, because petitions were brought in these cases, that therefore it was of necessity that the subject should pursue that course, and could take no other way. It might be reasonable to require from those who object thus, that they should produce some precedents at least, of another remedy taken.

But I think there is a good answer to be given to this objection. All these petitions which I have mentioned, are after the stat. 8 Ed. 1. Ryley 442. where notice is taken, that the business of parliament was interrupted by a multitude of petitions, which might be redressed by the chancellor, and justices. Wherefore it is thereby enacted, that petitions which touch the seal should come first to the chancellor; those which touch the Exchequer, to the Exchequer; and those which touch the justices, or the law of the land, should come to the justices: and if the business be so great, or si de grace, that the chancellor, or others, cannot do them without the king, then the petitions shall be brought before the king to know his pleasure; so that no petitions come before the king and his council, but by the hands of the chancellor, and the other chief ministers; that the king and his council may attend the great affairs of the king's realm, and his foreign dominions.

This law being made, there is reason to conclude that all petitions brought before the king in parliament after this time, and answered there, were brought according to the method of this law; and were of the nature of such petitions as ought to be brought to the person of the king.

And that petitions did lie for a chattel, as well as for a freehold, does appear 37 Aff. pl. 11. Bro. Pet. 17. If tenant by statute merchant be ousted, he may have a petition, and shall be restored. Vide 9 H. 4. 4. Bro. Pet. 9.

9 H. 6. 21. Bro. Pet. 2. If the subject be ousted of his term, he shall have his petition.

7 H. 7. 11. Of a chattel real, a man shall have his petition of right, as of his freehold.

34 H. 6. 51. Bro. Pet. 3. A man shall have a petition of right for goods and chattels; and the king indorses it in the usual form.

It is said indeed, 1 H. 7. 3. Bro. Pet. 19. that a petition will not lie of a chattel.

And, admitting there was any doubt as to that point, in the present suits we are in the case of a freehold.

I will now enter into the consideration of the two cases, which have been principally insisted upon, as warranting the proceedings in the suits which are now depending. I mean the cases of fir H. Nevil and fir T. Wroth: both of them reported by Plowden; and both adjudged in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Indeed the pleadings in the cases before us have been formed upon these precedents.

Sir H. Nevil exhibits to the barons a writing of the late Ph. C. m. 377. archbishop of Canterbury, dated the 15th of Nov. 22 H. 8. purporting to be a grant to him, and one fir Edward Nevil, (lately attainted for treason), of the office of keeper of Aldington park, and of the rent of 3l. 10d. for the exercise of the office, to be received out of the manor of Aldington, habendum for their lives and the life of the survivor; which grant was confirmed by the prior and convent; and prays it may be inrolled.

The barons receive the writing, and cause it to be read and inrolled. And thereupon fir H. Nevil alleges, that he is three years in arrear, and that during that time the manor has been, and does remain in the king's hands; and prays that the writing may be allowed, and the arrears paid him, and the growing rent during his life.

The attorney-general demurs. And after eight or nine years depending, judgment is given, that the writing should be allowed, and the arrears paid at the receipt of the Exchequer, and also the growing rent.

Then fir Henry prays a writ to the treasurer and chamberlains of the receipt to execute the judgment; which is granted.

It has been observed, that the questions made in this case were only,

1. If the office was forfeited by the attainder of fir Edward?

2. Whether the annuity was not gone, tho' the office was not forfeited?

Not one word is said touching the nature and manner of the proceedings throughout the whole debate of the case, tho' it lasted so many years.

It is true, Plowden adds a remark of his own, that thereby might be seen the order and form, how one, who has a rent out of lands in the king's hands, may come to it by petition to the court of Exchequer, without petition to the person of the king: and how he shall have the judgment executed: For it is not the order to command by word of mouth that the payment be made; but a writ in form aforesaid shall be awarded by the barons: which is a judicial writ under the seal of the Exchequer, and is a sufficient warrant to the treasurer and chamberlains to pay the arrears, and growing rent.

This observation of Plowden's hath been variously interpreted in speaking to these cases, according as the persons concluded differently.

It may be said, his observation is an argument that he approved of the method, and looked upon it as law.

But it may be also inferred,

1. That it is an observation which he founded only on that case; for he says from this record you may see, good reader.

2. That it was new to him; otherwise he had not added such a remark to his report.

3. That he looked on the other way by petition, as the known method in cases of that nature.

4. That this was purely a reflection of his own. For he is so exact a reporter, that he sets down particularly when the point is debated in court; and when he has it in private from one of the judges; as appears in the case of fir Thomas Wroth, fol. 455. b.

5. He only says this writ is a sufficient warrant to the treasurer and chamberlains of the receipt to pay the money, not that it is compulsory to enforce the payment.

The other case of fir Thomas Wroth was this.

He exhibits to the barons letters patent, dated the 13th of October, 38 H. 8. whereby the king appointed him gentleman usher of the privy chamber to prince Edward, and granted to him, for the exercise of the office, an annuity of 20l. per annum during life, to be received by the hands of the treasurer of the court of Augmentations, out of such of the treasure of the said revenues as should be in his hands. And whereas he had served the prince from Lady-Day 36 H. 8. to that time, and had received no allowance, the king thereby grants for his attendance for the time past, as much money as the said annuity of 20l. per ann. from Lady-Day 36 H. 8. to that time amounted to, to be received as aforesaid. And he prays the letters patent may be inrolled; and the same are received by the barons, and ordered to be read and inrolled.

Then he alleges that king H. 8. died the 28th of January 38 regni sui; and that he exercised the office during the life of king Edward. And then sets forth the clause in the act of 1 Mar. for the alteration, union, transposing, or determination of the court of Augmentations, &c. whereby it was provided, that that act should not extend to extinguish or take away any annuity, which any person had title to, or ought to have, by letters patent, or other writing sufficient, under the seal of the court of Augmentations, before the 7th of July then last: but that the same should be paid out of the treasure of the queen, in the court to which the court of Augmentations should be annexed; or in any new court which should be erected instead of the court of Augmentations; or, in default thereof, in any court where there should be sufficient of the queen's treasure.

He says the annuity was so many years in arrear; and prays as in fir H. Nevil's case.

And there is a demurrer; and judgment for allowing the letters patent, and for paying the arrears, and growing payments; and a writ to the treasurer and chamberlains of the receipt accordingly.

There were five points debated, and determined in this case:

1. If there did not want an averment of the service done to the prince, in order to entitle himself to the sum granted for his attendance for the time past?

2. If the annuity was determinable by the nonfeazance of the service to the prince?

3. If the service might be done to the prince, when king?

4. If the annuity was payable during the life of fir Thomas Wroth?

5. If this grant did bind the successor, it not being granted by king H. 8. for him, his heirs and successors? And this seems to be the great point of the case; the judgment being expressed to be given upon view of several judgments, where, without those words, such letters patent had been allowed.

Plowden sets down the effect of the writ of execution; and the writ itself is to be seen at large, Co'sa Scac. Pasc. 4 Eliz. Rot. 52.

He says, afterwards payment was made of the arrears according to the effect of the writ. I observe, it is not said by force of the writ.

The truth is, upon that writ nothing was paid, fir Thomas Wroth dying not long after. But the 5th of November, 15 Eliz. Osborn, Morris, Wroth and Clerk, his executors, produced the former writ in the court, and surmised that fir Thomas Wroth was dead, having made his will, and them executors; and that fir Thomas Wroth had not received any part of the arrears: and so prayed another writ, which was granted; and afterwards the arrears were paid.

The same observation lies upon this case as on the other, that in the whole debate, which lasted so long, nothing was said as to the nature and manner of the suit. But by the points made in the case, and by the judgment itself, and by what Plowden tells us that Sanders chief baron added to the report, it is plain the only question was upon the matter in law whether the annuity was determined or not.

All the judges, who argued before my lord chief justice Treby, seemed to lay the great stress of their arguments upon these cases.

He applied himself to shew, that the proceedings in these two cases are founded upon particular reasons, and not upon the common law, or the course of the Exchequer. And for that cause it was, that they had never been cited in any law book as precedents, warranting any such jurisdiction in the court of Exchequer, as was exercised in those cases.

He observed, that both these cases were for annuities payable in the court of Augmentations. Sir Thomas Wroth's case being for an annuity granted under the seal of that court; and Nevil's annuity being also payable there. For all lands purchased, or to be purchased by king Henry the 8th, were by the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 27. put under the jurisdiction of that court; and the manor of Aldington was purchased afterwards by him him, of the archbishop of Canterbury, in the 34d year of his reign; the deed of bargain and sale being dated the 11th of Feb. in that year, and inrolled in the court of Augmentations: consequently that manor was under the survey of that court. And in the covenant against incumbrances, which was in that deed of bargain and sale, there was an exception of this fee payable to sir H. Nevil.

He observed further, that by the act made the first of queen Mary, cap. 10. and that queen's letters patent thereupon, this court was united to the court of Exchequer: and that by a clause in that act, all the annuities payable in the court of Augmentations were saved; and all such unitings and annexations, &c. and all orders made by the queen touching the revenues of such court, and expressed in such letters patent, are enacted to be of the same force, as if declared by parliament.

That after the union, in these cases the Exchequer acted according to the power given by that statute, and the letters patent.

That the court of Augmentations proceeded in a summary way; and that many decrees of the same nature with these were to be found in the records of that court.

And he took notice, that it was remembered by a very learned judge, who argued the same way with him in the court of Exchequer, that my lord chief justice Hale had formerly declared, that these cases of Nevil and Wroth did depend on particular reasons; and were not to be urged for precedents of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer.

My lord chief justice of the King's Bench, in his argument, did very particularly apply himself to take off the force of this objection.

The first thing I observed him to urge, as an argument that these cases were adjudged by the proper jurisdiction of the court of Exchequer, and not by any power derived to it by the union of the court of Augmentations, was drawn from Nevil's case; in the pleadings of which no mention is made of the court of Augmentations, or of any statute relating to it.

He did admit, that the manor of Aldington, which was charged with the rent, was purchased by king Henry the 8th, and so under the survey of the court of Augmentations; but that being made no part of the case, he said that case was no otherwise to be regarded than as an ordinary proceeding in the court of Exchequer, by a grantee of a rent issuing out of lands which came afterwards to the crown.

I shall not here repeat what I have already shewn, that a grantee of a rent issuing out of lands, which come to the crown subsequent to his grant, could not proceed in this manner to recover it.

But I will observe as to this case of Nevil: First, that it is not denied, but if the court of Augmentations had subsisted, it had been under the survey of that court, and the court of Exchequer could have had no jurisdiction over it; so that it came not into the governance of the Exchequer, till the dissolution of that court.

2dly, That the court of Augmentations had a power of ordering payments of such fees, or annuities, will appear plainly, I think, by what I shall shew presently.

3dly, It appears that this fee, or annuity, had been paid not only during the reigns of Henry the 8th, and Edward the 6th; when the court of Augmentations subsisted; but also during the whole reign of queen Mary, which was for several years after the dissolution of that court. The arrears sued for being only for three years, from Michaelmas, 5 & 6 Philip & Mary, (which was the Michaelmas before the death of queen Mary, who died the 17th of November 1559,) to Michaelmas the third of queen Elizabeth.

So that this grant had been allowed before in the court of Exchequer, and payments had been made upon it there for several years: and therefore there was no occasion to take any notice of the court of Augmentations on the one side; or, of the other side, to object that it was not set out. But the matter of law only came under the consideration of the court, whether, by the attainder of one of the grantees, the annuity and the office were determined. Which objection to the payment of the annuity, as it is probable, had been but lately observed, although sir Ed. Nevil had been attained 30 H. 8. for a fact alledged to be committed the 12th of July, 29 H. 8.

But my lord chief justice of the King's Bench did principally insist upon two other points, in answer to what was said by my lord chief justice of the Common Pleas as to this matter.

1. That the court of Augmentations was never united to the court of Exchequer.

2. That the court of Augmentations had no such special power given to it, either by act of parliament, or letters patent, for relief of grantees of rents; and consequently, though there had been an union of that court to the court of Exchequer, yet the court of Exchequer could not derive any power of acting in such a manner from that union.

To prove the first of these positions, Dyer 216. a. and Coke's 4th Inst. 122. were cited. Where it is said to be resolved by all the judges, 4 Eliz. that the union was but in shew, and was really void. For queen Mary, by her letters patent of the 23d of January in the first year of her reign, having dissolved the court of Augmentations, and by other letters patent, dated the next day, uniting the same to the court of Exchequer, the second letters patent came too late, and were utterly void. And therefore it was argued, there could be no accession of power to the court of Exchequer, by a union that was absolutely void: but by the dissolution of the court of Augmentations, the revenues of that court fell naturally under the government of the Exchequer; and sir T. Wroth, and sir H. Nevil came to the court of Exchequer, as to an original court of Revenue.

But notwithstanding these books, and the weight such a resolution may seem to have, I think I shall be able to make it out clearly, that the authority, given by the act of parliament primo Mariae, was well executed by her two several letters patent of the 23d and 24th of January; and that the court of Augmentations was thereby effectually united to the Exchequer.

For, first, The act of parliament did empower the queen to alter, change, unite, transpose, dissolve, or determine the court of Augmentations and revenues of the king's crown, and the other courts therein mentioned; and to reduce the same, or any of them, into one, two, or more courts; or unite, or annex the said courts, or any two, or more of them together, or to any other of her courts of Record; or to erect out of the same any other new court.

Secondly, The queen did intend to execute her power, by uniting that court to the Exchequer. That appears most plainly by both the letters patent, which recite the act, and declare that the queen did intend to put the act in execution. And the letters patent of the 24th do recite, that it was with that intent, viz. of putting the act in execution, that she had, by letters patent of the day before, dissolved the said court: and she did thereby unite, transpose and annex the said court dissolved to the court of Exchequer; and did thereby appoint all the lands and hereditaments, which at the time of the dissolution of the said court, were in the order or survey thereof to be in the order or survey of the court of Exchequer, according to the articles and ordinances in the schedule annexed to those letters patent.

Thirdly, Every thing ought to be expounded favourably, that the queen's intention might take effect; especially, when the acts in pursuance of an act of parliament, and for the more speedy and sure answering of her revenue, as the intent of the act is declared to be.

Fourthly, The letters patent, though bearing several dates, may, and ought to be expounded as one and the same act, as in many other cases; especially when done in execution of an act of parliament.

Fifthly, As to the quasi absurdum & impossibile, in Dyer; we are not now discoursing upon a subject of philosophy, nor speaking of the natural existence of things. There indeed, it would be absurd to say, that what was dissolved and annihilated one day, should yet have such an existence as to be united to any thing the day following: but we are speaking upon a legal subject, touching the construction of a law, where fictions, and relations, and conclusions have place.

That which one act of parliament says shall be dissolved to-day, another act may say shall be to all intents revived and united to-morrow; and all men are concluded to say, that the union is not real to all intents of law. And as this may be done by several acts, so the same act may say, that a court shall be dissolved, and that the said court so dissolved, shall be united; or, in other words, may say that the queen by her letters patent may dissolve a court to-day, and by letters patent of the next day may unite the same court to another: and when that is done, notwithstanding the seeming absurdity, it will be as really united to all intents as if it had never been dissolved. Now that in effect is said here. The act says, the queen may alter, change, dissolve or determine the court; and may reduce the courts to one or more, or unite and annex the same to any other court. Here the queen literally pursued both parts: she did dissolve it; and she united and annexed it.

The act further says, such alterations, dissolvings, and annexings, declared and set forth in such letters patent shall be of the same force to all intents, as though the same were set forth and declared by authority of parliament: and if this had been done by act of parliament, nobody could have said but that it had been well united.

Sixthly, All the parts and business of the court of Augmentations were actually distributed and settled in the respective offices of the Exchequer, according to the order of the schedule annexed to the letters patent of union, and have been continued to this day under these orders. And would it not be strange, that the letters patent of the 24th should be taken to be wholly void, but the schedule annexed to them should be good and effectual, and take place, and be put in execution to all purposes?

Seventhly, It is expressly and fully declared by act of parliament, that the court of Augmentations was united to the court of Exchequer. I mean the stat. 1 Eliz. cap. 4. § 15. for restitution of the first-fruits to the crown.

That stat. takes notice that queen Mary, by the act primo Mariae, cap. 10. was empowered to alter or determine the courts of First-fruits, Augmentations, and other courts therein expressed, or to unite the said courts or any of them together, or to any other courts of Record, as should be thought most convenient for the answering of her revenues: by authority of which act the late queen by four letters patent, whereof two bear date the 23d of January, in the first year of her reign, and the other two the 24th day of the same January, did not only dissolve, determine, and extinguish the said court, commonly called, the court of Augmentations and revenues of the crown, and the courts of First-fruits and Tenth, and the jurisdiction and authority thereof; but also did unite, transpose and annex the said courts so dissolved, to the said court of Exchequer, there to be and continue as a member and parcel of the said court; and did appoint the revenues then answerable in the said courts, to the order, rule, survey, and governance of the court of Exchequer, there to be answered and accounted for ever, in such order and form, as in the said letters patent, and two schedules thereto annexed, is mentioned and declared.

Had the act rested there, unquestionably it had done enough to make good what I hold: but the act goes on further and says; by reason of which premises, the said perpetual revenues of First-fruits and Tenth, (which was the subject matter of that act,) and the revenues relating thereto, were ordered and accounted for in the court of Exchequer.

Then the act proceeds to recite the act 2 & 3 Phil. & Mary, for taking away the First-fruits and Tenth from the crown, and repeals that act: and enacts, that the same shall be revived and united to the crown in the same estate, degree and condition, and in as ample manner as the same were in queen Mary before the act of repeal: and that the said revenues should be in the order, survey, rule, and governance of the said court of Exchequer, in every degree, sort, and condition, as they were, at and before the said 8th day of August, in the 2 & 3 of Phil. & Mary; from which day that act took effect.

Now whether we are to depend upon the authority of an act of parliament, which does expressly declare, that by the force of the act primo Mariae, and by virtue of the letters patent of the 23d and 24th days of January in the same year, the court of Augmentations was united, transposed and annexed to the court of Exchequer; or whether we are to believe the judges in Dyer, who say that it was not united, does seem no difficult question to decide.

These two things must be observed.

1st, That by this act the First-fruits and Tenth are put under the survey and governance of the Exchequer, only as they were at the time of the act 2 & 3 Phil. & Mary; and by the same act it is declared, in what manner they were then annexed, and put under that governance; that is, according to the letters patent primo Mariae: so that they are annexed to the court of Exchequer, in the form, and by virtue of those letters patent, or not at all. And the annexation of the court of Augmentations being exactly in the same manner as that of the First-fruits, if the one was good, the other must be so.

2dly, That if there was not such an union, it may be questionable; if the Exchequer at this day has any jurisdiction as to the revenues which were under the survey of the court of Augmentations; there being a clause in the act 27 H. 8. cap. 27. that, all process out of the Exchequer, to or against any persons, for any rents, issues or profits, relating to any the lands, which by that act were limited, to be under the survey of the court of Augmentations, should be clearly void, and of none effect.

If any thing more was necessary to be added after such an authority, it is plain, that it was the received opinion of the whole kingdom, and of the court of Exchequer itself, that the court of Augmentations was united to that court. This will abundantly appear by the case of the executors of sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, reported in the earl of Devon's case, 11 Co. 91. which case arises upon a warrant of the lord treasurer, and under-treasurer, for allowing to sir Walter Mildmay 1401. yearly, in consideration of the increase of his business, by reason of the annexation of the court of Augmentations and First-fruits to the court of Exchequer.

I will yet add one more authority to prove this; and it is in the office of the king's remembrancer, Mich. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 175. and was the case of a lord chief justice of the King's-Bench.

There it is found in the accounts of the late treasurer of the court of Augmentations, that there had been granted to sir Thomas Bromley, chief justice of the king and queen's bench, an annual fee of 61. 13s. 4d. quarterly, out of the treasure in the hands of the treasurer of that court, for divers causes therein mentioned; which fee had been paid to Michaelmas primo Mariae. And thereupon sir Thomas Bromley comes in propria persona sua, Es pro eo quod dicta domina regina nunc annexavit & univit dictam nuper curiam Augmentationum & reversionum corone regie huic curie scaccarii sui, (prout in memorandis hujus scaccarii de anno primo regni sui, viz. inter recorda de termino sci' hill' rotis &c. ex parte hujus remem', plenius liquet de recordo,) petit quod ipse tam de dicto annuali feodo 61. 13s. 4d. &c. durante vita sua, quam de 101. sibi de arreariis ejusdem feodi a festo annunciationis B. Mariae virginis anno 7. Ed. 6. debet & ad hoc minime solut', ad recept' hujus scaccarii de thesauro dominorum regis & reginae ibidem de tempore in tempus remanere contingen' satisfiat. Super quo, pro eo quod scrutatis rotulis & mem' dicta cur' Augm' &c. in hoc scaccario modo remanen', it did appear that the said fee was granted, and that it had been answered and paid at the court of Augmentations, and that he was not satisfied his arrears, as he had alleged in his petition: considerat' est per barones quod eidem Thome Bromley de dicto feodo de 61. 13s. 4d. per annum ad dictos quatuor anni terminos durante vita sua una cum arreariis prae'd' sibi debet' ad recept' hujus scaccarii de thesauro, &c. ibidem de tempore in tempus remanere contingen' satisfiat, &c.

Here is a judgment founded upon this very point of the union and annexation of these courts.

I have mentioned this case, because it seems to me a very full authority; at least the lord chief justice Bromley thought so. But the same thing does appear by the whole tenor of the proceedings of the court of Exchequer, in relation to cases which were before of the jurisdiction of the court of Augmentations; wherein, the summary way, practised in that court, was taken up, and a great variation made from the ancient manner of proceedings in the Exchequer; which amounts to a plain proof of this matter, that the court of Augmentations was really united to the court of Exchequer.

I proceed now to the second thing insisted on by my lord chief justice. That, admitting it to be true that the court of Augmentations was united to the court of Exchequer, and so the powers of that court transferred to the Exchequer, yet it would have no consequence to make good the point for which it was urged; viz. that in these two cases of Nevil and Wroth, the court of Exchequer acted as the court of Augmentations, and by a power supposed to be vested in the Exchequer by that union; because the court of Augmentations itself had no especial powers given to it, either by act of parliament, or by letters patent, to determine of, and give relief to grantees of annuities and rents, in the manner it is done in Nevil's and Wroth's cases; but that all which was done in the erecting of that court was to make it a court of Record, and a court of Revenue to such and such lands: the consequence of which was, that it had all the powers incident to a court of Revenue, and as such could give relief in these cases; because in the like cases the court of Exchequer could, and always had given relief.

And to make this out, several cases of the like nature, decreed in the court of Augmentations, wherein relief had been given to grantees of fees and annuities, (which were found in a book of that office,) were cited as so many authorities for this opinion. And that, in like manner, relief was given in the court of Wards, and in the court of Surveyors, to grantees who came thither for their annuities; which were new erected courts of Revenue, and therefore, if those several new erected courts acted in that matter without a special authority, it was argued, that it might be concluded to be by a right incident to them as courts of Revenue, and in imitation of what the court of Exchequer, which was the old court of Revenue, could do before by the common law.

This is an ingenious turn of an argument, which was drawn by my lord chief justice Treby to a contrary purpose, from the practice of those new erected courts, if it will hold; but I think it will not.

For if it cannot be shewn that antiently, or at any time before the union of the courts of Augmentations and First-fruits to the court of Exchequer, the barons of the Exchequer did give relief to persons who had grants of annuities out of the Revenue, or out of lands in the hands of the king, upon application made to them immediately, in the manner we are now speaking; unless, in cases where the party applied to the king by petition, and the treasurer and barons were authorized by the great or privy seal, or by special indorsement upon the petition: and on the other side, if it must be confessed, that as soon as ever these new courts were erected, they did constantly exercise this power: and if it also cannot be denied, but that as soon as the courts of Augmentations and First-fruits were united to the court of Exchequer, and not before, the court of Exchequer began to proceed in the same manner as those courts did, as to cases which were before under the survey of those courts: the proper inference must be, not that those courts, in the exercising these powers, did pursue the course of the Exchequer; but on the contrary, that the court of Exchequer, in taking up a new course after the union, did act according to the manner of the courts of Augmentations and First-fruits.

To examine this matter a little further, three things are properly to be considered.

1st, If the barons, as such, did at any time exercise this power of giving judgment for the grantees of rents issuing out of lands in the king's hands, or of annuities granted out of the revenues of the crown, to be paid by the treasurer and chamberlains at the receipt of the Exchequer, upon application to them:

I speak of what the barons have done in the court of Pleas; for in the Exchequer Chamber, upon matters of equity, and other grounds upon which the chancellor and barons are empowered to proceed, some relief may be given in cases of annuities, and rents.

2dly, If a power was vested in the court of Augmentations, to give relief in such cases.

3dly, If by the union that power was sufficiently transferred to the court of Exchequer.

As to the first of these points, I have spoken in great measure already; by shewing, 1st, The method taken heretofore by suitors, who applied by petition to the person of the king.

2dly, By the authorities I cited to shew, that in such cases the party had no relief but by petition.

3dly, By shewing that amongst the records of the Exchequer, upon all the search I could make, I have not found any thing of this kind before the time of the union.

I have been more particular in my search during the reigns of H. 8. and Edw. 6. And in the king's remembrancer's office I find, during those reigns, and so afterwards during the reigns of queen Mary and queen Elizabeth, writs of liberate to the treasurer, and also to inferior officers; and writs of allocatione facienda to the treasurer and barons, passing the great seal in the same manner as antiently, for annuities made payable at the receipt of the Exchequer, without any alteration from the old course; and likewise writs of privy seal for making allowances upon accounts in the same manner as formerly: so that, as to matters properly of the jurisdiction of the court of Exchequer, the proceedings are the same.

I shall proceed therefore to the second point, to shew that by act of parliament, and letters patent, the court of Augmentations and revenues of the crown was fully invested with this power to give relief in such cases as those of Wroth and Nevil.

In order to this I will premise, that Henry the eighth, affecting power as much as any of our kings, and having great designs, did early in his reign endeavour to get some parts of the revenue of his crown more immediately under his private and personal direction, than the old regular constitution of the Exchequer would allow of.

To that end, in his fourteenth year, he procured an act of parliament, for putting divers lands under the survey of persons, commissioned by him, and styled his general surveyors.

In his twenty-sixth year, when the First-fruits and Tenths were given him in parliament, he prevailed to have them answered in a new method, and not in the Exchequer.

The compositions for the First-fruits might be made with the lord chancellor; and the money, or securities were, in that case, to remain in the hanaper: or the compositions might be made with commissioners under the great seal; and then the securities taken, and the monies paid, were to be paid and remain with the treasurer of the king's chamber.

The value of ecclesiastical revenues were to be enquired of by commissions under the great seal, and a certificate was to be returned thereof, and on such certificate the tenths were to be assessed by the treasurer, chancellor, chamberlains, and barons of the Exchequer; but the money was to be paid to the treasurer of the chamber, or as the king should appoint, and his acquittances were made full discharges.

The treasurer of the chamber is accountable only to the king, and not in the Exchequer. 4 Inst. 113.

This act, and the act in the next year for dissolving the lesser monasteries, having made a great change; and the king finding himself obliged to reward those who assisted his designs, as well as to provide for the subsistence of the abbots, priors and monks, who were turned out of their houses; and that these matters would be very troublesome, if the old common law method was to be pursued; did procure by the act 27 H. 8. cap. 27. the court of Augmentations to be erected, and made a court of Record. And there were appointed for it two seals, and a chancellor to have the keeping of them, who is the chief officer; and a treasurer, attorney, and solicitor, and ten auditors, and seventeen receivers.

The duties of these officers are described in the oaths appointed for them.

And it is plain by the whole frame of the act, that nothing was farther from the intention of the law-makers, than to form this court upon the model of the Exchequer; on the contrary, it is made a court of Equity.

The oath of the chancellor is, in effect, the same with that of the chancellor of England. The oath of the treasurer is, in effect, the same with that of the treasurer of England. And the attorney and solicitor are sworn to be ready, at the calling of the chancellor, to hear and determine causes depending before the chancellor.

The clerk is made register for all decrees and orders made by the chancellor and council.

The chancellor is empowered to take recognizances, which are to have the effect of recognizances taken in Chancery; and such process as in Chancery is to go upon them.

And upon issues joined in the court, the record is to be delivered by the hands of the chancellor to the justices of the King's Bench, as upon issues joined in Chancery.

The process of the court is to be after the manner of the court of the duchy of Lancaster: and the fees of the officers, &c. are to be such as in the duchy court. And all process out of the Exchequer, as to any lands put under the jurisdiction of this court, is enacted to be void.

I think then, as to the first matter upon this act, nothing can be more clear, than that it was not intended, that this court should be another such court of revenue as the Exchequer was.

For, 1st, the very institution of it had been useless and absurd; for the Exchequer could have done the business as well.

2^{dly}, It is in part conformed to the court of Chancery, but principally to the court of the Duchy; both which are courts of Equity.

3^{dly}, It was plainly intended to be a court of Equity in its institution, and to proceed by way of decrees, and act according to discretion: and therefore not to be like the court of Exchequer, which is a court of Law: I mean the court of Pleas, held before the barons; for the court of Equity in the Exchequer is quite of another consideration, and the present cases have no relation to it.

This statute, for erecting the court of Augmentations, proceeds to appoint the treasurer to account before the chancellor, and two of the auditors.

The treasurer is to be allowed all such sums as he shall pay to patentees of any offices, fees, or annuities to be granted under the seal of that court: or to any other persons, by virtue of the king's warrant, or by bill signed: or as he shall be commanded to pay by any bill signed with the hands of the chancellor, attorney and solicitor, or any two of them, upon such consideration as shall be thought convenient by their discretions.

See then how far this court is empowered to give relief to grantees of fees and annuities.

1st, The treasurer is put under the direction of the chancellor, attorney and solicitor, or any two of them; and to account before the chancellor.

2^{dly}, He is to be allowed such sums as he shall pay to patentees for offices, fees and annuities granted under the seal of the court; which is directly the case of fir Tho. Wroth.

3^{dly}, He is to pay such sums as he shall be commanded to pay by any bill signed and subscribed with the hands of the chancellor, attorney and solicitor, or any two of them, upon such consideration as shall be thought convenient by their discretions.

By the act 37 H. 8. cap. 4. and 1 Ed. 6. cap. 14. the Chantry lands are put under the survey of the court of Augmentations, or such other court as the king pleased.

My lord chief justice Treby did observe, that the decrees themselves of this court were signed on the record by the chancellor, attorney and solicitor, or two of them; which not being practised in any other court, might be very well taken up in pursuance of this clause, that so they might, within the letter of the act, be warrants to the treasurer for payment.

I have a full authority, which will give strength to this observation of his, that those decrees were looked upon as bills signed within the meaning of the act; which I find, amongst the decrees of the court of Augmentations, 4 Ed. 6. made in the behalf of the poor of St. John's, Walbrooke, upon a petition of the parson and church-wardens, reciting a petition to the chancellor of the court of Augmentations in the same year, and an order thereupon, for the payment of some money which the king had given and appointed for the relief of poor people: and it is decreed thereupon, that the parson and church-wardens shall have the sum demanded, to be paid by the hands of the treasurer of this court; and this bill signed by the hand of the chancellor, &c. shall be to the treasurer of the said court a sufficient warrant.

Now without going further, I think we may reasonably conclude fir H. Nevil's case to have come within this clause. For the manor of Aldington came into the king's hands, 31 H. 8: and fir H. Nevil's annuity having been answered till Michaelmas before the death of queen Mary, there is little doubt to be made, but that he had a decree in the court of Augmentations for it; which was the warrant for payment thereof, and which continued so before and after the union of that court to the Exchequer, till the objection upon the attainder of fir Ed. Nevil was made, and taken off.

As a farther confirmation of what I said, relating to the design which king Henry the eighth had, of making himself more absolute master of his revenue, by excluding it from the regular jurisdiction of the Exchequer; in the thirty-second year of his reign, c. 45. the court of First-fruits and Tenths is erected, according to the model and scheme of the court of Augmentations: and in the same year the court of Wards is set up; being formed much after the same manner, and the whole revenue to be answered to the treasurer of the chamber.

In the thirty-third year of H. 8. cap. 39. an act, taking notice of the former act, made in the fourteenth year of his reign, about general surveyors, forms another court of General Surveyors of the King's Lands, much after the manner of the court of Augmentations, only with some larger powers.

The same act does also enlarge the power of the court of Augmentations, by enacting, that all payments made by the treasurer of the said court by decree or commandment of the chancellor, by assent of the council, for buying lands, or for recompence or satisfaction of debts and expences, not exceeding 200 l. to one person, shall be good against the king. And if persons pretend title to lands sold, or exchanged by the king, upon which a rent is reserved payable in the court of Augmentations; or demand any rent out of such lands: or if the king shall claim right to lands by him sold, or exchanged, upon which a rent is reserved payable in the court of Augmentations; or to any charge upon lands appointed to the court of Augmentations: the chancellor and council of the court of Augmentations shall have power to examine such demands, and by their discretions to hear and determine the same; and to decree recompences, &c. out of the king's treasure, where equity shall appear, in the cases mentioned in that statute.

Afterwards, by letters patent, in 38 H. 8. reciting the erection of the several courts of Augmentations and General Survey, and that the rules for governing of them were not sufficiently certain, the king does thereby determine and dissolve those courts; and erects a new court, to be called the court of Augmentations and Revenues of the King's Crown: and directs that all revenues under the survey of the former courts, should be put under the government of this new court: and appoints the officers, and their business; and in particular, the chancellor, and general surveyors to take the accounts of the treasurer, and other officers; and to make allowances for all payments of annuities, fees, &c. and to give discharges: and that the treasurer shall pay all monies, fees, or annuities, directed by the king's letters patent; or mentioned in any warrant directed by the king; or in any warrant, or decree, or order to be made by the court, or heretofore made in the court of Augmentations; or General Survey; or granted by any letters patent sealed with the seal of either of the said former courts. But pensions to religious persons, or fees, or annuities chargeable upon monasteries, were to be paid by the receivers of the counties.

And these letters patent are confirmed by act of parliament. 7 Ed. 6. cap. 2.

I have been somewhat long in shewing the powers vested in the court of Revenues and Augmentations of the Crown, by the several acts of parliament, and letters patent: but I thought it material to shew, that a power was clearly vested in the chancellor and council of that court, (and that to be exercised in a summary way, according to their discretions,) to relieve persons who came before them for fees and annuities; and to require the treasurer of that court to make payment, and to discharge the treasurer by their bill signed. Which was the thing to be proved.

I will not spend time to shew that they did constantly exercise this power, during the continuance of that court.

I have perused a vellum book of decrees of the court of Augmentations, in the time of H. 8. which contains the first proceedings after the erection of the court; and also a book of decrees of that court, during the first four years of Ed. 6. which was cited by my lord chief justice; and also many decrees in the same reign entered upon parchment rolls, all remaining in the court of Augmentations: by which it does appear, that court acted merely as a court of Equity.

The bills, (of which there is one entered at large, with the proceedings upon it, and the minutes of the decree, and, after that, the decree itself drawn up,) are in English, in the form of a petition, and the case comes to hearing in a summary way, and the decree is made; and if it be for payment of money, it is decreed to be paid by the treasurer of the court, and this decree is always mentioned to be his sufficient warrant and discharge; and the decree is signed by the chancellor, and a quorum of the council.

These proceedings sure are not in imitation of the court of Exchequer before the barons.

Amongst these proceedings there are hundreds of decrees for annuities, pensions, rents, fees, &c. So that this court was in full possession of this authority at the time of the uniting it to the court of Exchequer.

Thirdly, The only thing which remains, is to shew that, by the union, this power was sufficiently transferred to the Exchequer.

The same power, which the act 1 Maria, cap. 10. did give to queen Mary, for dissolving the court of Augmentations, and uniting it to any other court, was by the act 7 Ed. 6. cap. 2. given to him, in almost the same words; except only that there is a new proviso, for the further saving of annuities payable out of the court of Augmentations, added in the statute of queen Mary.

I suppose it will be granted, that the words of that statute are sufficient to save the fees and annuities, payable in the court of Augmentations, from being lost by the dissolving, or annexing of that court.

Then the letters patent of queen Mary, which do unite, transpose, and annex that court to the Exchequer, there to be and continue as a member, and parcel of that court, do seem sufficient to carry over the business and power of that court to the court of Exchequer, under such orders and form as is expressed in the schedule annexed thereto.

By the 15th article of that schedule, sheriffs and other accountants are to pay all annuities, fees, pensions and corodies, according to grants allowed and inrolled; unless they shall have special commandment to the contrary by the court. And as for payments of that kind to be made at the receipt, besides that, the act itself gave an authority, there was a general dormant privy seal lodged with the treasurer and chamberlains.

And as the powers of the court of Augmentations were sufficiently vested in the court of Exchequer, by the act of parliament and the letters patent; so were the same, from the time of the union, exercised accordingly.

On the twenty-sixth of January, 1 Maria, the lord chancellor, in open court, delivers the letters patent for dissolving and uniting the court of Augmentations; which were received by the lord treasurer, chancellor, and under treasurer, and barons, and were inrolled 1 Maria Rot. 80. in the office of the king's remembrancer.

And the next Easter term the grantees of rents come in great numbers, and exhibit their letters patent under the seal of the court of Augmentations, and pray that a search may be made for the decrees of that court, whereby they are intitled; and it is done: and thereupon, without more formality, the barons order that the arrears, and growing payments of the annuities should be paid at the receipt of the Exchequer. The entry is Quod satisfiat.

Pasc. 1 Mar. Rot. 92. Pope's case, and very many others. Trin. 1 Mar. Rot. 27.

And all the proceedings are summary; sometimes upon the oath of the party, that he was not paid in the same manner as in the court of Augmentations. For this, see Glasie's case, 1 Mar. Rot. 29; Pantwentworth's case, 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 158; Mich. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 175. Sir Thomas Bromley's case; Rot. 210. Thompson's case.

And very great numbers of these cases are entered in the rolls of the king's remembrancer's office in the time of queen Elizabeth: Pasc. 2 Eliz. Rot. 145. Bashe's case; Mich. 2 Eliz. Rot. 196. Badcock's case; Hill.

Hill. 3 Eliz. Rot. 148. and downwards for some time; tho' by degrees the number did lessen, as the grantees died.

I shall spend no more time in shewing, that these decrees, or orders of the barons, of which so many are to be found after the union of court of Augmentations, were founded upon the power transferred by the union to the court of Exchequer.

I will only add, that as the case stood upon the act 1 Mariae, admitting the court of Augmentations had been utterly dissolved, and the revenues, which were under the survey of that court, had fallen under the government of the Exchequer as the original court of Revenue; yet, nevertheless, the barons were sufficiently authorized to order the payment of annuities, which were payable in the court of Augmentations, by the clause in the statute 1 Mariae, which says, that such fees and annuities shall not be extinct, but in default of such annexation, &c. shall be paid out of the queen's treasure, in any of the queen's courts where sufficient revenue shall be to answer the same, by the hands of the officers of the same court, in such manner as the same might have been done, or been paid, in any other court or place, if this act had not been made.

The consequence of which would have been, that as the annuities were payable before by the treasurer of the court of Augmentations, by the order of that court; so, by the special authority given by this act, the court of Exchequer might direct the same to be paid by the treasurer of the Exchequer; and such direction, in those particular cases, would be a good warrant in point of law. And yet, no argument would be deducible from thence to maintain the judgments now before us, which relate to grants which never were under the survey of the court of Augmentations.

But besides what might be inferred from this statute, the treasurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer had a full and ample authority, under the privy seal, for payment of the annuity to sir Thomas Wroth. The privy seal bore date the 19th of March, 2 Eliz. and indeed, it is the same privy seal, which is mentioned in the report of sir Walter Mildmay's case, cited in the earl of Devonshire's case. 11 Co. 91. a.

I have not been able to recover a copy of that privy seal; and the entries of the Pell of that year are lost, or burnt, as most of them are. But it is recited in a privy seal, bearing date the 27th of April 1 Jac. 1. to contain, among many other things, a general authority to the treasurer, chamberlains, and under-treasurer for the time being, to make payment of all annuities, fees, wages, diets and rewards, and the arrearages of the same, as should be due to any persons whatsoever by any assignment, act of parliament, letters patent, or otherwise howsoever: and, by the same privy seal, king James does command payments to be made according to the tenor and effect of the said privy seal of the 19th of March, 2 Eliz.

So that tho' the original privy seal is not to be found, yet it is sufficiently recited in this privy seal of king James; and mention is made of it in the entries of the Pell in many hundred places. And the privy seal of the 10th of June, 1 Jac. 1. does again take notice of the same; and does give the like large and general power for payment of annuities, fees, &c.

And therefore, it was not at all strange that the arrears of sir Thomas Wroth's annuity were paid, when the writ of the Exchequer had certified the treasurer and chamberlains that it had a continuance, and what was the sum to which the arrears did amount: but it was paid by force of the privy seal.

It might be paid, as Plowden expresses it, according to the effect of the writ, but not by the authority of it.

And upon the same reason it is, that the objection drawn from the liberate, which goes from the barons to the treasurer and chamberlains every term, pro necessariis scaccarii, (as if that inferred any authority in the barons to direct the issuing of money out of the receipt,) does fall to the ground. My lord chief justice Treby did observe, that in the payments made of those sums, pro necessariis scaccarii, never any notice was taken of the liberate, but the warrant was formed upon the privy seal, authorizing such payments.

And in the entries, which are in the Pells, of this payment, all along queen Elizabeth's reign, (I mean from the fourteenth year downwards, for the other books are lost,) the constant entry is, To Mr. William Billeby, usher of the Exchequer, upon the general privy seal, the 2d of March, 2 Eliz. and by liberate directed to the treasurer and chamberlains, for the charges of the court of Exchequer, for such a term.

Indeed in one place I find there is an omission of mentioning the privy seal, but that is but the negligence of the clerk: and I find such omissions too often made in those entries, in other cases; tho' it be plain, there was an authority under the great or privy seal, by other entries of like payments in the same books.

So that this liberate amounts to no more than a certificate of what the sum is: the warrant for payment is the privy seal. Tho', perhaps, in that particular case, the treasurer and chamberlains have a greater latitude, than in any other: for Gervase of Tilbury reckons up those payments, de minutis necessariis scaccarii, as payments they might make, sine brevi regis.

I have been too long already; but I will add one consideration more, which does arise from the inconvenience; no considerable argument in law: which is, that if the king's treasure be so far subject to the administration of an ordinary court of justice, as that it must be regularly issued upon the application of the subject, who has a demand thereupon for an annuity, or any other debt, (for I do not see but the reason is the same;) this may turn to the weakening of the publick safety to a very high degree.

The barons of the Exchequer cannot, as such, be consulant of the necessities of the state: and if they were, and knew them to be ever so pressing, they must act according to one rule; and must order a pension, granted upon no consideration, or, perhaps, upon a very ill one, and for a pernicious end, to be paid with the very money, which ought to be employed, and, possibly, was provided by parliament, for suppressing rebellion, or resisting an invasion, or setting out a fleet.

For they, as a court of justice, have no judgment of discretion allowed them: whenever the party comes to pray it, the grant must be inrolled and allowed, and the judgment given, and the writ go.

And what is the treasurer to do in such a case? Is he to obey the great or privy seal, which requires the money for the uses of the war, and the necessary defence of the realm; or the Exchequer seal, which requires it to be paid for the use of a private subject?

He would be under a great difficulty; especially if there be ground to think, that such a writ would be the foundation of an action against him, which, if I did not misapprehend, was affirmed by one.

The law books may say, that the king's treasure is sacred; Co. Lit. 106. that it does respicere regem, & regnum; that it is anima rei-publicae, firmamentum belli, & ornamentum pacis. It is, after all, at the disposition of the barons of the Exchequer. Nay it is, in some sort, at the disposal of the subject; who takes his own time to make his demands, may suffer his arrears to run as long as he pleases, and, at his pleasure, call for them, in the midst of a war, and to the disappointment of the publick safety.

What should hinder, but that all the arrears of the annuities and pensions, granted in the reigns of king James the first, and king Charles the first, should be demanded in this manner; and all the debts secured during the late civil war? At least, so far as the old branches of the hereditary revenue would extend to pay.

The truth is, this method does, in effect, set aside the lord treasurer, one of the greatest officers of the kingdom. My lord chief justice Coke has a fancy, that his white staff was given him, to drive away importunate suitors. But this would be to little purpose: they have a more certain place to resort to: 'tis but going to the barons of the Exchequer, and they will command the treasure from him.

But the popular objection is, that to say this suit will not lie, is to leave the property of the subject precarious; and that if he has a right, he must have a remedy.

The answer is, that all I have said goes only to this particular manner of proceeding, as being altogether new. It only relates to the new assumed power of the barons immediately over the revenue in the receipt of the Exchequer. It does in no sort lessen their known power over the revenue, while in transitu; nor does exclude them from any legal course, whilst the revenue is in the hands of any inferior officer. It does not preclude the subject from suing to the person of the king, by petition of right. Consequently, it does not tend to hinder him from the known and ordinary methods, which have been used in all ages, in cases of this nature; and in which the subject has acquiesced for so many hundred years.

It does not appear to me, that this method was ever known or practised: and under a pretence of assisting property, a new course of legal proceedings is not to be introduced; nor a new power placed in the barons of the Exchequer, to which none of their predecessors pretended.

The law must remain as it is, till some new law hath changed it. And I should much doubt, whether a new law, for the more easy recovery of pensions granted by the crown, would be for the good either of king, or people.

If, as the common law stood, grants of pensions and annuities out of the revenue, be, in some sort, depending upon the justice and honour of the crown, as to the time and manner of payment, I do not see that the public is hurt by it: the revenue is likely to remain the longer with the crown.

If it be said, that the subject has a hardship in this case, and must go far about to recover his right; let it be considered how much better his case is, than it was at common law.

It was hard, indeed, before the statute of Edward the third, when he could not interplead with the king, upon an office found. It was hard, before the statute of Richard the second, when he could not be allowed to shew his discharge, when he was impeached in the Exchequer, without going to the king: and so it was before the stat. 2 Ed. 6. when he had no way to save his term, &c. upon an office found. But yet after all the law was so: and whilst it continued, the courts were to judge accordingly. And if, in cases like this, it be thought that a better remedy should be provided, the same method must be taken, of procuring a new law.

The patentees in these cases, I believe, had no notion of this remedy; when the grants were made to them: this is of a later invention.

They were contented to apply for payment in the ordinary course, and did obtain warrants from the lord treasurer for some arrears, with an express clause in those warrants, forbidding to levy further tallies, without further order.

Nor is it to be said, that in the method, where the application is to be made to the person of the king, the subject is precarious; for it is to suppose, what is not to be supposed, in law. It is a supposition contrary to the principles upon which the English constitution is framed, which depends upon the honour and justice of the crown.

Such kind of suppositions may be carried much further. You may as well say all property is precarious, because you may suppose, the king will make no judges; or will adjourn the terms from time to time; or will suffer no writs to issue, without which no suits can be.

It must be presumed the crown will pay its just debts. But to say the king is not to have the ordering the course of payments, when the money is in his own coffers, is to deny him that, which is in every subject's power. It is to take from him the judgment of publick necessities, or, at least, the means of relieving them.

I have shewn the reasons for which I cannot give my opinion for the affirming of these judgments. But much the greater part of my lords the judges having delivered their opinions for the affirmance of them, I shall defer doing any thing further, till I hear the opinion of the judges upon the point referred to them: Whether, as this court is constituted, judgment ought to be given according to the opinion of the greater number of the judges, who are called by the lord chancellor and lord treasurer to their assistance, notwithstanding they themselves are of a different opinion?

Afterwards

Afterwards, on Tuesday, November the 24th, 1696, the lord keeper came again into the Exchequer-Chamber, and declared, that he had received a paper from the lord chief justice Holt, containing the opinion of the judges upon the question referred to them: and that three judges were of opinion, that the lord keeper was bound to give judgment in these cases, according to opinions of the majority of the judges by him called to his assistance:

but that seven judges were of opinion, that he was not bound by such majority of opinions, but was at liberty to give judgment according to his own: and declared, that as to this question, he himself concurred in opinion with the seven judges. And accordingly pronounced judgment, that the judgments given in these causes, by the court of Exchequer, be reversed.

Proceedings on error in parliament from the Exchequer-Chamber by Robert Williamson, plaintiff, against the attorney-general, defendant, being a continuation of the case of the bankers.

The case of the plaintiff, one of the assigns of Mr. Robert Vyner for 60l. per ann. and the arrears thereof out of the hereditary revenue of excise.

1667. SEVERAL goldsmiths and others having lent and advanced great sums of money to the crown upon the credit of the Exchequer, and by encouragement of an act of parliament for assigning orders in the Exchequer without revocation, passed in the year 1667, (a) for which monies so lent, the goldsmiths were debtors to great numbers of his majesty's subjects, and particularly Mr. Robert Vyner, one of the goldsmiths, was debtor to the plaintiff for money really lent the sum of 1000l.

1671. And there having been in January 1671 a stop put to the payments in the Exchequer, whereby the said Mr. Robert Vyner and the rest of the goldsmiths were rendered unable to pay their creditors.

1676. His then majesty king Charles the second, (in justice and compassion to the goldsmiths and their creditors, and to remove the miseries which attended the said stop) was pleased to give directions in April 1676 to the then lord high treasurer, to cause the accounts of the said goldsmiths to be truly examined and exactly stated; which was accordingly done by the then chancellor of the Exchequer, auditor of the revenue, and other proper officers of the crown (most of them being then members of the house of commons), and a report thereof being made to the king in council in February 1676, 1677. Letters patents. His then majesty in and about April 1677, by letters patents under the great seal of England, did grant unto each of the several goldsmiths, their heirs and assigns, and for the benefit of their creditors, in lieu and satisfaction of the monies due to them from his said majesty, a yearly rent or sum for ever out of the hereditary revenue of excise, equal in value to the interest of their respective debts, after the rate of six pounds per cent. per ann. with a clause of redemption upon his majesty's paying the principal money with the arrears of rent; the said rents or annual sums to be paid quarterly upon tallies to be struck in the receipt upon the commissioners, &c. of the excise; and directs and commands the treasurer, &c. barons and officers of the Exchequer of the king, his heirs and successors, that they do from time to time perform all acts necessary for the constant payment of the money, and from time to time to levy and strike tallies without any further warrant, so that the yearly sums may be constantly paid, without any further or other warrant to be sued for from the king, his heirs or successors. And if the money should happen to be paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, then that the high treasurer, and commissioners of the Treasury, under-treasurer, chamberlains, and barons of the Exchequer for the time being, and all other officers and ministers of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, are authorized and required to pay out of such monies as shall be so paid into the Exchequer or elsewhere, so much as shall be in arrear, without any further or other warrant; and the said payments to be preferred before any other payment out of the same, by virtue or colour of any warrant, order, or directions whatsoever of any after date, excepting for the management of the said revenue, and about 36209l. 15s. 4d. a-year to the then queen consort and the duke of York. Also his majesty thereby granted, that the letters patent should be expounded and taken most favourably and beneficially for the grantees, and covenanted to make further assurance if required; and on the 23d of May, 1677, ordered in council that the said letters patent should be printed and made public for the information and satisfaction of the creditors of the said goldsmiths.

Also the right honourable the house of peers were pleased on the 10th of July 1678, to pass a bill for the confirming the said letters patents; but that session ended before the said bill was read in the house of commons.

Whereupon many of the creditors of the goldsmiths (amongst others the plaintiff Mr. Williamson) delivered up their securities for their debts to the goldsmiths, and the plaintiff accepted of an assignment from Vyner in lieu of his 1000l. debt, pursuant to the said letters patents of a proportionable part of the annual sums so granted, and which sums were accordingly paid in the reigns of king Charles the second, and the late king 1683. James the second, to Lady-Day 1683. And in regard no tallies or monies could afterwards be obtained upon due and repeated application for that purpose:

1689. The plaintiff Mr. Williamson in Hilary term 1689, did commence his suit in the Exchequer by way of monstrance de droit, (as had formerly been very often practised) thereby setting forth his title as assignee under Mr. Robert Vyner to the said 60l. per ann. (being his proportionable part of the said annual sum so granted by the said letters patents), and prayed that the arrears thereof might be paid unto him, and that the future growing sums might also be paid according to the said letters patents.

1690. Unto which suit the then attorney-general (now lord chief justice of the Common Pleas) had several days and terms given him to plead or demur as he should think best for the crown: and at last a demur being by him put in thereunto, 1691. The cause had a long agitation, and was argued for about two years by the then Mr. Attorney, Mr. Solicitor, and others of the king's council for the crown, and also by council for the plaintiff Mr. Williamson. And the court after long deliberation and view of the precedents and book cases produced and cited on both sides in Hilary term 1691, gave judgment for the plaintiff, that the letters patents were good and bound the revenue; and that the plaintiff ought to be paid the arrears of the said 60l. per ann. and the growing duty for the future.

Whereupon the then attorney-general on the behalf of his majesty, brought a writ of error returnable before the then commissioners of the great seal, who thereupon ordered all the judges to be attended with copies of the proceedings, and that they should give their assistance at the argument of the case: and after the cause had been long and many times argued by council at the bar, at last the judges assistants severally and solemnly argued the same, and were all of opinion (except the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas) that the letters patents were good in law, and that the plaintiff had a good title, and that the judgment given in the Exchequer was good and ought to be affirmed, and that the plaintiff Mr. Williamson ought to be paid his arrears and the future duty according to the said letters patents and judgment. But the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas was of opinion, that although the grant or letters patents were good in law, yet that the plaintiff had not taken a proper remedy, and that the court of Exchequer had no jurisdiction in this cause. And the right honourable the then lord keeper, (now lord chancellor) having publicly argued the said cause, and being of the same opinion as to the jurisdiction of the court, for that and several other reasons offered by his lordship, was 1696. pleased to reverse the judgment.

Upon which judgment of reversal, the plaintiff Mr. Williamson hath brought his writ of error in the house of lords, and humbly hopes their lordships will be pleased to reverse the judgment given by the lord chancellor, and affirm the judgment given for the plaintiff in the court of Exchequer. Considering,

I. That the plaintiff is a purchaser upon a full and valuable consideration from Mr. Robert Vyner the patentee, having delivered up the security he had for his debt, and accepted the 60l. per ann. in lieu thereof.

II. That the court of Exchequer (who are always exceeding careful of the revenue, and the king's interest, being more immediately bound thereunto by the oaths than the rest of the judges are), upon mature and great deliberation and search and view of many ancient precedents, did solemnly adjudge and declare the law to be, that the letters patents were good, and that the plaintiff had taken a proper remedy, and ought to be paid his annuity and the arrears thereof.

III. That all the judges called to the lord chancellor's assistance (except the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas), upon several days solemn arguments and debate, gave their opinions for the plaintiff in affirmance of the judgment in the Exchequer; and that the said letters patents were good, and ought to be complied with in paying the said annuity, and that the plaintiff had taken a proper remedy to recover the same.

IV. Even the opinion of the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas was (as is humbly conceived), that the grants and letters patents were good, and conveyed a legal right and title to the patentee; yet that this right was without a remedy; for that the court of Exchequer had no power over the king's money, when it was brought into the receipt, their power being over it as was alledged in transitu, before paid in, and only to enforce the payment thereof; whereas a right and title without a remedy (and no other legal remedy was pretended to be pointed out to the plaintiff) seems contrary to all laws, and to the rules of justice and reason: and indeed it would be a hard thing to say that the court of Exchequer can relieve the king against the subject, and not help and relieve the subject when he produces a legal title against the king. This hath not been the practice of that court for near the last 200 years.

V. The objections so much insisted upon, that the lord treasurer is superior to the barons, and therefore not to be commanded by them to pay monies; and that in case the barons can dispose of the king's money, it may weaken and prevent the public security when the necessities of the state require it to be otherwise employed, are thus answered. That although the lord treasurer is a greater person, yet he and all the subjects are inferior to the king's courts. That the barons send this command, as they are a court of justice, and in the name of the king himself; so that it is the king by his writs, and not the barons that command the lord treasurer in this case. The barons have no power to dispose of the king's money, but where they have a warrant under the great or privy seal (as in this case by the grant and letters patents they have) for the doing thereof; so that the court of Exchequer in this case only takes care that the king's grant and letters patents be made effectual, and that the officers of the crown do their duties for that purpose, as by the said letters patents they are enjoined to do.

VI. This cause in consequence must affect all persons claiming under the crown, or having any tallies or orders upon or payments out of the Exchequer; for all those will be made much better or worse by the judgment of the lords in this case.

Wherefore the plaintiff humbly prays that the judgment of the reversal may be reversed, and that the judgment of the court of Exchequer may be affirmed.

Extract from the Journal of the Lords, Ann. 1699---1700.

Die Martis, 4 Aprilis.

THIS day Mr. baron Hatfield, in the usual manner, brought in a writ of error from his majesty's court of Exchequer; (videlicet,) Robert Williamson plaintiff, against the attorney general defendant.

Die Mercurii, 6 Decembris.

Upon reading the petition of Robert Williamson merchant; shewing, "That, on the fourth of April, one thousand six hundred ninety-nine, by a writ of error, the petitioner brought a record before this house, for the reversal of a judgement given for the king, in the Exchequer-Chamber, by the lord keeper, now lord chancellor; and that the petitioner hath assigned errors on the said judgement of reversal; and praying a day may be appointed, for Mr. attorney general to reply or demur to the said errors assigned."

It is ORDERED, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that Mr. attorney do reply or demur to the said errors, on or before Wednesday, the twentieth day of this instant December, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Veneris, 19 Januarii.

After hearing counsel, this day, for Robert Williamson, plaintiff in a writ of error depending in this house, whereunto his majesty by his attorney general is defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that this house will hear counsel for his majesty thereupon, tomorrow, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Sabbati, 20 Januarii.

After hearing this day counsel for his majesty, upon the writ of error depending in this house, wherein Robert Williamson is plaintiff; and his majesty, by his attorney general, defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that this house will hear the judges, to this matter, on Monday next, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Lunæ, 22 Januarii.

After hearing the judges this day, (pursuant to the order of the twentieth instant,) to give their opinion upon the writ of error depending in this house, wherein Robert Williamson is plaintiff; and his majesty, by his attorney general, defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the debate of what hath been offered in this matter shall be resumed to-morrow, at eleven of the clock; and all the judges to attend.

Die Martis, 23 Januarii.

After hearing counsel, at the bar, to argue the errors assigned upon the writ of error depending in this house, wherein Robert Williamson is plaintiff; and his majesty, by his attorney general, defendant; and debate thereupon:

This question was put, "Whether the judgement of reversal shall be reversed?"

It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Leave being asked, and given, for any lord to dissent; these lords, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do dissent, for the reasons following; (videlicet,)

"For that we conceive it did not appear that ever any such judgement was given by the Exchequer, before the annexing the court of Augmentations to the Exchequer."

"For that, since the dissolving and annexing of the said court of Augmentations, there hath no such judgement been given, unless in such cases which were in the cognizance of the court of Augmentations before it was dissolved."

"That the judgements, in the cases of sir Henry Nevil and sir Thomas Wroth, and others of the like nature cited, seem to be by virtue of the powers of the court of Augmentations being annexed to the court of Exchequer."

"That those courts were duly annexed, appears by the preamble of the statute 1^o Eliz. cap. 4. by the lord chief justice Bromley's case, and by the case of the earl of Devonshire in Cook's Reports; and for that the court of First Fruits and Tiths was dissolved, and annexed in like manner to the Exchequer, as the court of Augmentations was; which powers, by that annexation, subsist in that court to this day."

Vol. XI.

Whereas, by virtue of his majesty's writ of error, returnable into the house of peers in parliament assembled, a record of the court of Exchequer was brought into this house, the fourth day of April, one thousand six hundred ninety-nine, wherein a judgement given by the barons of the said court, in Hilary Terme, one thousand six hundred ninety-one, for Robert Williamson, against his majesty's attorney general, for the payment of an annual sum of sixty pounds, and the arrears thereof, out of the hereditary revenue of excise, was, in Michaelmas Terme, one thousand six hundred ninety-six, reversed in the Exchequer chamber, by the lord keeper of the great seal of England, now lord chancellor:

After hearing counsel several days, to argue the errors assigned upon the said writ of error; and due consideration of what was offered on either side; it is this day ordered and adjudged, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said judgement of reversal shall be, and is hereby, reversed; and that the said judgement, given by the barons of the Exchequer for the said Robert Williamson, shall be, and is hereby, affirmed.

The tenor of which judgement, to be affixed to the record to be remitted, followeth; (videlicet,) XXIX. Proceedings in an Action by Mr. ANTHONY FABRIGAS, against Lieutenant-General MOSTYN, Governor of Minorca, for false Imprisonment and Banishment; first in the Common-Pleas, and afterwards in the King's Bench, 1773, and 1774.

MAY it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an action for an assault and false imprisonment, brought by Anthony Fabrigas against John Mostyn, esq. The plaintiff states in his declaration, that the defendant, on the first of September, 1771, with force and arms, made an assault upon him at Minorca, and then and there imprisoned him, and caused him to be carried from Minorca to Carthage in Spain. There is a second count in the declaration, for an assault and false imprisonment, in which the banishment is omitted. These injuries he lays to his damage at 10,000 l. To this declaration the defendant has pleaded, not guilty; and for further plea, has admitted the charges in the declaration mentioned, but justifies what he has done, by alledging that the plaintiff endeavoured to create a mutiny among the inhabitants of Minorca, whereupon the defendant, as governor, was obliged to seize the plaintiff, to confine him six days in prison, and then to banish him to Carthage, as it was lawful for him to do. To this plea the plaintiff replies, and says, that the defendant did assault, imprison, and banish him of his own wrong, and without any such cause as he has above alledged, and thereupon issue is joined. This, gentlemen, is the nature of the pleadings. Mr. Serjeant Glynn will open to you the facts on which our declaration is founded, and if we support it by evidence, we shall be entitled to your verdict, with such damages as the injury requires.

Mr. Serjeant GLYNN.

MAY it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this cause for the plaintiff. Gentlemen, this is an action that Mr. Fabrigas, a native and inhabitant of the island of Minorca, has brought against the defendant, Mr. Mostyn, his majesty's governor in that island, for assaulting, false imprisoning, and banishing him to a foreign country, the dominions of the king of Spain. Mr. Mostyn has, in the first place, pleaded that he is not guilty of those injuries; in the next, he has offered this justification for himself, that the plaintiff, Mr. Fabrigas, was guilty of practices tending to sedition, and that Mr. Mostyn, for such

(a) The title of the proceedings first published, being only the trial of the cause at nisi prius before Mr. Justice Gould, who sat as chief justice of the Common Pleas, was thus expressed.

The proceedings at large, in a cause on an action brought by Anthony Fabrigas, gent. against lieutenant-general John Mostyn, governor of the island of Minorca, colonel of the first regiment of dragoon guards, and one of the grooms of his majesty's bed-chamber; for false imprisonment and banishment from Minorca to Carthage in Spain. Tried before Mr. Justice Gould, in the court of Common-Pleas, in Guildhall, London, on the 13th of July, 1773. Containing the evidence verbatim as delivered by the witnesses; with all the speeches and arguments of the counsel and of the court.

Before the trial there was the following address to the bookseller.

"I am very glad to find you are going to publish the trial between Fabrigas and Mostyn, as the knowledge of the particulars of this interesting cause must be worthy the attention of the public.

"As I have passed a great part of my life in Minorca, and have some knowledge of the parties, I was induced from curiosity with many others to attend this trial at Guildhall, where I was greatly surprised to hear the account given by governor Mostyn's witnesses, Mess. Wright and Mackellar, of the constitution and form of government of that island.

"I did indeed expect that Mr. Fabrigas's counsel would have called witnesses to contra dict the very extraordinary account those gentlemen had given, which they might easily have done by any person who had the least knowledge of the matter. I suppose they did not, either from thinking the subject immaterial to their case, or perhaps to preserve to Mr. Serjeant Glynn the closure of the trial by that most eloquent and masterly reply with which it was concluded.

"Whatever the motives of Mr. Fabrigas's counsel might be for leaving this account uncontradicted, I think it very material that the world should not now be misled, as they would be, should they read the evidence of these gentlemen, and not be informed of their mistakes; I call them mistakes, for however extraordinary some parts of their depositions may appear to an observant reader, I am unwilling to charge them with any other crime than ignorance.

"I am therefore induced to trouble you with this letter, that (if not too late) you may publish it with the trial; my sole object is, that the public may be apprized of the misinformation given by these gentlemen. I do not expect that the bare contradiction of an anonymous person should overset the declarations upon oath of two gentlemen given in open court. All I mean is, to apprise the public of the truth, and to leave them to make such further inquiry as they shall think fit.

"The purport of that part of the evidence given by those gentlemen, which I mean to dispute, was, that a part of the island called the arraval of St. Phillip's is not under the jurisdiction of the magistrates, nor governed by the same laws which prevail in the rest of the island, but is under the sole authority of the governor, and has no law but his will and pleasure.

"It should seem that so very extraordinary a constitution as absolute despotism for a considerable number of inhabitants, in a country governed by law, and which is part of the dominions of the crown of Great Britain, should have had some very urgent and apparent cause to make necessary that slavery which Englishmen abhor, and if it exists, must have been established by some particular provision. If it had been said, that in the fort of St. Phillip's, in time of actual siege, an absolute military government must prevail, the objects and the reasons could easily be understood. But to say that in time of profound peace not only the inhabitants of fort St. Phillip's, but all those of the arraval, which contains a large district of country, with many hundred inhabitants, living out of all reach of the garrison, should be subject not to military government, for that has its written laws and forms of trial, but to the absolute will of the governor, without any law or trial, is in itself so absurd, and so contradictory to every idea of reason, justice, and the spirit with which this country governs its foreign dominions, that, I trust, my countrymen will not believe such a monster exists in any part of this empire, without better proof than the information of these gentlemen.

"I would not have the reader think that this strange idea originated in the brain of Mess. Wright and Mackellar, for I know it is a favourite point, which the governor of Minorca has endeavoured to establish; not so much, I believe, for the pleasure of exercising absolute authority, as on account of some good perquisites which he enjoys, and which can be defended on no other ground.

"To establish this, it has been endeavoured to alter the ancient distribution of the districts or terminos of the island from four to five.

"The four terminos of Ciudadella, Alayor, Marcadal, and Mahon have their separate magistrates and jurisdictions, and comprehend the whole island. The arrival of St. Phillip's was always a part of the termino of Mahon; in order therefore to establish the governor's claim, it became necessary to set up the arrival of St. Phillip's as a separate and distinct termino. If this could be done, it ceased to be within the jurisdiction of the magistrates of the island, who have power only in their four terminos, and accordingly Mess. Wright and Mackellar advance, that there are five terminos instead of four; but those who are acquainted with the island well know, that this is a modern invention; that in the records of the country, there is not the least foundation for such an idea; on the contrary, that every proof of the reverse exists. The inhabitants of the arraval are subject to the particular jurats of Mahon, they differ in no respect from the other inhabitants of that termino, and the judges possess and exercise the same jurisdiction and authority in the arraval, as they do in the other parts of the island, which could not be the case, if the claim set up by the governor really existed.

"No proof whatever has been or can be produced that this claim has any foundation; nor indeed did Mess. Wright and Mackellar attempt to give any but their own assertions. The only thing that had the least similitude to proof, was their saying, that in one instance the officer acting as coroner to examine a corpse that had met with a violent death in the arraval, asked the governor's leave before he proceeded.

"This fact I do not pretend to dispute, it proves nothing; and was evidently only a mark of respect, which it is no wonder magistrates in that island pay to a governor who really has so much power. But to have made this amount to any thing like proof such misbehaviour, by his sole authority as governor, thought proper to inflict upon him as a punishment, what Mr. Fabrigas, in his declaration, complains of as a grievance. This Mr. Mostyn takes upon him to insist, in an English court of justice, is the justifiable exercise of an authority derived from the crown of England. And the facts which he undertakes thus to justify, are, in the first place, a length of severe imprisonment upon a native of the island of Minorca, a subject of Great Britain, living under the protection of the English laws; and, secondly, by his sole authority, without the intervention of any judicature, the sending him into exile into the dominions of a foreign prince. Gentlemen, some observations must strike you upon the very state of this plea; they must alarm you, and you must be anxious to know the particulars of that case, to which, in the sense of any man who has received his education in this country, or ever conversed with Englishmen, it can be applied as a justification; that case, therefore, I will shortly state to you:—Mr. Fabrigas is a gentleman of the island of Minorca, of as good a condition as any inhabitant of that island, of as fair and unblemished a character too as that island produces. It is however enough, for this present purpose, to say that Mr. Fabrigas is a descendant of the antient inhabitants of Minorca: that he lived there under the capitulated rights: that, as such, the national faith was pledged for his enjoyment of those rights that his ancestors capitulated for; but what is of more consideration, being born in Minorca since its subjection to the crown of England, he was a free-born subject of England, and claimed, as his birth-right, the privileges due to that character, and the protection of the English laws. There was a particular stipulation upon the surrender of the island, that every occupier or possessor of land should be intitled, under certain regulations and restrictions, to the produce of his lands, and to such profit as by his industry he could make of them. Upon that ground a dispute arose, to which alone can be imputed the displeasure of Mr. Mostyn towards the plaintiff, and the treatment he received from him, in the progress of it. Mr. Mostyn, as governor, was appealed to, and his good-nature appeared to be so servicable to the adversary of Mr. Fabrigas, that early in the morning Mr. Fabrigas was suddenly taken from his house by a file of soldiers, and by them conducted to a dungeon, unaccused, untried, unconvicted. Thus, without any form of judicial proceedings, this gentleman, who then lived in esteem in the island, finds himself all of a sudden committed to a dungeon, a dungeon that was made use of only for the most dangerous malefactors, and that only when they were ready to receive the last of punishments. In this gloomy, damp, dismal, and horrid dungeon, was this man detained without any previous accusation, without any call upon him to make his defence, or being informed there was any crime or offence that was alleged against him, and without any notice either to him or his family. When he found himself in prison, there was humanity enough in the breast of the keeper of that prison to accommodate him with a bed; but it seems that accommodation was by the power of that island thought too much for him, and the bed was taken from him; a check was given to the lenity of the keeper. No notice having been given to his family that they might visit or administer comfort to him; he did, by humble request, desire that his wife might be permitted to visit him: that consolation too was denied him. In this manner was Mr. Fabrigas deprived of his liberty for a considerable time. It is unnecessary for me to state particularly the precise time that this imprisonment continued; that you will hear from the witnesses. Nor does a case like this depend upon minutes, hours, or days, but this is the nature and kind of imprisonment that Mr. Fabrigas endured: so closely watched that no man could have access to him, deprived of the consolation of his family, severed from all communication with his friends, relations, or acquaintance, that could administer the least comfort to him. For several days did this man continue under this imprisonment, nor did his sufferings determine with it; his removal from the dungeon was only a substitute of one species of cruelty in the place of another: for the instant he was taken from prison, he was carried by the same arbitrary and despotic power on board a ship, without any previous notice, without any time allowed him to prepare for his departure, without the ordinary visit or comfort of friends and acquaintance, from whom he was probably to be separated for ever. Thus was this man taken from his native country, and the insupportable hardships of a dungeon were followed by an entire expulsion from his country, and every thing that was dear to him: he was sent instantly on board a ship by force, and carried to Carthagena, a foreign country, under the dominion of the crown of Spain. This is the nature of Mr. Fabrigas's case.—Now, gentlemen, for a moment, let me remind you of the pretence under which this imprisonment is inflicted. It is said Mr. Fabrigas excited sedition, or attempted to excite sedition; that he acted or spoke in a turbulent and mutinous manner; and therefore that the governor, as his plea states he was well authorized to do, committed him to prison, and banished him out of the island; or rather committed him to prison for the purpose of banishing him out of the island, for I believe that is the true state of his plea. Gentlemen, you would justly accuse me of a great and wanton waste of your time, if I should say a great deal for the purpose of exculpating Mr. Fabrigas from the charge and imputation that is thrown upon him in this place, because I am persuaded
